

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

MAISONS DE SANTÉ.

I HAD often, whilst walking through the smaller streets of Paris, and more especially through those nearest to the barrières or circuit walls of the city, had my attention arrested by a class of houses as yet nondescript, and of an altogether peculiar appearance.

One of these, larger than most others of the sort, had for that reason, perhaps, more thoroughly attracted my notice. It was situated close to the Bois de Vincennes, in the Rue A——: a narrow, decrepit street, some half a mile long, dull as the catacombs, and every bit as dirty; full of houses running to seed, and of shops in the last stage of consumption, and paved, as though for the sins of its inhabitants, with those small, knobby, gritty stones that enhance the comfort of walking in the same measure as a pair of boots lined with parched peas. The house to which I have alluded stood at one of the extremities of this dismal thoroughfare. It was large, strongly built, and of four stories high. Painted from roof to floor in glaring white, its aspect was clean as compared to the dwellings which neighbored it; but—and this it was that first fixed my attention—the forty and odd windows that looked from it to the street were all hermetically closed with wooden shutters, protected in some cases by thick, perpendicular bars of iron.

There was something chill and gloomy in this arrangement, which shut out all the rays of the sun, and veiled from the passer-by every trace of the life which one felt must exist behind the cold face of this habitation. If I may say so, the house seemed blind.

It had two doors: the one, small, was apparently a private entrance; the other, large, and surmounted by a formidable row of iron spikes, seemed destined to admit carriages. Above it one could read the words, Maison de Santé.

I had often heard, during my stay in France, of the maisons de santé. They had been mentioned to me as private mad-houses; but the enormous number of them I had seen in Paris had led me to fancy, or at least to hope, that this definition might be incorrect. Accordingly, after my first sight of the establishment I have just described, I renewed my inquiries, but this time more seriously and more minutely.

A maison de santé, I was then told, is an asylum for people of any condition, but principally for the rich, who from bodily or mental infirmities, or from certain other causes, are deemed by society, or by the rulers thereof, better under lock and key than at large.

If a man of fortune or position go mad or become epileptic, and his family be unwilling to confine him at Charenton or Bicêtre, it sends him to a maison de santé; if a man be old, invalid, or paralytic, and require more care than his relations are able or disposed to give him, they will send him there too; if a young spendthrift run heavily into debt, his friends, to cure him of his extravagance, will often confine him for a year or two in one of these houses; and if a young lady draw down upon herself, by some misadventure, too marked an amount of public attention, it is generally under the roof of a maison de santé that her parents will eclipse her.

Again, if a debtor of some means be sent to Clichy, and find his captivity unpleasant, he will often ask, on the ground of ill-health, to be removed to a retreat of this kind; prisoners in a good social position, and under confinement for misdemeanors, such as breaches of the peace, duelling, or transgression of the press laws, will often do the same thing, and on the certificate of two doctors (providing also that they have some little interest without to second their demand at the Ministry of the Interior), their request will usually be granted.

"From these petitions to be admitted to them," added the person I was interrogating, "you may conclude that maisons de santé are rather agreeable places, and, indeed, some of them are; for although there are certainly a good many which are no better than private mad-houses, yet there are others—and to these it is that resort the genteel defaulters, duellists, and others I have named—which are, in point of fact, neither more nor less than boarding-houses, and very sumptuous ones too. The apartments in them are handsome, the gardens extensive and well kept, the living excellent, and the charges necessarily high, varying usually from 400 francs to 600 francs (£ 16 to £ 24) a month. The only privation of which the inmates can ever complain is that of liberty, and of this even they are seldom wholly deprived, for the directors of the maisons de santé, whose interest it naturally is to keep on good terms with their boarders, not unfrequently allow the latter to go and walk about the town as they please, always, however, exacting from them the pledge of their word of honor to return; for it must be borne in mind that the director, being responsible to justice for all the prisoners who are allowed to undergo in his house the term of their captivity, would, in the event of the escape of one of them, not only forfeit his license, but also subject himself to a heavy fine and possibly to a few months' imprisonment. Moreover, beside the chances—very slight, in truth—of a breach of parole on the part of one of his inmates, the doctor of a maison de santé has to run the risk, if his boarder be a debtor, of the latter being perceived in the streets by the creditors who have incarcerated him; in which case, if it can be proved that the pretended patient has been allowed more latitude than is consistent with the state of health in which he is supposed to be by the certificate that procured his translation from prison, his creditor may not only cause him to be at once returned to jail, but may also, if he please, prosecute the too-indulgent owner of the boarding-house before the tribunal of correctional police."

A somewhat comic instance of this occurred a few years ago in the case of an Englishman, Lord B—— C——, who, being head over ears in debt, was arrested at the suit of some Parisians and sent to Clichy. Finding the sojourn within the walls of a whitewashed cell a matter of some discomfort, his Lordship, who was of an imaginative turn of mind, feigned sickness, and got a couple of obliging doctors to affirm that he would be running the gravest dangers in remaining an hour longer in prison. On the strength of this grievous certificate the Minister of the Interior allowed the noble lord to be removed to a maison de santé near the Champs Elysées; and here the leech's craft wrought such wonders with him, that a week or two later a certain tradesman, in whose books he occupied a pre-eminently conspicuous position, was not a little surprised at seeing the easy-minded nobleman, whom he imagined to be groaning behind the bars of a prison, quietly enjoying himself in a box at the opera.

"Ah, ah!" said he, with a chuckle, "I may now presume one of two things; either my Lord has paid my bill into court and been consequently let free, or he has found means to slip his cables and escape; in which case the governor of Clichy, as responsible for his person, will have to satisfy my claims. Hurrah! In either event I am safe for my money." And the exuberant shopkeeper started off, as fast as a cab could carry him, to the debtor's jail.

"Lord B—— C——?" he asked, rushing headlong into the porter's lodge. "Is he here?"

"Dangerously ill," was the reply. "Gone mad, I believe, under the rigors of his confinement, and removed, a few days ago, to a lunatic asylum under a medical certificate."

"Dangerously ill! Mad!" roared the indignant tradesman. "Why, I have just seen him clapping his hands at the theatre!"

"Ah! tant mieux," answered the official; "but then what was the good of coming to ask me if he were here?" and he banged the gate.

Foaming with rage at feeling himself fooled, the baffled creditor ran off to take counsel with the score of other purveyors of Lord B—— C—— in the same predicament as himself.

"We must take things coolly," said one; "for if we go and complain on the spot, the doctor with whom Milord is staying will not fail to say that his patient's spirits were so low that he had prescribed a little amusement as positively necessary to cheer him; if, however, we set a watch upon the Maison D——, and acquire the certain proof that our debtor's illness is a sham, and that he is allowed to run wild as he pleases, we can then come down upon him with every chance of success. Patience!"

This golden advice was followed. Turn by turn and day after day each of the creditors posted himself in the neighborhood of the maison de santé; and a fortnight later, the unsuspecting nobleman, who daily and nightly went to races, dinners, balls, and theatres, as though he had never owed a sixpence in his life, was unpleasantly shocked at finding himself hurried back to the Rue Clichy, whilst the doctor who had kept him was none the less so at being condemned to a fine of a thousand francs as a lesson how to modify his prescriptions better.

This example, to which one may find many similar, will serve to give you an idea of what some maisons de santé are; "but," continued my friend, "ainsi que fagot et fagot, il y a maison et maison"; and besides those houses which are mere asylums, and those which are comfortable hotels, there is another class of house, bearing the same generic name, but in which, along with idiots and lunatics, are often confined for weeks, months, years sometimes, men who are neither mad nor culprits, but whose misfortune it has been to quarrel with influential friends, or to bring themselves by a too candid expression of political feeling under the notice of the prefect of police.

In order to understand this, you must form to yourself an exact idea of the way in which we are ruled in France. Since 1852 personal security, as well as public liberty, has ceased to exist. Living in constant fear of riots and revolutions, the Government rules by means of a rod of iron. The maintenance of order, or rather of terror, is its guiding principle; and to keep the people in a state of wholesome discipline, every means, without exception, are made use of by the authorities, who all, from the Emperor down to the puniest village mayor, exercise a despotism against which it is impossible to kick or even to protest without danger.

You cannot here enounce an opinion as you would in England, independently, carelessly, freely. If discontented with or wronged by some one in power, you must be exceedingly cautious in expressing your dissatisfaction, or, to be more prudent, you had better not express it at all; for unless you be a Berryer, a Thiers, a Jules Favre, or some one whose high social position, fame, or connections will guarantee him against being molested, you can never be sure but that some night you may be driven off to the "Préfecture de Police," and thence consigned, under a certificate of two Government doctors, to a maison de santé. Instances of this revolting kind have occurred often, and will occur often again so long as France is not gifted with free institutions; for

"A sceptre snatched with an unruly hand
Must be as boisterously maintained as gained;
And he that stands upon a slippery place
Makes nice of no vile hold to stay him up."

Once shut up by order of the police, Heaven help you! for your chances of regaining your liberty are small indeed. There is no free press to take up your case, and stir up public indignation in your behalf. Were even your plight known to the best-disposed of newspaper editors, he could never risk a fine and the interdiction of his paper in taking up the cudgels for you. Your only chances of getting loose would therefore lie in an escape, or in the private intervention of some respectable friend nearly or distantly connected with the authorities, and who would consent to hold himself responsible for your future quiet behavior, or promise that you should immediately quit the country.

One finds in history that it was in the time of Napoleon I. that maisons de santé first played an important part in the government as private State prisons. They replaced the Bastille and the "lettres de cachet," so much in honor in the last century, and were made by Fouché to serve the ends of more than one political villany. In 1802, the Prince de Polignac, afterwards so famous as Prime Minister of Charles X., was condemned for conspiracy to two years' imprisonment; but at the end of that time, instead of regaining his liberty, he was removed with his brother to a maison de santé, where they both remained incarcerated ten years, their captivity only ending, in fact, with the reign of the Emperor. Mdlle. de Narbonne Fritzlar, too, the lovely Duchess of Chevreuse, some time maid of honor to the Empress Josephine, was, in 1808, cloistered in a maison de santé, on account of the political aversion she had evinced for Bonaparte; and, again, it was from a private lunatic asylum, in which he had been many years arbitrarily confined that General Mallet escaped on the night of October 23, 1812, whilst the Grand Army was in Russia, and attempted that coup d'état which, ill-organized as it was, very nearly succeeded in overthrowing the Government. Under the Bourbons, up to 1880, it was the turn of the Bonapartists to fill the maisons de santé; under Louis Philippe the Republicans and the Legitimists were more or less shut up in them; and since the establishment of the Second Empire, it has been towards the persecution of political writers in country newspapers, or of too free-thinking students, that maisons de santé have been directed.

"Are there any means of visiting these houses?" I asked.

"Yes," was the answer; "but it is generally difficult. Those who have friends under confinement are seldom allowed to see them except in a special parlor; and to go over the establishment, it mostly requires to be either a friend of the director or a Government inspector."

"But to me, then, as a foreigner, there are no ways open?"

"If you like, we can do this," proposed my French acquaintance: "we can go to a maison de santé, under the pretext of wishing to board a friend there; and then, although I would not vouch for it, the owner will possibly, out of politeness, allow us a glimpse of his premises."

This advice seemed feasible to me, and half an hour afterwards we were rolling along the Rue A—in a fly, that deposited us at the door of the maison de santé which had especially aroused my attention. Our ring was answered by a sharp-looking servant in a blue apron, and we found ourselves in a bright, stone-paved entrance-hall, giving view on to a garden, the very reverse, I must say, of anything I should have expected from the outward look of the house. A balmy scent of roses stole refreshingly towards us; a few spruce flower-beds, decked with smart geraniums, and bordered by alleys of clean yellow sand, greeted our eyes; and a couple of happy, chattering parrots, who were strutting about unfettered and free, gave to the place an air of cheerfulness and comfort. We handed our cards to the servant, and a few minutes after were shown into the director's study.

Dr. E— was a man of middle height, well built, and naturally powerful; but a sallow face, a circle of black round each of his eyes, and a somewhat ungainly stoop, gave him an air of premature debility. He seemed about fifty, and there was in his manners and in his tone all the unctuous politeness of a man who has seen a great deal of life and of good society. He seldom spoke without smiling, and he smiled so pleasantly that, had it not been for an awkward trick he had of keeping his eyes on the ground, he would have enlisted one's confidence at once. In his person he was scrupulously neat; his dress was quiet and in good taste; and from his button-hole peeped the inevitable ribbon of the Legion of Honor.

He threw a rapid but shrewd glance at us as we entered, and courteously motioned to us to be seated.

I forgot the precise terms of the story we forged to excuse our visit; but I think we supposed the existence of a mutual friend suddenly attacked with insanity, and for whom we wished to find a quiet retreat other than a mere lunatic asylum. We terminated our fable by a polite request to be allowed to judge for ourselves whether the establishment could offer those comforts of which we were in search.

"Have you a certificate to prove the insanity of the person whom you wish to seclude?" asked the director.

"Yes," said my friend, coolly.

"And signed by two French doctors?"

"Yes, by two French doctors."

"I shall have great pleasure, then, in showing you over my house," said Dr. E—, rising; and after taking a large key from the top of his desk, added, hurriedly, "This, gentlemen, is not, as you know, a common mad-house; it is a house of convalescence and of retreat. I have several boarders who have come here to seek a little repose after nervous excitement, or after too hard brain-work, and who will leave me as soon as they have sufficiently rested. I must beg you, therefore, not to be astonished, if you see in the gardens men who have neither the air nor the gait of lunatics. There are others," continued the doctor, with a slight shrug of the shoulders and a pitying smile, — "there are others who may seem to you at first sight to be of sound mind, and who may even tell you that they are confined here unjustly and from infamous motives; but I need not tell you that such labor under a most deplorable hallucination, as it is quite impossible to detain here against his will any man who is not notoriously insane."

We both bowed, and, after this little preface, the doctor led the way down the staircase through the sunny garden we had admired, and stopped on the left before a small door shaded with ivy.

"My establishment," he explained, "is divided into four divisions: that into which we are about to enter is the second, reserved for those who are nearly cured, or for those who are sufficiently harmless in their madness to need no restraint." And so saying he threw open the door, taking care, however, to relock it well after him.

Scarcely had we entered the garden of this second section, when three inmates, who were walking side by side and smoking, stopped short and bluntly accosted the director.

"When are you going to let me out?" cried the first.

"You promised me my release a fortnight ago!" exclaimed the second.

"Have you sent off my last letter?" asked the third.

At the first moment, and judging them more from the abruptness of their tone and the exceeding shabbiness of their clothes than from their faces, I set down these men for maniacs; but a second look showed me that I was mistaken. If mad, they were, for the time at least, in perfect possession of their senses. The sight of Dr. E—— seemed to have excited them, but there was no insanity in the irritation that gleamed in their features. They remained perfectly quiet, and the director treated them with greater respect than he would have shown to common lunatics.

"You will excuse me, gentlemen," said he, uncovering himself before them, and speaking with the most insinuating politeness,—"you will excuse me if I be unable to converse with you at this moment, for, as you see, I have visitors; but by and by—"

A contemptuous laugh cut him short. "O yes, the old story!" cried one. "You say 'by and by,' and then you never come near us once in a month." The doctor hurried on, coloring, and we followed.

A tall man, with a handsome, thoughtful face, raised his hat as we passed, but without pausing in his walk.

"Is that person mad?" I inquired of the director, who had answered the bow with a friendly wave of the hand.

"Yes," replied he, nodding; "but he has lucid intervals."

The man had seemed to me as intelligent as any one at large; but we were going too fast for me to examine him very closely, and my reflections on him were suddenly interrupted by the pell-mell arrival of three or four idiots, — genuine ones this time, — who surrounded us with demonstrations of the most exuberant delight, and insisted upon shaking hands with us. All asked to be let loose immediately; and it was only under the implicit promise that they should regain their liberty that very afternoon, that they suffered us to proceed.

"How long have you been here?" said I to one with white hair and a jovial face.

"Thirty-seven years," he answered quickly. "I came here in 1829, but my brother is coming to fetch me to-morrow, and then I shall cross the sea in a boat of my own invention, a beauty, with blue sides and a wheel in the middle." And the merry old idiot ran off laughing and rubbing his hands.

"His brother has been dead and buried these fifteen years," whispered the doctor.

The garden in which we were was about fifty yards long by thirty. There were no flowers in it, but a profusion of lilac-trees and a few acacias threw a pleasing shade over the gravel paths. An abrupt turn in one of these brought us in sight of a group of five or six patients playing at cards on a stone form. A man with a blue apron and a key in his belt sat by them reading the paper and smoking a clay pipe. This, I found, was the guardian of the division. He had nearly twenty patients under his surveillance; but it struck me that the supervision he exercised over them was none of the most watchful. Perhaps it was he knew with whom he had to deal; but certainly, had a lunatic been so minded, he would have had abundant time to slay another without the keeper interfering with him.

The players stood up, and the servant hid his pipe and his paper at our approach.

"Is any one in the drawing-room?" asked the doctor, throwing a vexed look at the servant, who was apparently breaking a regulation in smoking.

"Yes, sir," was the answer; "two gentlemen are playing at draughts there."

The apartment gratified with the euphemious name of drawing-room looked in all points like a third-class waiting-room at a country railway-station in France. A large round table occupied its centre, and was surrounded by a score of old-fashioned chairs, covered with faded, worn-out velvet. The walls were whitewashed, and in a corner stood a large iron stove, protected by a formidable grating of wire-work, destined, no doubt, to keep the lunatics from playing with the fire. The two patients who were playing at draughts seemed quiet and inoffensive; had I met them elsewhere than in a maison de santé, I should never have suspected them of unsoundness of mind; and, as it was, I have nothing but the assurance of the director to guarantee me that they were indeed what they were supposed to be. I could not but remark that it was perhaps hard to subject to so complete a privation of liberty men whose insanity the doctor himself avowed to be only intermittent.

"Do you never allow your patients to go out?" I asked.

The director shook his head.

"Not even for a country walk, attended by a servant?" I inquired again. "You are so near the Bois de Vincennes that there could surely be no danger for the convalescent or for the lucid to take this little recreation. I should have thought, on the contrary, that it would accelerate their cure."

"External walks are not a part of my treatment," repeated the doctor, with dry politeness.

"And thus," exclaimed my friend, "that old man who came here in 1829 has been cooped up thirty-seven years within the limits of this tiny garden!"

The director threw a searching look at us. The sympathy we were displaying for his patients seemed to him no doubt misplaced.

"Do you wish the friend whom you desire to place in my hands to take walks out of doors?" he inquired.

"No-o," I stammered, growing red, and not knowing very well how to answer.

My French friend, in order to extricate us from the strait into which our imprudence had placed us, turned the subject, and asked the doctor what were the regulations of his establishment.

"In this division," he replied, "the boarders rise at six in the summer, and at seven in winter; at nine they take coffee, at twelve breakfast, and at five dinner. At eight in all seasons they go to bed, each in a room of his own."

"And during the daytime may they sit in their rooms to read or write?"

"No," answered the director; "we do not allow privacy in this division. In the first ward the boarders may go in and out of their apartments as they please; but here they must do what reading or writing they have in this drawing-room."

I have already described this piteous room, of which every corner bore trace of age and wear; and I tried to picture to myself what must be the sufferings of those who were convalescent, or only partially insane, at being obliged to pass their summer days and their winter evenings in this dreary, uncomfortable place, in the company of a boorish, ruffianly keeper, and of idiots who chuckled and jabbered around. How read? how write? how think under such conditions? For a man who came to seek rest after nervous irritation, must not such a life be torture? and, besides, was it not calculated to push a man who was not yet mad to become so from sheer weariness and worry? I glanced at the two men who had stopped their game of draughts, and, certes, their looks most painfully corroborated my reflections.

"Are you content here?" I whispered to one. He threw a deep glance at me, and then let his eyes glide furtively but meaningly towards the director. This was all his answer.

I felt inexpressibly saddened. "Poor fellow!" I murmured to myself. "How unravel the secret which is wrapped up in that glance? How read in the lines of that griefful face the sad tale of which each wrinkle is a page? Those eyes, now dim with tears, must once have gleamed as brightly as mine; that heart, so dull and drooping, must once have had its hopes, its dreams, and its ambition! That hand has not always been enfevered; that brow has not always been contracted as in pain; and that voice, so faint and tired, has not always borne, as now, such a heavy burden of mystery! Poor fellow! how guess at the misfortunes, at the long series of sorrows, perhaps, that have hurried him here? . . . Ah, doctor!" I exclaimed, giving vent to my gloomy thoughts, "you must have in your mind a host of very harrowing secrets!"

The director accepted this remark as a compliment to his experience. "Yes, alas!" said he. "You have heard the proverb, 'Truth is stranger than fiction'; but it is only those who have seen much of lunatic asylums that can understand its full significance. The most heartrending of novels are not to be found at the booksellers'," he added, with a half-sigh. "They are here"; and he pointed to the garden where his patients were walking; "each of those men is a volume!"

"Bound in very poor cloth," observed a maniac, who had overheard the last words, and who displayed a coat that resembled a piece of patchwork quilting.

We all laughed, and the doctor led us towards the first division, which was separated from the second by a large gate painted green.

"This is for the first-class patients," he explained. "For those who are well, or nearly so?" we asked.

He colored a little. "Those who are in the first division pay from three hundred and fifty to eight hundred francs a month," he replied; "those in the second pay but two hundred and fifty."

"Ah! even in a mad-house, then, money has its castles!" I sighed.

At this moment, and just as we were about to pass through the gate, a small man, with a pale face and a bushy red beard, rushed up to us, gesticulating. At the first words he uttered, as much as by his unmistakably British countenance, I recognized him for a countryman of mine.

"Docteur! Docteur!" cried he, in broken French, and striving to make himself understood in an incomprehensible mixture of English and other languages, — "Docteur! let me out — you promised — you — you —"

"Let me be your interpreter," I said, remarking that the doctor seemed to make no meaning out of what he said.

"Oh!" exclaimed he, whilst his face became scarlet with pleasure, "are you an Englishman?" and he seized me eagerly by the hand. The director beckoned to me to come along, but my curiosity was excited, and I took no heed.

"Listen!" cried the patient. "This is my case. You can, perhaps, be of use to me. For Heaven's sake, therefore, and out of Christian charity, do not forget what I tell you. My name is Frederick G—. I am a Scotchman, and live near Glasgow. Last January I left England to take a few days' pleasure-trip to Paris. Having scarcely ever travelled before, the fatigues of the journey from Scotland, together with my imprudence in plunging at once into sight-seeing without taking any rest, combined to make me ill. I was seized with a brain fever, and the proprietors of the Hotel de H—, where I was staying, instead of sending for a doctor and tending me as they ought to have done, fetched the police, who, on the certificate of two Government physicians, shut me up here as a madman. During ten days I was kept in the fourth division of this house, — that of the dangerous lunatics, confined by day in a strait-waistcoat and tied by night on to a hard iron bed, in a stone cell without a fire. How it was that I did not lose my senses altogether under such treatment I am sure I do not know. But, happily and providentially, I was cured. At the end of a fortnight I shook off my fever, and was then transferred to this second ward, where, notwithstanding that since February I have been perfectly fit to be released, I have been detained unjustly for nine months. I have no means of corresponding with my family, for the director suppresses all my letters; and my mother and my sister (the only relations I have), judging from my silence and from Dr. E—'s reports, think, no doubt, that I am really mad. To make matters worse, neither the doctor nor his assistant nor the keepers understand a word of English; and I am therefore totally unable to prove to them my soundness of mind —" The unhappy man paused, and seemed ready to cry.

"But," said I, astonished and shocked, "is there no inspection exercised by Government over these houses?" Do you never receive the visit of a magistrate, or of a judicial officer?"

"Yes," answered the Scotchman; "but the inspection is a mere formality. Once every six months a procureur impérial goes the round of the four divisions, but it is quite useless to make any complaints to him; for accustomed as he is to hear the same petitions from every lunatic he addresses, he pays no attention to them, and sets down one's prayers for symptoms of insanity. Besides," added the poor fellow, in a low voice, "the director makes the procureur believe exactly what he pleases; and if the latter observe, by chance, that such and such a patient looks perfectly well, the doctor can always reply that the man is merely in a lucid interval, and that in a few days he will have a relapse. The magistrate has other things to do besides finding out whether such statements be true or not. He goes away satisfied, and no more is seen of him for half a year.

"This gentleman appears to me of perfectly sound mind, Dr. E—," I exclaimed.

"Yes," answered the director, speaking with evident vexation; "but he has been very ill, and has only lately recovered. He will be released in a few days."

I translated this assurance to my fellow-countryman, and, at the same time, mentioned to him my address, promising that if he had not called upon me in a fortnight, I should conclude that he were still under confinement, and make his case known at the British Embassy.

I am happy to add that within a week of our visit the ill-fated Scotchman was liberated, and left France with the well-settled and prudent determination never to set foot in it again.

The first division differed essentially from the second in that, although the garden was a great deal larger, there were much fewer people in it. One or two patients only were walking about: quiet, gentlemanlike men they were, who seemed rather to shun us, for they retreated to their rooms as soon as we appeared, and did not show themselves again. One old man alone, wrapped up in a long blue cloak, and with a deplorably red nose, apostrophized the doctor, and told him that he was a scoundrel. But the director laughed so good-naturedly that I saw that, with regard to this inmate at least, his conscience was perfectly at rest.

After going the round of the garden, we entered a smart one-storied pavilion, and examined the two rooms which it contained. One of these was disposable, and its price, board and private attendant included, was, the director told us, 500 francs a month, — that is, £ 240 a year, — a monstrous sum for an apartment furnished with the most rigid simplicity, and for an ordinary which, judging from the dinner I saw carried to one of the patients, was very far from sumptuous. A half-pint bowl of broth, a small slice of boiled beef upon one plate, a similar slice of roast veal upon another, a few beans, and a solitary apple of the quality worth threepence the dozen, — such was the dinner of Dr. E——'s first-class boarders on the day we visited his establishment.

There remained yet two divisions to see, the third and the fourth; and the yells and shouts I heard proceeding from the latter made me anxious to obtain a glimpse of it. But the doctor, who probably thought that we had seen enough, respectfully excused himself from showing us any more. The third division, he urged, was reserved entirely for aged, invalid, and epileptic patients, — the sight of it could only cause us pain. As for the fourth, it was peopled by raving maniacs, to whom it might be dangerous to expose one's self. There was no insisting, but I ventured hesitatingly to inquire what were the means of restraint employed in case of unruliness or mischievousness. The answer was not very straightforward, but I could gather from it that the inmates were never subjected to blows, and that in the event of insubordination they were put into strait-waistcoats, and fastened on to arm-chairs of a peculiar contrivance. If these methods failed, they were occasionally placed in a cold bath for six or eight hours, or made to undergo a series of douches, that is, shower-baths of uncommon violence. The doctor added that he seldom made any systematic attempt to cure his patients. He thought that the best thing to do was to leave them to themselves, on the principle that madness is a disease of which it is usually impossible to discover the organic cause, and which it is hence useless to combat methodically. "If a man," said he, "do not regain his senses by himself, he will never do so with the help of any one else."

As it was impossible for me to judge of the effects of these theories upon a mere passing sight, I am unable to form a thoroughly impartial opinion as to the system pursued with regard to lunatics in French private asylums; but, judging from what I heard told me, after his release, by Mr. Frederick G——, to whom I have above alluded, I cannot but repeat that I consider the existence of maisons de santé, as now regulated, to be open to many and most lamentable abuses. The supervision exercised over them by Government is altogether insufficient; many men are retained in them a most unwarrantable time after their recovery, and it is much to be feared that many, confined in them unjustly, are unable to bear the depressing, melancholy life to which they are forced, and positively go mad.

The French are very proud of their great revolution of 1789, which overthrew so many blamable institutions of the past. Who knows but that it may not need the results of a new '89 to work a solid and salutary reform in the organization of maisons de santé, and to limit private mad-houses to their true and exclusive destination, — that of retreats for those who are really and unquestionably insane?

TOM BUTLER.

A BOY'S HERO.

IN SIX CHAPTERS. — I. THE HILL.

FOR every boy there is his hero, — a splendid, valiant, noble creature, to whom he looks up, physically. As the hero holds the smaller hand in his, and strides along, the boy admires and treasures every speech. Such a one for me was once the brave and gallant Tom Butler, who knew the world, which I did not; who could talk, could go anywhere and do anything. Yet there were not so many years between us. It was clear action that interposed the large interval. With this hero I became acquainted very early in life. He comes before me in three scenes, and the first scene was abroad in a foreign country.

At one period I see our family in France, on a hill overlooking Havre, attended by masters, watched over by that conscientious governess, Miss Simpson, while I myself was in a state of eternal protest and revolt. Never did the bright blessings — and such cheap blessings as they are! — of sun and tropical days, and balmy airs, and trees, and acres of soft grass, eddying down towards the town far below, seem so inviting. Those recollections are shaded by no dark or lowering days, no gloomy fogs, no weeks of drizzle; it was Italian, cerulean blue, pleasant green, and most inviting.

The hill, or Côte, as it was called, was an agreeable suburb, looking down on the great seaport, whose houses, docks, and stores were all clustered below, with the sea beyond. A most agreeable amphitheatre it was, and the descent was in the main by terraces and stages of steps. The ascent, under the broiling French suns, coming at the close of an important expedition to the town was a very serious and exhausting business. On the edge of the hill, I see now a sort of comb, as it were, of bright villas on the roadside, with a fine common in front. I say "fine" because adapted to boys' sport of every degree, — to fights, ball play, kite-flying, and what not. Those residences, that seem to me now like houses out of an opera, for they were always in the glare of the Havre sun, were cheerful in their yellow tone, their green jealousies, their old-fashioned air, and the luxuriant gardens behind and about them, where the apple-trees abounded, and the oranges tried to grow, but were cut off in an untimely way by organized parties of bandits. The grapes clustered about the windows so luxuriantly that they were held in low estimation as not worth pillage and inferior in quality.

More of these mansions were occupied by English colonists, — one or two by English exiles; and I recall our immediate neighbor, seen within his chateau-like gate stooping over his flowers, a Captain Butler, one sleeve of his pepper-and-salt shooting-coat growing flat to his chest. A great family swarmed about him, and there were rumors of a struggle and sore privations.

He was a grave man, haughty and reserved, and seemed then to take that curious shape of a separate potentate, as I have often remarked, endowed with more mysterious power and importance, — greater than seem to invest individuals of the real influence of a later era. Our houses did not know each other, though we were not indisposed to intimacy, — a distance, however, that did not extend to the junior branches. His son, Tom Butler, a tall English lad, thin, wiry, and pale, I looked up to with a longing admiration, — he was so independent, so grand, so strong, and went where he liked. He seemed a separate potentate, too, and could “do things,” which some way I never could. Indeed, we saw that he and the one-armed captain were not on good terms, and two of us, one day, on a guilty ascent up an apple-tree in the next garden, heard below us a frightful altercation between the two men. Peeping through the branches, — and not without misgiving lest the scene might end indirectly in our own personal detection, trial, and execution, — we saw the captain’s square face glowing with a sort of mournful and suppressed fury, and caught these memorable words: —

“You disgraced me before, sir, and you have now disgraced me again!”

We had to carry this denunciation about with us for days, nearly bursting, and not daring to reveal it to mortal, save an English maid, who could be relied on, and who shook her head and said “Like enough, — like enough!”

The English complexion of the district was certainly very strong. Not very far on was Mr. Darbyshire’s house, a charming English place, with hot-houses and greenhouses, and a real Scotch gardener, who had been there ten or fifteen years, could not pass one of the roadside crosses, or meet a procession, without his features expressing open pain and hostility. They were “a peetous crew,” he said, to the last, “the pair benighted creeturs,” and the like. He would not mix with them. His master, Mr. Darbyshire, was a wealthy merchant, in the shipping way, who had shares in the steamers between Southampton and our port, and was universally known as “M. Debbisha.” A little under the hill, with its roof on a level with its crest, was Mr. Longtail’s English academy, with its highest references, to the Reverend William Short, British chaplain; to Captain Gunter, H. B. M. Consul Quai Montpensier; to the Lord Montattic; to the Honorable Mrs. Colman; to W. H. Darbyshire, Esq., The Côte, Havre; and to many more. Mrs. Longtail looked after the boys’ linen, and “was a guarantee for the comforts of a home.” This was her husband’s fond and too partial statement, loudly dissented from by the young gentlemen, who called him old “Pig-in-the-Wind,” the origin for which extraordinary sobriquet I never discovered, nor, indeed, thought of asking. “Guarantee, indeed,” said Tom, contemptuously, “yes, guarantee, — that’s all the tea we get out of her! — and fine swash it is!” The young gentlemen wore a uniform here, gilt buttons and puce-colored cuffs and collars.

Our house, as I have said, was charming to look at, with its green jalousies and vines creeping all over, and its cool porch. The upper story took the shape of a pediment or triangle with a circular window, or hole in the middle, an apartment which I always fondly ambitioned, not for the elevation or for the view, which was fine, but for the mechanical pleasures associated with that window; for the intricacies and peculiarities were more than are usually attached to a French window. It was otherwise allotted. It commanded a full view, too, of the charming common, where all the sports went on, and where the boys of the district, pursuing their various pastimes with much cheerful noise and spirits, inflamed me — but too often detained within, as punishment for idleness — to the verge of frenzy. Then I would see — taking a furtive glance askance from the Roman history — that the gentlemanly Darbyshire boys — “young princes,” Miss Simpson held them up to us, for their genteel deportment — were playing “prisoners’ base,” or, more seductive still, flying the kite.

The advantages which residence in France was supposed to offer for educational purposes were not lost sight of. All masters available were duly “laid on,” as it were, to supplement Miss Simpson, whose very universal range of accomplishments, of course, precluded her from having a very profound acquaintance with any special branch. I think, however, she secretly rather resented this introduction, though there was an indemnity in the visits of the professors. Their variety lent a piquancy to the day’s routine.

When the young ladies received their lessons she always assisted, in right of her office. The French master’s name was M. Bernard, quite a picture semi-ecclesiastical, — with a white neckcloth, to which starch was unknown, swathed about his neck on the hottest days, and secured firmly by a hair brooch set round with imitation diamonds. I am thus particular because I had often studied him minutely. He had a long blue coat; his head was bald; he had that amiable, soft way of talking, and chirping air of general assent to everything that we see in old gentlemen on the French boards. He arrived every second day, having a few pupils on the Côte, showing the usual signs of intense heat.

To say that his knowledge of English was merely imperfect would be too indulgent a compliment, it being very much akin to the language in which the British sailor converses with the Chinese. But, with the innate gallantry of a Frenchman, he was always recognizing “Mees Seemson’s” presence, — was she not a sister, too, in his profession? — by politely taking her, as it were, into the lesson. And a favorite formula of his was, after a pinch of snuff, which he carefully brushed off the starchless neckcloth with the back of his little finger, “Mais pour ces choses là, mon enfant, Mademoiselle Seemson, vous dira tout après.” Miss Simpson always knew the meaning of this phrase, much as the native Sepoys pick up British words of command, and would smile and nod and murmur, “Wee. Je ferry! Now, Mary, attend to what Moosier Bernard says.” With the “petites dames,” it must be said, he got on excellently. There was that laudable emulation, which seems more found among girls, to have their “themes” ready, — “dictées” he called them, — besides a pride which I think was unaccountably wanting in myself and other contemporaries of my acquaintance. We only gave grudging measure, and any device was greedily seized to shirk work. He would at times lose temper, and make me a long impassioned, chateause discourse, as if he were in a pulpit. He used gestures and a variety of tones, telling me that I had a "léthargie incroyable," and also really seemed to hint that the certain and ultimate doom in store for me was an ignominious end, — I suppose the French guillotine, if my disgraceful career terminated in his country. All this I gathered from his manner more than from his words, though I was picking up French in an astonishing way, from clandestine association with what were called the "low boys" of the place. Every month M. Bernard's modest stipend was paid him, with a little solemnity and circumstance which gratified him not a little, he coming in uniform, as it were, — his Sunday coat, a genuinely starched tie, and no hair brooch, — the absence of that ornament being, strange to say, his grandest tenue. Then he was received in the drawing-room, announced by the too familiar John as "Meshev Bernard," and after the interpassage of a sealed envelope, cake and English "sherri" were introduced, — it always made him cough and me laugh, — the whole concluding with my being abruptly hurried out to a cell. He used sometimes to moralize over me in my own presence, first blowing his nose, and then looking fixedly into the handkerchief as if remarking there something quite unusual. "A ce que me parait, madame, cet enfant là a un naturel effréné qu'il faut tenir à main bride. Mais j'espère" — sip from the glass of sherri, — "que le bon Dieu, — qu'enfin les prières de sa bonne mère, &c., &c." Then seeing the consternation this denunciation caused, as it were hinting at crimes that he could not disclose, he would change his note altogether. "Poah! We must have courage, madame. He has a brave spirit. We shall make a man of him! As for the good boys, I would not give that for them. Puer bonæ indolis. Il a de l'esprit, mais il faut seulement le faire borner!"

Now I see Mr. John showing in another gentleman, the professor of music, M. Belcour, a handsome young man with long brown hair, which he tossed a good deal. To him Miss Simpson's manner was quite different, being curt and haughty to the last degree, as though she suspected him. We could not understand the motive of this, which was indeed only a frail guard for her unprotected heart. The handsome Belcour had, indeed, subdued it to his own. Not that he cared for that cheap victory, — a governess indeed! He dreamed of the great English countess, with an estate in the rich fat England, among "ces gens de bierre et puddin." He was full of sentiment, and made his dark eyes roll for practice. He used to play with frantic energy, "splashing" the notes about, as it were, with his eyes on the ceiling. He had this singularity, he would teach nothing but his own music, bringing "them little wisps o' songs," as Mr. John happily described them, a picture of a mournful young man on the title, following a flight of birds with an inexpressible look of depression. "RÊVE DE BONHEUR," it was called; and I remember the morning that he brought it, presenting it with an infinite homage and melancholy empressment to the head of the house, conveying that it had been composed expressly in her honor. He fancied, I think, that the vast estates of which he dreamed were somewhere, for there was an air of substantial comfort, not to say luxury, — wine from England, &c., — which beguiled him. Later it was discovered the Rêve de Bonheur had been presented, with a similar declaration of its production, to several ladies during the last three or four years. He was too romantic for the humble sphere he moved in; actual instruction formed a very small portion of his school of teaching, the main principle of which was to ramble in a dreamy way over the chords, to play and sing "little things of his own." When at last he was firmly remonstrated with upon this unprofitable system, he answered haughtily that, "as it seemed to him, there was a disposition to find fault?" "Well, scarcely that" — "Yes, yes, there was. Let it end, then; it was a mere slavery. He could not teach these children; they had no esprit, no emotion, — point d'âme!"

This unwarrantable attack produced quite a new tone, and a quiet dismissal; on which M. Belcour quite lost his temper, behaved like an enraged one, held out a wrist that quivered as he proclaimed that he had been treated "brutally," and quite unconsciously revealed a not too-white shirt, with very saw-like edges. He withdrew forever, but the next day sent in a charge for two francs, fifty cents, for a piece of music, which was duly sent to him. Later a mysterious story reached the house, — brought, I believe, by M. Bernard, — and which, from the secrecy and awful looks, we concluded was nothing less than Housebreaking, or a great case of Arson; but I believe the real truth was, that the music-publisher's wife, — ahem! — "ce pauvre Schneider!" said M. Bernard, — which must have referred to an elopement of some description.

M. Belcour's successor was quite a different sort of man, a half German, Weimar by name, stout, red-faced, yellow-haired, and lame. He always seemed to be fragrant of cherry-brandy; not that I had made acquaintance yet with that agreeable liquor, but it seemed to have an air of familiarity. He sometimes indirectly apologized for introducing that aroma, laying it on "the heat of the day." He was a great professor, in heavy practice, and had the duty of teaching three times a week, at contract price, the young ladies of a convent close by. This simple fact accounted for the almost malignant hostility of Belcour, whom the thought of the various young English heiresses there pursuing their education, inflamed to madness. M. Weimar was a true anchorite, and cared only for his piano, after, of course, his well-known Harmonies Pratiques, a vast work, of which he had done only the first number, and in which he intended to give specimens of modulations from every known key into every other. This, on the doctrine of permutation, involved a vast amount of paper and notes, and he had only ventured on what he called "mon premier cahier." I confess I was delighted with this specimen of harmony; for there was in my abandoned nature this redeeming point, an intense love of music, and of harmonies and modulations. Here was a new realm; and while he showed, with skilful touch, how to pass from the key of A minor into C, by some skilful but exquisite transitions, I would steal up and listen, rapt. (We had subscribed for two copies of the work, and I am looking at them now.) He had never noticed me, as being quite out of his world, as it might be a stringless and bridgeless violin; but one day when he came, as usual very warm, and found me, all unconscious, sitting at the piano, with his Harmonies Pratiques open before me, and striving desperately to work from A minor into C, he entered softly, and, it may be, recognizing a blending chord, called out, "C sharp, boy!" He thrust one large hand over mine, and crashed down the right notes. "What do you know?" he said; "have you learned? Surely that Simpson —"

"No," I said; "but, O sir, this is so beautiful!"

After that, though he did not like strangers in the room, he would often say, —

"Let him stay."

I see him now, sitting at one side, — the juvenile player he was instructing with her face anxiously put close to the music, the small hands jerking spasmodically, grasshopperlike, — his round figure, in a snuff-brown coat (and some cheap Order too), stooped inwards, while his pencil pointed laboriously, and head emphasized his movements. Of a sudden he had unconsciously pushed himself into the place, and had played it off in a bold, rattling style. With Miss Simpson he was not at all popular, for to her he was blunt and gruff in his manner, being sure, if any one came in with a message to her, to turn round and call out sharply, "Do keep silence, please! How can I teach if that is to go on?"

"Really so ungentlemanlike in his tone," Miss Simpson would protest. "I don't know where he can have been brought up."

This feeling, too, was owing to another reason; for at an early period of his tuition he had said despotically, "Tell me who is to look after these children and see that they practise all that I shall drill them in?"

"O, Miss Simpson, of course, — she plays very nicely herself."

"What does she play? Then here, mademoiselle, sit down, — let us have your cheval de bataille, please."

Miss Simpson shrank away. She had a horse of battle, Through the Wood, a popular air of her day, much sung at Exeter, her natal town, and arranged with variations, — six, I believe, — by the ingenious Hertz. "O, really, sir!" she began.

"Just as you please," he said, turning away; "it was for the interest of the pupils I asked."

Scandalized authority had now to intervene: "Miss Simpson, I must request you will be kind enough to let M. Weimar hear you."

She went to the instrument. It was a fine piece, no doubt, — Introduction Maestoso, with sixteen pages to follow. She had barely struck the first two solemn chords, and had launched into the little gallopade up the piano, which always follows, when he quietly turned away: —

"That will do," he said. "Thank you, — quite enough. I see perfectly. So you waste your time on that stuff? Now if I teach mademoiselle, and am to make a player of her, I must lay down this fixed rule: that no one interferes or touches the piano when I am absent, by way of example. Does madame agree?" Of course madame had to agree, impressed with this sort of Abernethy plainness. "After all, you know he had the interests of the child at stake." Miss Simpson never forgave.

So he came and labored, often staying three quarters beyond his stipulated hour, laboring, grinding, scolding, at times with a severity that brought tears to eyes; forcing those small fingers through the heavy loam of the great John Field's Concerto in B, still surly, still reeking of the cherry brandy, until at last he had performed his promise, and made a player of his pupil. He must be long since gathered into the Havre earth, for he was then elderly; and I dare say it troubled his last moments to think he had not got beyond the opening number of his grand work, the Harmonies Pratiques.

II. — THE FIGHT.

Besides our English juvenile colony, there was another class who frequented the common to pursue their pastimes. These were the usual type of blue-frocked, pale-faced French lads, who made an immense deal of noise and chattered as they pursued their rather feminine amusements. The feeling between the nations was anything but cordial, and we deeply resented their coming on the same ground with us at all. This was a little unreasonable, as their title to their own soil might — on the construction of the law of nations — be considered higher than ours. We noticed that they kissed each other when they met, — a proceeding received with shouts of derisive laughter from our side. If one of them was touched by the stroke of a ball, or fell down and scraped himself, or if, as Tom put it, "you held up your little finger," he forthwith began to cry. Tom himself protested, and there was no reason to doubt him, that when on one occasion he had slapped the face of one who had been impertinent, the creature had spat, — yes, spat, and jabbered at him like a monkey. Indeed, Tom's contempt for them knew no bounds. He despised the French, he said; "We licked them at Waterloo, and if they have the courage, sir, to give us the chance again, we'll lick 'em once more."

Once, M. Bernard was coming along across the common, reading, and passed by just as Tom was in the middle of some such declaration, "I hate the French!" M. Bernard stopped and accosted me, making me color, for I knew there was a loss of caste in thus having a "French fellow" over me.

"Well, my little friend," he said, "I will expect you by and by. Good morning, Mr. Bootlair!"

"O, good morning," said Tom, carelessly.

"So you dislike the French?"

"Well, since you put the question to me," said Tom, promptly, "I really do."

"And yet, is not that unreasonable?" said the teacher, gravely. "Your father, I know, does not. Do they not give you shelter and asylum —"

"Which we pay for," said Tom, scornfully. "Much obliged to 'em."

"Which you pay for," repeated M. Bernard, with his eyes fixed on him, — "which you pay for, as you say." There was a delicate sarcasm in his tone quite unintelligible to us. "Your father finds every one here good-natured, indulgent, patient. He does not complain of them; I will expect you, my young friend, in five minutes."

Tom did not answer till he had gone, and then did so with infinite heat and impetuosity.

"A mean, glib, beggarly pedagogue! What right has he to speak to me at all? Who wants anything of him? I'd thrash him and fifty like him one after the other!"

This was Tom's invariable test of merit; any one that he could thrash, or proclaimed he would thrash, being a poor, mean, unworthy impostor. I merely mention this incident to show that the tone of the public mind was not by any means a healthy one. On our side, we had really come to believe that we did do these "beggarly" Frenchmen — and observe the exquisite propriety of this word "beggarly," as coming from some of our community, whom it certainly fitted far more appropriately — a great honor by dwelling in their un-English land, and by putting up with their eccentric and, to us, unsuitable ways and habits. This was Tom Butler's favorite theme. To use his own phrase, "he never let a point go"; and even as he passed a French youth, his head in the air, his long arms swinging, his fair face thrown back, there was this contemptuous air of challenge, and a smile of amusement, as it were, at something exquisitely ludicrous in the very existence—apart from dress and bearing—of a French boy.

"God bless us!" he would say, addressing us oratorically, his back against the white wooden rail which ran round the common. "What are they like at all? Half babies, half girls? Girls! Why, one of our dear English girls at home would have more spirit in her little finger than all this canaille put together. She would n't exactly cry if you held up your little finger!"

On what Tom founded this favorite image of his where he had so held up his little finger, and who had cried at that exhibition, we were never told. But we firmly believed that some such incident had taken place.

Now a word or two about the "rabble." Stretching to the back of our villas was a level country or table-land a good deal covered with orchards, and behind the orchards a very slender village, a dozen cottages or so. The inhabitants, of course, depended on the sale or manufacture of what Tom contemptuously styled "their eternal apples," either in the shape of cider, or, as the same authority explained to us, that "filthy mess of squash," we saw in open tubs at shop doors under the nets full of peg-tops. The boys who were our enemies were the boys of this little community. One or two of their sires were Huguenots, and I recall our Mr. John standing in easy conversation with a grim covenant-looking figure who was at the door of his cottage. Mr. John seemed to look on it as a sort of lusus, and often told the anecdote. It was a Sunday. He was lying against the door, resting himself, with the pipe in his mouth. "Vous ally Legleeze," says I. "No, no," says he, taking the pipe out; "moa Protestong." "Well, well," says I, "after that—" "Wee wee," says he, "moa Protestong!"

The boys of this district cherished the same feelings to us that we did to them. Of a Sunday was our opportunity, when their parents were away at the church, or some little fair, or junketing. Then we would repair, a small band of irregulars, cautiously and secretly, one by one, some of us creeping along on our stomachs in imitation of what we had heard was real "skirmishing practice." Then the fun began, and nothing more exciting could be conceived,—the shooting, the hitting, the "cutting out," even the roar of agony,—as a hard apple launched from Tom's unerring hand, landed on a French cheekbone, and was cloven into fragments. So the exciting sport went on, we, of course, having the best of it, and gradually driving the enemy out of cover and out of reach of ammunition. As we advanced, pouring in our shot like hail, they were pressed back into the cover, and fairly fled, while we showed ourselves and shouted. We had at least two such victories, but on the third occasion something occurred which led to a change of fortune.

There was a cooper who made casks for the apples, and this cooper had a tall son, a head, at least, over Tom, and whose name was Leah. From this circumstance, I suspect, he was connected with the old "moa Protestong" of our Mr. John, or was perhaps the actual son of the grim Huguenot. This I never learned. This Leah, the son, had only returned home on the preceding Saturday, and was new to the parish. During the heat of the conflict a young recruit had been struck down by a large baking apple. He ran crying into a house, whence he emerged in a few moments with Leah. We were a little surprised at this reinforcement,—his size, apparent strength, indifference. In a moment he was at work, sending his missiles with a short, quick, and steady fire, that upset all our calculations. He advanced, too, instead of keeping under shelter. It must be owned that we were thrown into confusion, but it was all from the surprise. Some said it was a man. At the same time the fathers of the village, with the old Huguenot himself, began to make their appearance. It was time to retire. As one of us remarked, "We had done all we had wanted." As we drew off, Leah made a low gesture of contempt and defiance, such as an Indian would do in derision of his foes. He then walked into his hut, to renew the sleep which, I suppose, we had interrupted.

Tom was quite excited about this. "That's my man," he said. "Wait for another Sunday, my buttercups, and you shall see." That other Sunday came, but Leah did not appear. Meanwhile another event took place, which contributed a good deal to the catastrophe.

Down below in the town there was to be a little festival, or gala, associated with I know not what, but among other pastimes it was determined there should be A REGATTA. Les yachtsmen were all invited, and did not come, but some English sailors from the Southampton steamer had entered for the rowing races. International courtesies, or contests, were then not at all in fashion; there was no entente cordiale, or steady, jog-trot alliance, which now exists. The thing was quite a novelty, and caused a sensation. Frenchmen's eyes flashed fire as they talked of it, but they were uneasy. There would be something unfair, they were certain. No one laughed so loud as Tom. "They row!" he said, "the poor weak fools! why, one of our tars would beat them with his left hand tied behind his back!"

Without going so far as this, there was a certain impression in the colony on the hill that victory would be with our countrymen; and on the morning of the struggle the Côte was crowded with people having old glasses and telescopes, and all eagerly looking down to the blue sea below Honfleur. The blouses gathered behind, gesticulating and chattering, their eyes darting fire and hostility at the English. Tom was in a real excitement, his father's old spyglass under his arm, and striding about as if he were captain of a ship.

The race was duly rowed. We could see the four boats—four faint dots—far below on the blue sea, a Paris dot, a Rouen one, a Havre dot, and an English one,—the glorious scarlet!

"Six as fine of our tars, sir," said Tom, the glass to his eye, "with their iron muscles, as ever you saw!"

Three minutes did the work. One boat gradually drawing yards, then furlongs, ahead. At the end of the boat was a little faint patch of red. Tom actually threw his spyglass into the air.

"Old England forever, boys! Give 'em a British cheer, lads! I knew we'd lick 'em!"

And we all raised a shout, and from the windows of the English villas, where the ladies were, fluttered white pocket-handkerchiefs. The looks of the Frenchmen were black as night.

Mr. John, who rarely missed anything "sporting," had gone down into the town to see the race as a gentlemanly spectator. Of course he got into the best place on board an English steamer, having made an intimate acquaintance with the steward. He brought back strange stories of the excitement.

"Well, well, well! mod'ee! mod'ee!" (A shape in his dialect for "Mon Dieu!") "O the creatures! It was skandalous how they were treated; the hustlin', and then the beatin', and then the crowd,—forty-five thousand people, no less, round the creatures. O, it was shocking! A regular E-mute!"

This we did not understand for a long time, for it was a new word, and he was pleased with it, and repeated it with great satisfaction, "th' mute." More careful consideration helped us to his meaning; yet it was too gentle a name, for Tom Butler had the whole particulars, which he relates to us in boxing language. The cowardly French had made a brutal attack on our brave tars, and had beaten them,—a great mob. The "brave tars" had put their backs against a wall, and had thrashed and smashed right and left, knocking over the cowardly sneaks, and pounding and maiming them on good old English principles.

"But they were too many for them," went on Tom, in a glowing indignation. "An Englishman is a match for half a dozen Frenchmen easy; but not for a thousand. And only fancy the scoundrels,—they draw their penknives, and get behind the brave fellows, and stab them in the back. That's manly,—that's brave! Ain't it?"

Tom made many harangues that day to various audiences, and within hearing, whenever he could manage it, of various natives of the country,—a French gentleman or two, who only smiled and passed on. Once the great Leah went by, fiercely gesticulating, stooping down to his friend, and describing with infinite animation. He had been down to see the contest, and was clearly enjoying the retribution that had overtaken the vile English. Tom raised his voice, threw more scorn in, and said very proudly, and with insufferable offensiveness, "We shall have to give 'em WATERLOO over again!"

It was like galvanism. The two French youths twitched and started, their eyes became bloodshot; they turned back, and Tom, scenting battle, repeated his phrase, with the talismanic word. Leah came striding up, his eyes bloodshot, his arms going, his blouse actually trembling. There was, indeed, something going to happen, and we all held our breath. Tom waited for him, his lips curling, his breath getting a little short, his fingers unconsciously clinched into appropriate fighting shape. The two Frenchmen came on, and at once poured out a volley of ferocious vituperation utterly unintelligible, Leah swaying his arms, putting his chest close to Tom's, and his mouth close to Tom's,—("Anything like his rank garlic breath you never!" said Tom),—and chattering all the time; his head over Tom's, who remained quite calm, never stirred or retreated an inch. "But I was ready for him all the time, and at the first motion would have had my fist smash on his face." At that moment one of the gendarmes, whom I have never seen since those days, save in Robert Macaire, where I feel kindly to them, like old friends of childhood, came lounging leisurely down. He was the one peace officer of the district, and was really as resplendent as white and yellow braid could make him. This official had reasons for being specially wary on this occasion, and came down to us, on which the crowd dispersed and Mr. Leah "drew off," talking very loud, and banging down his arm, and addressing an imaginary audience.

"I thought he meant nothing," said Tom, "all wind and froth: just like 'em all round. He's double my weight," added Tom, addressing a real audience in his impetuosity, "and a head over me; but I am to be found anywhere, at any time. And that Jack-in-the-box"—so he contemptuously alluded to the gendarme—"can tell him he knows me." Wonderful creature, Tom; so much at home in the world, brave, gallant, insolent perhaps, but certainly wonderful. "I tell you what," went on Tom, hastily, "we'll do something to take down the conceit of these frog-eaters. Let us show them what we are made of, and that we are not ashamed of our country. We'll have a procession, boys, and hoist the British flag, in honor of the day."

At the time we thought this was merely fine and figurative language, like the "nailing to the mast," which so often followed,—an operation even then familiar to us. A British flag could not be had nearer than the Southampton packet. But we did not know what Tom, as he himself assured us, could do "when he was excited." We were delighted at something coming, something to look forward to, and waited anxiously for the hour appointed.

It was one of the fine summer evenings,—cheap here from their very plenty,—soft and fragrant, with the light lasting till past ten o'clock, and no cloudy night. At nine the common re-echoed with the cheerful notes of talk and laughter; and along the roadside down to the right, where the high road joined, and the trees set in and made an avenue, and the lamps hung across from a string, various of the natives sauntered by, talking over the day. There was a pleasant lull abroad. Suddenly Tom appeared among us, emerging from the prison-like gate hurriedly.

"Another row with the governor," he said, "but I would n't fail. Here we are," and to our wondering eyes produced what seemed a little counterfeited union-jack! "I got Victorine to make it, and gave her instructions myself. Bless you! I know the colors by heart. Now, boys, fall in, I say."

Clearly some great "fun" was coming, and we did as we were bid, and fell in. We started in a sort of procession, marshalled by Tom. He walked at the head. A few loungers stopped to look, and wondered, I suppose. But when the glorious "Jack" was unfurled, carried by Tom in person, they understood perfectly. "There," he said, "there could be no mistake." At fixed points we were ordered to halt and cheer, which we did with a will. A few squibs, purchased at a sou a piece for the occasion, gave quite the air of a feu-de-joie. Naturally this excited attention. Suddenly a little English lad calls out,—

"But I say, Tom, the orchard fellows are coming!" And, looking in that direction, we saw about a dozen of the blouses running out from the apple-trees.

"Halt!" cried Tom. "Steady, lads!" We drew up in a line. We assumed by instinct that their errand must be hostile. Were they not our natural enemies? And, as they came on, another called out, "And, Tom, I say, there's that Leah!"

Tom looked out curiously, shading his eyes, and said, "I knew when they saw the Jack—" He was not at all familiar with the sacred volume, or he would have said that the Lord had delivered the Frenchman into his hands. As it was, I recollect some expression answering to the sentiment came into his face.

The "fellows" came on, gesticulating and chattering, Tom at once stepping in front and waving his flag to them in cheerful encouragement. It really had the effect of scarlet on a bull, and Leah—foaming at the mouth like such a steer, sputtering awful consonants, in which the sound of "s'cray!" and "tz!" were conspicuous—strode up close, and made a grasp at our ensign.

Tom spoke French well, put his hand on Mr. Leah's chest, and said sharply, "Stand back! Que voulez-vous!"

The answer was unintelligible. But in a moment we heard him speaking very fast and fiercely, and Tom answered very lightly and slowly,—

"With all my heart! Make a ring, boys. I am going to thrash this fellow."

In a moment the ring was made, the blues on one side, the blacks on the other; the "gentlemen" one way, the plebeians the other. Tom would not take off his coat, though invited to do so. He merely buttoned it tight. The Frenchman threw off his blouse, and appeared in his waistcoat. He had a broad chest, a strong arm, and the usual tendency of most young Frenchmen to fullness below. Tom's was a narrow, wiry chest, slight arms, a slighter throat, and a pale, delicate face. He was a little overgrown, and surveyed his opponent smiling.

Many years later, seeing a piece called the Floating Beacon, in which a combat takes place on the deck of a vessel between the atrocious captain of the craft and a guileless passenger,—the way in which the abandoned captain prepared himself for the combat, his starts, his drawing back, his advance on one leg, his gaunt spasms of preparations,—all suggested something familiar. It soon took the shape of Mr. Leah, who tried his wrists, had them tried by others, whispered his friends, and was whispered by them. We did not know till later that Mr. Leah was a man of reputation in le boxe. Tom remained quite quiet, smiling, while these preparations were being made.

I never shall forget the way that Frenchman came on. It struck us with something as like horror as with astonishment. For, advancing as if on the ordinary system, he suddenly dropped his head, and, with his bullet-like os frontis, drove straight at Tom's middle. The shock was tremendous, and it sent the blood up into Tom's pale face. Then the struggle began. The savage, strong arms were wound tightly round Tom's slender limbs, Leah striving to heave him off his legs and go with him to the ground, where, as we all knew, he would bite, and kick, and stamp at his fallen foe,—all fair in the French mode of fighting. Such, at least, was our belief. But Tom, though taken by surprise, contrived a clever trip,—he was from Cumberland,—and, while the native was thus unsupported, gave him a desperate heave over to one side, and shook himself free. The savage looked wildly and thirsting for blood, as we thought, and a little scared.

"Now, boys, see how I'll match him this time and his wild Indian tricks!"

hard from his incipient corpulence, was crouched down like a tiger about to spring. He came on as he had done before; but Tom received the bullet-head in the part he had received it before, and having got it there, we saw with delight the splendid reception it met with. He had the round, coarse head, and a shower of blows rained on it—rained on the ear, on the cheekbones—four times. The delicate fists worked as if by steam-power,—the Frenchman had unwittingly placed his own head "in Chancery," a distinction other pugilists are most anxious to avoid. We roared and cheered with delight as the combatants went round and round, Tom's fists going up and down like a piston, smashing, pounding, battering, until at last the wretched Frenchman had to abandon his strategy, and raise a blazing, flaming, mauled face, all stripes and welts, from the place into which it had been thrust. Then Tom saw his opportunity, and following the great Duke's tactics towards the close of the ever-glorious day at Waterloo, rushed at the face which was lifted and came on him with a crushing "left-hander." It was "Up, Guards, and at 'em!" now. Then he came on with the right, and Leah staggered and reeled back. The combat was virtually over. The great Leah was defeated, and defeated forever!

That splendid victory of the British arms was long remembered. The French power was utterly humiliated. They never rallied. We might turn into their orchards for challenge or even plunder, but they never showed. Alas! the hero of that glorious day had but a short time to enjoy his glory. One morning some strange men were seen at the captain's gate, striving, it would seem, to get in, and rattling it savagely. Some of the English experienced in such matters said, "Bailliffs, of course!" It was not, of course; it was the landlord of the premises. The one-armed captain had gone in the night with his family. The English steamer sailed at midnight. The French were "done," as they have been done so often since.

THE WONDERFUL ADVENTURE OF CAPTAIN POTTS.

I WAS fishing the V—one cold day in March. To stand up to one's hips in water on such a day, wielding one's rod with benumbed fingers, shows one an enthusiastic lover of the gentle art. And such I was, and for once had got hold of a good time. The water was just the right height and color, the wind was cold, but not too cold for the trout, and blowing down the stream, raising a nice curl on the water, but not strong enough to prevent my throwing my fly right in the teeth of it. I was fishing up the river from Glandwy, and at every other cast I rose a good fish and generally brought him to basket. After three o'clock they rose no more, and whip as I would I could not stir a fin. I was not sorry then, when the next reach of the river brought me in view of the handsome stone bridge which spanned the V—, and which I knew carried the high-road which led to the market town of Llanywm. Thereupon I emerged on to dry land, and taking off my wading boots and flinging them over my shoulder, lit my pipe and started at a smart pace on my way to Llanywm. I was very tired, but very happy, for I had a good basket of fish, and, my opportunities of fishing being rare, I appreciated my luck accordingly. After walking about a mile, the gloom of evening drawing on and the hills seeming to close in upon me in mysterious shadows, I heard behind me the beat of hoofs and the rattle of wheels, and presently overtook me a spanking mare, drawing a dogcart, wherein was seated a jolly-looking man, with broad, good-humored face, wearing a brown great-coat. He pulled the mare up sharp and shouted out, "If you are going to Llanym I'll give you a lift!" Nothing loath, I scrambled into the dogcart, whilst the mare executed a pas seul on her hind legs, and away we went. We were soon at Llanym, a neutral-tinted Welsh village, consisting of a long straggling street of hovels, a big hotel, the Prince Llewellyn, jutting out into the middle thereof, a rugged little church, a dozen public-houses, and half a dozen dissenting chapels. At the Prince Llewellyn my friend pulled up. "Come and have some beer! The home-brewed is capital." "Dan glassiaa da cwrw, Annie, darling," to the pretty Cambrian waitress. The beer really was good; we drank to our respective healths after the kindly Celtic fashion, and struck up a friendship cemented by other two glasses of "cwrw."

We agreed to dine together at six, and whilst my friend, whose name I found was Roberts, went to transact his business, I took a stroll round the town and called upon the local flymaker, fisherman, and barber, to talk over the fishing and lay in a stock of flies. I found myself at six with an excellent appetite at the Prince Llewellyn. Mr. Roberts was punctual, and we did justice to the broiled trout, saddle of Welsh mutton, and grilled chicken, which formed our repast, washed down by famous home-brewed ale. Dinner finished, there being no other guests in the coffee-room, we lit our pipes, brewed some whiskey-punch, and began to talk of fish over the fire.

Roberts, I found, was a thorough fisherman and naturalist, and keen sportsman. We discussed the merits of "all the streams which flow in Wales, of all the flies which cock their tails," till we finished sundry tumblers of punch.

"Do you know," said Roberts, "you remind me of a friend of mine so much, I really thought you were the very man when I came up to you on the road. Potts his name was, — Captain Potts, — he was a London man; perhaps you know him?" "No, I did n't know him." "Ah! he was one of the Pottses who smashed so awfully some years ago," said my friend, indulging himself with a loud guffaw at his joke. "You remember the great failure of Potts, Pumpkins, and Cope, the bankers, of course? Well, this Potts was a nephew of old Potts, — Sir Tin Potts, you know. I knew nothing of this though, when I first met young Potts. I met him on the river fishing. He was a good fisherman; but you Englishmen don't often do much on our rivers, and then you go home and say there are no fish in them. Well, I gave him some wrinkles, which he profited by, and we got to be fast friends. We've nothing to do, so draw up to the fire, and I'll tell you a story about Potts and myself. I always call it 'the merciful dealing of Providence with John Roberts.' You shall hear: —

"I lived in this town some ten years ago. I had just married, and had lately commenced practice as a solicitor. I had been articled here, spending the last year of my time in London with Fudge and Frizzleum, of Lincoln's Inn, — a great Chancery and agency firm, as I dare say you know. My old master, John Jones, was just dead, and I thought there was a good opening here. But I did n't find business come in so fast. You see there is n't much litigation in these parts. The big swells are in the hands of their London lawyers, and if a poor freeholder wants a bit of money, he'll borrow it on a note of hand from a neighbor, without a regular mortgage-deed, and it is n't often that any land changes hands; and then I was the only lawyer in the place, and that was against me. Still, I had all there was to be got. I was clerk to the magistrates, clerk to the highway, clerk to the commissioners of this or that; but these things, although they sound large, don't bring in much. Well, what with furnishing my house and office, and so on, I'd spent the little money I'd got, and had to borrow some; still, I knew I should come right in time, and my wife, though young, was a capital manager, and would make a crown go as far as a pound.

"However, I was very much pleased when my eighteenth cousin, Watkins Williams Watkins, a man who had always been very friendly to me in a haughty, distant sort of way, commanded my attendance at Wyddyllum Castle. He told me that Her Majesty had insisted on his accepting the onerous but dignified post of High Sheriff of the county, and that he, W. W. W., had graciously determined to appoint me his under-sheriff. He was also pleased to invite me to luncheon, and amongst the distinguished party at the Castle I found an acquaintance, Captain Potts, who, with Lady Laura Potts, his wife, was on a visit there. Potts was not one of those fellows who are devilishly friendly by the river-side and deuced cold in society. He came forward at once to claim my acquaintance, and introduced me to Lady Laura, a delightful little woman, a regular little fairy, with such tiny hands and feet, and little nez retroussé, and sparkling eyes, and such a smile! She made a slave of me at once (of course subject to my allegiance to my Mary Jane). I went home much pleased at my reception and at the appointment I had received; not that it was worth very much in itself, but it gave one a sort of standing, and was an opening.

My relative did n't, however, forget to call upon me to find two sureties in a thousand pounds each, to indemnify him against any action that might be brought against him. It was the usual thing. One of my sureties was my poor old father, who was then living in a little cottage near Llandolwen. He had n't much more than fifty pounds a year to live upon, so you may judge that the loss of a thousand pounds would have made a pretty good hole in his income. The other surety was an old gentleman who had always been very kind to me, and who had accumulated a little money in a long life of thrift and industry; he'd travelled for Jones and Brown, of Manchester, for thirty years. I never dreamed of such a thing as their being called upon to pay anything for me, — never. It was a mere form, I thought, and so I told them. I'd not much to do as under-sheriff for some time. There were only a few levies, which were paid out, and which put a few pounds into my pocket; but I was in great force at the assizes. I was in much request amongst the ladies to get them places in court, and when the Judge, whom I recollected as a leading Q. C. when I was finishing in London, and whom I had met at consultations sometimes, condescended to have a chat with me, and asked to be presented to Mary Jane, I felt as if I had attained to a considerable elevation. After the Spring Assizes I had a little leisure. It was one of the best fishing seasons I ever remember, and I used to be on the river every day, and every day I would meet Potts. We became great friends, and Potts would often come up to my house and have a smoke and a glass of grog.

"I was much annoyed, then, when one Tuesday morning's post brought down a ca. sa. from my agent's, indorsed by the firm of Moses and Mosheim, commanding me to take the body of one Bellingham Billingsgate Potts and bring him before Her Majesty's Court of Exchequer. And I was to have met Potts this very afternoon! Duty is duty, and I could n't think of giving poor Potts any warning of the danger which threatened him. I sent for the two dumbailiffs who did the few jobs that occurred in our part of the country. I explained to them what they had to do, and they seemed pleased with the work. Had it been one of their own countrymen who was in the mess, they would have undertaken the business with reluctance, but, the victim being an Englishman, they seemed to like it. I felt like a despicable scoundrel as I sent these men out to track and make a prisoner of a man whom I had come to look upon as a friend. To my horror, five minutes after I had dismissed the men, Potts himself put in his head through my office doorway.

"'Hullo, Roberts!' he cried; 'busy as usual, old fellow! May I come in?'

"My presence of mind forsook me; I could only gasp for breath and point to the door. Potts came in, alarmed, — 'What on earth is the matter?' Just then the two bums, who had traced Potts to my office, bounced in and seized Potts on each side very roughly, almost tearing the coat off his back. But Potts was as nimble as an eel. He drove his elbow into the long man's stomach and doubled him up in an instant, and he let fly his right into the face of little Jones, sending him spinning across the room. There were two doors opening into my office: one led to the outer or clerk's office, the other, opposite, opened directly into a little back street. This latter was usually kept locked, and the key hung on a nail close to my desk. By this door Potts and I had often made our way to the Prince Llewellyn for our morning beer. Potts consequently knew well where the key was to be found, and saw in a moment the way of escape. The same idea flashed into my mind at the same instant. Ought I to have remained passive and let him escape? Should n't I have acted negligently and dishonestly in my office had I done so? I don't know now what I ought to have done; and although all the pros and cons darted through my brain whilst Potts took a single step across the room, yet I don't think it was from any conscious sense of right or wrong, but from a sort of professional instinct, a kind of spiderish feeling, that I seized the key and put it in my pocket. Potts gave me a look of scorn and reproach, and then, putting his hands into his pockets, leaned back against the mantelshelf and laughed.

"Are you all gone mad? What's the meaning of this?'

"'It means, Captain Potts,' said I, feeling smaller than I had ever done in my life before, 'that these men have a warrant for your apprehension for a debt of — how much? — a hundred and twenty pounds and costs.'

"'Why did n't you say so before,' said the Captain, 'instead of setting your ban-dogs upon me? It would have saved your red-headed friend a pain in his inside. Well, of course it's your business to do such dirty work. I'm sorry, though, I've hurt these men of yours. Here! take a half a crown apiece, you fellows!'

"'Well, indeed!' said Jones, 'I like you very much! Diolch vawr!'

"Williams ceased to rub his damaged bread-basket, looked suspiciously at the coin, and then pocketed it with a grunt.

"'So it's Moses and Mosheim who've put me into this hole! Well, I have n't the money, and I don't know how to get it; how long can you give me?'

"'Well, you can stop at the Prince Llewellyn to-night; you'd better go on there now with the men, and I'll come up and talk matters over by and by.'

"Potts went out, attended by his keepers, and he'd hardly left the office before I received a card, — 'Mr. Braham, Moses and Mosheim.' A sallow young man, much bejewelled and with very dirty hands, was shown in to me. He had come up by the night mail to Chester, and posted on. I fancy he came to see that the ca. sa. was properly executed. He ascertained that the capture had been made, and lodged detainers to the amount of fifteen hundred and twenty pounds eighteen shillings and sixpence. I recollect the figures well; never shall I forget them. I sent the brute off, and had scarcely got rid of him before Lady Laura Potts was announced. Poor little thing! how lovely she looked! But in such distress! She'd brought all her jewels, bracelets, rings, gold watch, diamond necklace, lots of things, — worth two or three hundred pounds, I dare say.

"'O Mr. Roberts,' she said, 'can't you take these things as security, and let my dear husband go?'

"'Lady Laura,' I said, 'if it were only a few hundred pounds I'd take his undertaking for it in a minute, and arrange for his release, but I'm sorry to say here are detainers for fifteen hundred pounds or more.'

"Then, poor lady, she began to cry.

"Could n't I enter into some compromise? she'd £150 a year of her own; would n't I take the money in fifteen yearly instalments of £100?

"I explained to her that I had no power to make any arrangement, she must go to the creditors; but I advised her strongly not to alienate or dissipate her own property in any way, but to let her husband 'take the benefit of the Act.'

"She was a sensible little woman, and saw my advice was good; she dried her eyes, packed up her jewels, and I was just opening the door for her when I was almost knocked down by John Jones, who rushed into the office looking like a ghost.

"'He's gone!' he cried in Welch. 'We've lost him!'

"Leaving her ladyship to find her own way out, I ran bareheaded into the street and on to the Prince Llewellyn. The bird had flown indeed. Red-headed William stood at the door gaping and staring at the roof as if he thought Potts were a bird. The men had left him in his own room for a minute, mounting guard with the door half open, and when they entered it again he was gone. The window was open, and there was an iron water-pipe running down the wall close by. He must have slid down this and got away. No one had seen him; not a trace of him, not a vestige, not a fragment of a clew could we find. I set the police to work. They had no business to interfere, of course, as it was n't a criminal case, but I was Clerk to the Magistrates, and in the country the powers of the police are elastic. Potts had lodged in a cottage near the river half a mile from the town; he might have found his way there. I set a man to watch the house at a distance, sent off a policeman on horseback to the station, some six miles off, to watch every train. But I had little hope of finding him again. He knew the country well, had a good start, and would probably strike across the mountains to Wigwille, in the adjoining county, where he might laugh at my beard.

No sooner did this thought strike me than I determined to follow that track myself, and I started off at the rate of about six miles an hour. It was a hot, breezeless May day, the first day of summer; what with the heat and the turbulence of mind in which I was, I arrived at the top of the pass, some 1,500 feet above the sea-level, quite exhausted. I flung myself down on the top of a rock, the highest point overhanging the foot-path below, and followed with my eye the track, which I could trace for miles, to where it crossed the border of the county. There was n't a living soul upon it. In the great hush and hum of that sultry summer afternoon, as I lay amongst the heather, my soul cried out with the bitterness of death upon it. I was ruined, root and branch. For every penny of those sixteen hundred odd pounds I was personally liable. No matter that Potts was n't worth a penny, and that he had only been captured as a means of extorting money from his friends. That made no difference in the eye of the law; I had done no wrong, had hardly been imprudent, and yet I was ruined, and all my people. My poor old father would probably end his days in the workhouse. My friend who had lent me his name would have to take to the road again for bare subsistence. I might become bankrupt and get a clerkship afterwards; but had I the heart to begin life again with such a load upon me? Would n't it be better for me to end my misery and perplexity by rolling off this sloping bank into the great chasm below?

"Then I thought of Mary Jane, and how she would wait and wait, and how gradually, from impatience, she would come to uneasiness, and from uneasiness to terror; and how she would spend the night in sorrow, and the morning would bring no joy; and how the whisper would go round the town 'They've found the body!' and, oh! how hard on the poor creature, only six months a wife!

"No, I could never be such a coward! God knows I could n't have done it; but in great trouble strange thoughts surge in your brain.

"I felt better after a while, and a gentle breeze sprung up and cooled my burning temples, and I heard the bleating of the lambs, and the bark of the shepherd's dog, and the call of his master far away on the hillside. At all events, I had n't to pay the sixteen hundred pounds that night; I would crawl home, and perhaps I could think of some plan for staving off ruin to-morrow.

"Well, I got home, and remember that Mary Jane pitched into me awfully because I was an hour late for dinner, and everything was spoilt, she said. I took a couple of glasses of brandy after dinner, and that steadied my nerves, and I could think.

"I would go up to London to-morrow and try to compromise with my creditors. I could, perhaps, by the sale of all I had, and by borrowing on my life policy, make up £500.

"I could offer this, and as it was five hundred times as much as they would have got out of Potts, surely they would take it and cry quits!

"Of course, Mary Jane had heard of Potts's escape, and she made me very savage by expressing her delight at the event. She did n't know how nearly it concerned her, poor thing! and I did n't tell her. I only said I had business in London next day, and asked her to pack my travelling-bag. I went up by the night train, and a wretched journey I had. Next morning I went to find Moses and Mosheim, who had chambers somewhere up a little court or square out of Bishopsgate Street. 'Mr. Moses was n't in,' the clerk said. 'Did n't know if Mr. Mosheim were, would take my card and see.' — 'Yes; he was in, and would see me by and by.' I sat down and waited in the dingy office, feeling the indignity of my position in having to wait at all for such a man. Professional pride made me look upon Mosheim with the feeling a Brahmin might have for a Pariah. There are lawyers and lawyers you know. I had graduated with a high-caste firm. Fudge would never have acknowledged the existence of such a firm as Moses and Co. Frizzleum, who would sometimes have to meet such creatures on behalf of some of his great clients' sons or relatives would treat them with the coldest insolence of which he was capable.

"There I was, however, a suppliant before these Shylocks!

"Mosheim was a dark, rather gentlemanly man, very neatly dressed. But for his curly hair and big nose, you'd have thought him a Christian. He pretended to be busy writing when I entered, and looked up, and motioned me with the butt-end of his pen to a chair; but I walked up to the fireplace and stood there.

"'Mr. Mosheim?'

"'That is my name.'

"'Mine is Roberts, and I'm under-sheriff of Caerleonshire.'

"'Happy to have the opportunity of making the acquaintance of Mr. Under-Sheriff,' said Mosheim, showing his white teeth.

"'I don't come to make your acquaintance, Mr. Mosheim, but to make some arrangements with you as to an unfortunate accident which has happened to me in my official capacity.'

"Mosheim bowed grimly.

"'You are, I believe, acting on behalf of the creditors of Captain Potts?'

"'Certain clients of mine have claims against that gentleman. Well?'

"'A ca. sa. taken out by your firm has been with me for execution.'

"'Precisely.'

"'Well, Potts has escaped.'

"'What an excessively disagreeable incident for you!' Again gleamed the white teeth.

"'Now, what I propose to do is this: I undertake to pay you five hundred pounds, in a week, if you will give me a full release.'

"'I think, Mr. — Jones, did you say? — that the total of the detainers is rather more than that. You know the exact figure, perhaps?'

"'You know the figure as well as I do, Mr. Mosheim. Six shillings in the pound, or thereabouts, my offer would give your clients. You would n't have got 6d. in the pound out of Potts.'

"'You appear to know more of Mr. Potts than I do. In reply to your proposal, we decline it. Your sheriff is good for the whole amount.'

"'You absolutely decline it?'

"'Decidedly.'

"As I walked down Bishopsgate Street I felt more comfortable. I knew the worst. After all, ruin is not so bad in reality as in anticipation. I had plenty of money in my pocket, and it didn't matter now how I spent it. I would stay in town that night, and go to hear Robson, who was then in great force; he might make me forget my troubles. In the mean time I would go and get a steak at a place I knew in Fleet Street, where I used to dine when I was serving out my time in London. As I walked through the City I changed my mind again; the roar of London troubled me. I would get home as speedily as possible, — home among the quiet hills, and hide my troubles. But as I passed the narrow Court in Fleet Street, accustomed but long-forgotten habit, — or was it the hand of Providence which turned me? — drew me up the Court and into the well-known precincts of the 'Stilton.' I went into a box, and ordered a rump-steak and a pint of stout.

"You know the old-fashioned room, I dare say, — its sanded floor and wooden benches, its great fireplaces, and immense kettle? One side of the room is divided into boxes. In the corner of the farthest box from the door, where I was invisible, except to a person standing by the fireplace, I took my seat, and, sitting there waiting for my steak, I heard a number of men enter the room. They made much more clatter and noise than the quiet legal men who formed the rest of the company, who talked mysteriously in half-whispers, as though within the sacred precincts of the Court of Chancery. The voices of the new-comers rose in loud and cheery tones above all the noises of the chop-house. I guessed that the two loudest talkers were military men, probably just returned from India and the Mutiny War just ended. The third, who spoke with milder drawl, I judged to be a Templar. The two heroes were asking about lots of friends; but I did n't pay any attention to their conversation till I heard the name of Potts. Then, indeed, I listened with bated breath, every nerve on the stretch.

"Where's Billy Potts now? I hear he came to grief."

"Oh! Billy's down in Wales, hard up, as usual. I have just heard from him. Such fun! The Jews found him out. He was at Clan-something, a nice little secluded Welsh town. A ca. sa. was issued, and poor Billy was nobbled, and the bums took him to a hotel. You know what a nimble —"

"Here the waiter slammed down my dishes and tankard with a tremendous clatter, drowning the mellifluous voice of the Templar. I ground my teeth in despair; 'trap-door' was the only word I could catch, and the next moment a loud guffaw from the military told me the story was ended.

"Capital! capital! and he's in the same house still?"

"Yes; but he'll slip away as soon as the coast is clear."

"Devilish good! Jove! Billy's a match for Moses or Taffy."

"I had heard enough. I had the clew. I remembered that there was a trap-door in the room at the Prince Llewellyn, opening probably into a loft. It was too high for any ordinary man to reach without assistance; but, of course, Potts was in the highest favor with all the lassies at the hotel. Nothing would be easier than to open the trap from above and let down a rope or ladder; and he might be there still!

"I looked at the clock; it was 2.30. I had barely time to catch the 3 express from Paddington, but it might be done. I left my steak and stout untasted — unpaid for, had not the vigilant head-waiter intercepted me. I flung down half a crown, and without waiting for change bolted into Fleet Street. A hansom was passing, I jumped in, telling the driver he should have a sovereign if he got me in time for the train. Fortune favored me; fortune, do I say? Let me humbly and gratefully thank a kind Providence for saving me and mine from ruin. As we reached Paddington Station the clock was on the stroke of three. One of the big doors had been slammed to, and the porter was closing the second. With a howl that frightened the stolid porter, I threw myself against the closing door. I dashed through the ticket-office on to the platform. The guard had just blown his whistle, the train was gliding gently away. Policemen and porters barred my way in vain. 'Life or death!' I hoarsely roared; grasping a passing handle I flung myself into a first-class carriage. The cabman, unpaid, was running along the platform after his receding fare. I threw him a sovereign, which he caught, and his face assumed a beatific expression, as Paddington Station passed from my gaze.

"By one o'clock in the morning I had reached Llanywm. The moon was shining brightly, and Llanywm was in quiet repose. I stopped the car just outside the town, and walked to the police-station. I roused Inspector Williams, and asked him to send two constables to watch the Prince Llewellyn, and also to wake the two bailiffs and set them on guard. I walked to the Prince Llewellyn and took my stand on the doorstep till my reinforcements should arrive. I had hardly reached the top of the flight of steps when I saw a light over the fanlight, and heard the door-chain rattle. Presently the door was opened cautiously, and emerged into the moonlight, — Captain Potts.

"He had closed the door before he saw me, and we stood together on the topmost step of the high stone flight glaring at one another. A fight seemed imminent; we were well matched. I was the taller and heavier, but Potts was more nimble on his pins. At running, however, I could beat him hollow, and Potts knew it, and knew, therefore, that fight would be useless, unless he could previously disable me. But he was a man of presence of mind, and preferred to negotiate before fighting.

"Look here," he said rapidly; "I'm in an awful hole! We've always been good friends, and I don't see that it can harm you to keep your eyes shut for a minute while I get away."

"I had taken him by the arm as he spoke, and held him with a grip so firm, that he didn't need an answer. He drew himself together for a dash at me, but waited for an instant as I spoke.

"Potts!" I said, "your escape would be my ruin; and I'll not let you go till I'm dead."

"Potts looked at me amazed.

"What are the odds to you, if I get out of the clutches of a lot of Jew swindlers?"

"Simply I shall have to pay your debts, and be sold up stick and branch."

"On your honor, is it so?"

"On my honor, it is."

"Roberts, I had no idea of this. I'll cave in. Don't hold me so tight. I give you my word I'll not bolt."

"I took his word, and we walked up and down the street for half an hour, talking over his affairs. Presently the car arrived, and the bailiffs; and I saw him safely started for the county jail.

"Next day I resigned my office.

"After that I acted as Potts's solicitor, and had the pleasure of offering Moses and Mosheim sixpence in the pound, which they accepted, and released Potts. I don't think they lost by him either; they had plucked him pretty well before. He's coming down this week for the fishing; if you're here you'll be glad to know him, for you don't often come across a better fellow or better fisherman than Captain Potts."

THE POWER OF SULKINESS.

GREAT is the power of sulkiness. Fortunately for the world, it rarely exists in its highest and most concentrated form, for, if united to real intellectual or moral force, it would be a despotism so thorough as to be injurious to the general welfare of humanity. But in a less and more ignoble form it is not uncommon, and the deadweight and steady, choking pressure which mankind endure in consequence go to make up an almost intolerable grievance. There are people who have the gift of being sulky for an indefinite length of time, and assert that they act thus on principle; but it is almost invariably found that the principle harmonizes with the nature, for to tempers that are short and sweet, hot, inconsistent, or quickly placable, — and any of these are liable to be suddenly vexed for an hour or two, — it is always a difficulty to sulk. It is a bit of acting and not reality, even when carried out, and the assumption of it is felt to be a burden too heavy to be borne.

The capacity for steady, solid, concentrated sulkiness is a mighty power to him who possesses it; it implies many curious and varied accomplishments and gifts, among others that of the complete mastery of the five senses. It is for a man to be blind when it is desired that he should open his eyes, dumb whenever words would be acceptable, deaf to all allurements or submission, insensible to every effort at conciliation. It can create gloom, and, having created it, it can perpetuate and deepen it until it becomes a clinging atmosphere as unwholesome as a malaria. It comprehends an absolute control over the facial muscles, so that no softness or sign of yielding, not a ripple of a smile or an expression of pleasure, may replace even for a moment the sullen apathy or illumine the habitual scowl of the confirmed sulker. In a word, it is the faculty of simulation to such a degree that a person shall appear to be blind, deaf, dumb, stupid, paralyzed, ill, or dead, whenever and for as long as he chooses. Mr. Helps has truly said, "Unreason always governs. Nothing prevents you having your own way so much as being at all amenable to reason." And sulkiness neither gives reasons nor listens to them. The sulky being sometimes wears a depressed, spiritless, and utterly dejected appearance, as though crushed and heartbroken by long-continued oppression; sometimes a heavy, displeased, dragging step, and a black and lowering brow are the chief signs which indicate the disturbance within, and the form of the vengeance which is to be taken in respect of it. The latter is the masculine type: the former is, properly speaking, feminine. Mr. N. P. Willis, in one of his earlier volumes, has a clever little tale describing the power of an "injured look." By virtue of it a young American lady contrived to persuade a whole house full of boarders to regard her as a martyr, and to speak the worst and think the worst they could of her husband; and all this, without uttering one word herself, was produced solely by the "injured look." And if there is an "injured look" there is also such a thing as a "dumb devil"; if the power of the one is great, the provocation induced by the latter is unutterable. It is a curious, and to some will appear an unaccountable circumstance that in sulkiness a woman is more often possessed with a dumb devil than is a man.

Sulkiness is visible even in the nursery, where it exists, so to speak, in the form of a bud; but it is merely an outbreak of bad temper, for at that age a child has not learned the method of using it as an instrument with which to punish his playmates. And the wisest way is to leave it entirely unnoticed, "efface" the offender, as the French say, until there is an obvious return to a more amiable disposition. But boys and girls soon learn to estimate the power of sulkiness either by practice or endurance, and a large school is the best check on a despotism of this kind. Sulkiness is not a tyranny which can be safely exercised in society at large, and it is commonly reserved for private or home exhibition. The smaller the circle the more concentrated its force; in a family, in a house, in one room, the power of sulkiness oppresses, searches, and pervades every corner of it. In love-making sulkiness is a deplorable blunder. Smile or strike, or smile and strike, too, if that seems more advisable; but no good ever follows a sullen enmity, which chills, disconcerts, and often actually destroys love. Even that simulated sulkiness, that toothless vengeance, which consists in pouting coldness, is an experiment full of danger, and in the worst possible taste. But if between lovers it is a blunder, in married life it is simply the greatest madness of which a human being can be guilty. There they are man and woman yoked together like goats, and as the countryman justly observed, "that's been a trouble to more than goats," and if either of them is endowed with the faculty of persistent sulkiness, one shudders to think of the life the other one may be made to lead. It might be reasonably urged as a cause for judicial separation, possibly even for divorce, since the practice of quietly pressing the spirit and life out of a human being, no matter how many years the operation spreads over, is not one that ought to be permitted in a Christian country: "væ victis!" the weak go to the wall, and too often the weak are the pleasantest and most lovable of earth's creatures.

Sometimes a person is seen to exhibit something which resembles and yet is not sulks. It is a silent moodiness of manner arising from a sense of failure, mortification, or secret discouragement and vexation which he cannot get over all at once. It is often seen in youth, but in reality the man is struggling with his infirmity, and a kind word or a friendly overture will almost always float him over the difficulty. But genuine sulkiness is essentially premeditated and of a forethought; it is also vindictive, sometimes even malignant, in its nature, and if much indulged in causes the manners to become habitually morose, and the face and person acquire a heavy, sudden appearance as of a substance too long steeped in unwholesome juices. Dragging the feet along the floor and slamming the doors of the house for weeks and months together are vulgar and ignoble but neither uncommon nor inexpressive modes of sulking. We all know of other ways more refined, but not less disagreeable, and remember them too well. The fashion in which the very few words which custom and convenience render absolutely necessary are dropped from the lips as if they were so many leaden bullets; the steadfast, surprised stare that you or any one else should venture to ask such questions as shall require reply of any kind, the pertinacious coldness, the carefully averted glance, the steady gloom, the hand withheld, the smile unreturned, and the hardly muttered acknowledgment of the morning or evening salutation, — who that has witnessed or endured these amenities can forget the effect of them? In fact, the severity of the pressure which a really able, discriminating, and obstinate sulker can bring to bear on others for an indefinite space of time amounts to a tyranny, dumb, indeed, but sufficiently unholty of its kind; neither soft coaxing nor urgent cursing can affect it, and, though to yield is humiliating, it is wellnigh hopeless to resist it.

THE THREE NAMES.

FOR more than four years the three names painted on the doorway of No. 9 Old Inn remained unaltered. The house itself was the smallest in the Inn. All the other houses contained six sets of chambers; No. 9 — cramped up in a corner — had only three sets. They were each occupied by a single tenant, and their names, as painted on the doorway, were, "Mr. Bolt, 2d floor"; "Mr. Hay, 1st floor"; "Mr. Frith, ground-floor."

I was Mr. Hay, of the 1st floor. Mr. Bolt of the 2d floor and I were not on speaking terms. We had frequently met on the stairs and in the passage under our common roof. I knew him very well by sight. He was a tall, thin man, some years younger than I, pleasant-looking, notwithstanding a broken nose and huge red whiskers. He had a noisy, blundering way of moving about; always rushed up the stairs three at a time, kicking and banging his great boots against the woodwork. "That's Bolt!" I used to say, as his footsteps came tumbling up to my floor, and then went tumbling up to his own. I don't know whether he broke his nose over those stairs before I went to No. 9, but I always expected that he would break it again whenever I heard him return home.

Now, Mr. Frith of the ground-floor was different in every way. I knew him equally well by sight; but he and I, likewise, were not on speaking terms. He was short and inclined to be stout. He never seemed in a hurry. He never made a noise, except on his piano, and even the tone of that was soft and subdued like himself.

So we three — the noisy gentleman on the 2d floor, the musical gentleman on the ground-floor, and myself, — I don't know what the other two called me, probably the gentleman with the dog — lived for four years in the same house, and yet were strangers to one another. It seemed part of one's daily life constantly to see Mr. Frith, or to hear Mr. Bolt come tumbling up the stairs; part of one's daily care to prevent becoming acquainted with either; part of the pleasure of one's vacation to get away from them, as it was to get away from the bundles of law papers and clients' letters.

So last autumn, when I went to Switzerland, I endured the sea-passage; bore patiently the sleepless night journeys by rail, and the hot morning drive by diligence, cheered by the thought that I was adding mile after mile to the distance between me and Old Inn and everything connected with it. And all for what? For the very first person I meet at Chamouni to be Mr. Frith in tweeds, instead of Mr. Frith in broadcloth. He was standing just inside the salle-a-manger, looking for a seat at the long table, at which the diners were already assembled.

As I enter he turns round, and we look at one another defiantly, with a sort of 'Well! I have as much right here as you,' and then face to the right and left respectively. He goes down one half of the table, and I go up the other, hoping to put the whole length of it between us. There is no vacant seat on that side, so I walk round the end to the other side, and, to my disgust, see that he has done the same. We face each other again, are obliged by necessity to converge towards the same point, and finally seat ourselves near the centre of the table, with only a little Frenchman between us.

The first two courses we eat in silence, either staring at our plates or at the wall before us. Pending the third course the Frenchman turns to Mr. Frith, but that gentleman, not wishing to look my way, tries hard to escape the proffered conversation. The Frenchman, however, who speaks English very well, has no intention of being shaken off, and common courtesy forces Mr. Frith to answer.

"Do you come from London?" again begins the little tormentor, as soon as the dessert commences.

"Yes."

"Ah! it is a fine city that London. I know it well. From what part of London do you come?"

"Old Inn."

"Indeed! Do you know a Mr. Smith at Old Inn?"

"No."

"No! At what number in Old Inn do you live?"

"Nine."

"Nine!" echoes the little gentleman; "and Mr. Smith lives at No. 10, and you do not know him."

"No."

Not over pleased, the Frenchman turns to me, and Mr. Frith, very much pleased, turns away from us both.

"And are you from London too?" he begins, as though I had taken a part in the previous conversation.

Mr. Frith's back being towards us, I don't mind answering the little fellow, seeing that he does not care whether I come from London or Timbuctoo, but that it is simply impossible for him to eat his dinner in silence. So I say, "Yes, I come from London. All Englishmen seem to live in London, don't they?"

"Oh! but it is such a large city! From what part of London do you come?"

"Old Inn."

"Again Old Inn," he says, with a smile. "Perhaps you know Mr. Smith at No. 10?"

"I only know him by sight," I answer; and then, for the fun of increasing the little gentleman's astonishment, I add, "I live at No. 9."

The words are hardly spoken when the Frenchman, with true politeness, pushes back his chair. "Then you and this gentleman," touching Mr. Frith's arm, "are travelling together, and I have separated you and prevented your talking. I am so sorry. Will you take my seat and be next your friend?"

He is just rising for us to exchange chairs, when I put my hand upon his shoulder and whisper, "Thank you. I thank you. No. I do not know that gentleman."

The little fellow nods as if he understood, and then says, also speaking in a whisper, "You have quarrelled then? I beg your pardon if I have been disagreeable to you."

"Oh! not at all. We have never spoken to each other."

"What!" he cries, forgetting now to speak in an undertone; "you two live in the same house and you do not know one another! Ah, well!" putting a hand on our arms and smiling at both of us, "you will know one another now, and be great friends for the future."

There is no help for it. "I shall have great pleasure," says Mr. Frith, with a freezing bow. And I bow likewise and in a like manner, but say nothing.

Then follows a pause, during which the diners begin to leave the table; so we three rise and stand by our chairs, still with the Frenchman in the middle.

"Come!" he says, presently, and suddenly laughing; "you two have been making fun of me. Is it not so? You are friends travelling together."

Mr. Frith immediately denies this statement, and, having done so, walks away to a window, which looks out upon Mont Blanc. After what has passed, I feel that the one who first leaves the room will be obliged to make some remark, or do some little act of courtesy to the other; and to avoid the burden of doing this being thrown upon me, I go into the recess of the window next Mr. Frith's, and likewise stare at Mont Blanc. The Frenchman wishes us both good-evening, and takes himself off.

The next minute I hear his voice again. He and somebody else have come into collision in the passage, whereupon follows a mutual asking of pardons, and he enters the room again. His companion is hidden by the screen near the door, but I hear the little fellow say, still speaking in English, —

"Ah, Monsieur! you are just too late. The diligence from Genève was behind time, I suppose? You have ordered dinner, of course? Yes. Come and look at Mont Blanc. The moonlight is on it."

From my window I hear their footsteps approaching me, — the tripping, light step of the one, and the heavy, slouching tread of the other. As I listen to the latter a cold chill comes over me. We distinguish footsteps after a time as we learn to know voices. I have a strong misgiving that I know that tread, but I listen in suspense without looking round.

"Yes, it is very grand," says a voice at my elbow, referring to Mont Blanc, which towers before us clear and distinct in the bright moonlight.

O, that voice! It realizes my worst fears. How often had I heard it calling from the second floor at No. 9 Old Inn. I feel disposed to rush out of the room, but remembering Mr. Frith at the next window, wait to see what comes of Mr. Bolt's arrival.

"Very grand," he continues. "We don't have sights like that in London. Do you know London?"

"Gently, gently, Mr. Bolt! for your own sake," I murmur. "If you could only know the trap you are falling into."

"O yes! I know London," replies the Frenchman, promptly. "What part of London do you come from?"

"Old Inn."

"Old Inn!" echoes the other, in a tone of surprise. "Do you know Mr. Smith at No. 10?"

"N—o. That is to say, I know the name. He lives next door to me."

"You live, then, at No. —?"

"No. 9," plumps out Mr. Bolt.

"Then you expect to meet a friend here," says the Frenchman, looking for Mr. Frith, seeing that Mr. Bolt does not seem to recognize my back.

"No, I don't expect to meet a friend."

"Then you will meet one; you will meet two. Look, here is one. And you were close to him, and yet you did not know him."

As I turn round in obedience to the Frenchman's pull, Mr. Bolt does know me, but not as a friend, for he looks as if he would like to punch my head for being there.

"No; I have n't the pleasure of knowing this gentleman," he says; putting on a sickly smile.

"What!" cries the other. "Ah! Then that is the friend you will meet," pointing to Mr. Frith, who at that moment unwittingly comes out of the recess of his window.

"No; I have n't the pleasure of knowing him either."

For a minute the Frenchman does not seem to understand. "But you all live in the same house," he then says slowly.

"O yes," replies Mr. Bolt, who begins to see the fun, and seems rather to enjoy it, — "all lived there, I believe, for more than four years."

"And you are all strangers?"

"Perfect strangers," again replies Mr. Bolt.

"Well, I should not have thought it possible, even in England," says the little fellow so seriously that we all smile. He looks first at one and then at another, and finally rushes off to tell his friends of the three curiosities that he has discovered.

Our smiles vanish with his presence, and the moment he is gone our black looks return. Mr. Bolt goes off to the third window; Mr. Frith returns to his recess; I remain in mine; so we all stand and stare at Mont Blanc.

"Very fine," says Mr. Frith, being obliged to pass me in leaving the room, and feeling that he ought to say something.

"Very fine," I answer; and so exits the "ground floor."

"Looks very beautiful in the moonlight," I suggest to Mr. Bolt, as I follow Mr. Frith's example.

"Very beautiful," he answers, but does not leave his window as long as I remain in the room, though his dinner is on the table and the garçon waiting to remove the cover. Then I go, and, after that, we meet no more that night.

The next morning I am not as careful of my landlord's feelings, perhaps, as I might be. I hardly proffer an excuse for leaving, but leave I do, and take up my quarters in another hotel. That settled, I go to the post-office, thence to the Bureau des Guides, and on my way thither, after a good deal of considering this and looking at that, decide upon the excursion for that day. I choose the one to "Le Jardin," arguing that it was too far for Mr. Frith, and that Mr. Bolt, who evidently had not visited Chamouni before, was not likely to do that excursion on his first day. Pretty confident, therefore, that I should not be troubled with either of them, I hire a guide and start at once to make up for lost time.

"Pity I did n't start an hour ago."

"Why?" I say to Pierre — Pierre being my guide — as we go up the zigzags of the Montanvert.

"Because Jacques went with another English gentleman, and it would have been company for us," answers Pierre.

I express myself quite satisfied with the companionship I have, and Pierre, of course, swears that he was thinking of me only and not of himself. When we reach the glacier we see the gentleman of whom he spoke, but he is too far ahead for me to distinguish him.

Feeling sure, however, that he is neither Mr. Frith nor Mr. Bolt, I don't bother my head about him. As we go along Pierre tells me a long story about some of his comrades. He speaks villanous patois, and has a confused way of telling his story; and so, though I do my best to be enlightened, I am never certain whether I am supposed to be Jean or Alphonse; in fact, I can't make out whether Jean and Alphonse are two distinct men, or the two names of the same man. Jean falls down a crevasse; I understand that; but then it is Alphonse who is afterwards pulled up, so I get hopelessly muddled again. And, moreover, I can't sufficiently realize that I am either of them, for, as we near "Le Jardin," my own legs keep cruelly reminding me that I am Alfred Hay and nobody else; and I find myself panting in a way that either Jean or Alphonse would be ashamed of doing.

"Ah, voilà Jacques!" exclaims Pierre, as we step on to the grass at our journey's end, pointing to his comrade, who rises from the side of the stream over which he was stooping. I look round for the Englishman, but he is not visible. Jacques, when he comes to us, points to a great boulder of rock behind which, he says, the other is lying, rather knocked up by the walk. And there, sure enough, I see part of a pair of legs so protruding beyond the boulder as to indicate that their owner is on the broad of his back. While I am looking at them they begin to move with a wriggling sort of motion, and, the next minute, Mr. Frith's face appears, cautiously peeping beyond the rock. Completely taken by surprise, and not having time to turn away, I stare vacantly at the sky over his head; but I see, nevertheless, his face disappear again very quickly, and his legs wriggle nearly out of sight.

"Hang him!" only I say something stronger; and he, doubtless, from behind his boulder, returns the compliment. "What on earth made him come up here?" I mutter, feeling a strong temptation to send a big stone by my side at his boots.

They prevent me admiring the view; they prevent me enjoying my luncheon; they make me wish that he and they were at the bottom of the deepest crevasse in Switzerland. And, worse still, when Jacques, coming to my side, expresses his pleasure at seeing me, because I can help "Monsieur là" back to Chamouni. "Not I. I'll see 'Monsieur là' frozen to death before I will help him." And to avoid being called upon to assist him in any way, I tell Pierre that I am in a hurry to get back, and hint that we had better start at once. To this he answers, "Here are two others coming." It has nothing to do with my getting back, but, nevertheless, I ask where the others are.

"There!" And both he and Jacques point out the direction. I can't see the new-comers at first, and, when I do, I lose them again immediately afterwards. They are much nearer the next time they appear; near enough for me to discern that one of them is tall and thin, and, though he is walking quickly, has an awkward, clumsy step. That is quite enough. I am certain who he is; but after finding Mr. Frith at "Le Jardin," I am not surprised. I take it quite philosophically at first. Then I try to look at our all meeting again in its ludicrous light, but here I miserably fail and get angry. I lean back in disgust and pull my hat over my face; and the rest of my grumbling is confided to the lining.

In due course of time Mr. Bolt reaches "Le Jardin." The guide, after handing him the haversac and receiving back his portion of the luncheon, joins the other two. Mr. Bolt scrutinizes my corpus; again fails to recognize me, but suspects me to be English, so he keeps his distance. Peeping under my hat, I see Pierre and Jacques presently compare watches and then rise. The latter, however, moves away alone and goes to the boulder. At his first words the odious boots disappear entirely, but he begins to remonstrate; shows his watch; points to the sun; and after a little while bends forward to help Mr. Frith to rise.

That gentleman then emerges from behind his friendly rock, shaking his legs and settling his coat, and, without looking my way, tries to bustle off as if he did not know I was there. Not so Jacques. He speaks to Pierre, who comes to my side, and Jacques lingers, seeing that I do not rise. Meanwhile Mr. Frith, by his crablike movement, nearly tumbles over Mr. Bolt, without seeing him. "Halloa," cries the latter, "you here!" Whereupon Mr. Frith turns round and stares, with open eyes and mouth, seeing Mr. Bolt when he expected to see me.

"I had not an idea you were here," he says, emphasizing the "you," and so criminating himself. "Fine scene, is n't it?" He then makes a second attempt to be off, but Jacques still lingers.

Pierre all this time has been nudging me in the side, and now, shaking me gently, says, quite loudly, that the other gentleman is going. Being unable to feign sleep any longer under such treatment, I remove my hat and sit up, and see that Mr. Bolt is looking at me. "By Jove! No. 9 in force," laughs that gentleman, pointing at me and then at Mr. Frith, who thereupon pretends to see me for the first time.

"Mr. Hay, too," he says, in feigned surprise. "Dear me, have you been here long?"—asking this in the most innocent tone.

"Why, nearly an hour," I answer, as if it was the strangest thing in the world that we should have been so near one another for so long and not have found it out.

The next minute we are all standing together, no one knowing how to get away first or how to stop behind. But Pierre puts an end to any manoeuvring by saying that if we wish to get to Chamouni in time for the table d'hôte, we must start at once. We can't say that we don't wish to be there in time for the table d'hôte, so we look helplessly at one another as the three guides start off together; and then we three follow, also together, but in silence.

Mr. Bolt is the first to speak. "It seems," he says, "that we are not to be separated." Well! fate is fate; and as we have, likewise, a walk of about five hours before us, it is nonsense to be snappish and surly. There is n't much conversation at first, just a remark about the scenery or a word about climbing; but it creeps on little by little. We begin to talk more freely and to say what we think. We avoid speaking about No. 9, or anything connected with it, for some time, till Mr. Bolt asks me why I did n't bring my dog.

He claims an acquaintance with it, that I was not aware of; and that makes me think better of him directly. We pass "Les Egralets," but not without Mr. Bolt nearly killing himself, and get well upon the glacier. The crevasses are nothing, and we walk abreast. I begin to think, as we go along, that Mr. Frith is not a bad fellow, and that there is a good deal of fun, after all, in Mr. Bolt. I find their conversation more pleasant than the guide's, with his interminable story about Jean and Alphonse. We actually get to laugh about the little Frenchman and about our all meeting, and, somehow, speak about the latter as if it were a fortunate occurrence. I begin to wish that I had n't changed my hotel, and, while I am thinking about it, Mr. Frith asks if I did n't think the — very full last night. "Yes, and too much dress. One does n't care for that sort of thing here, you know."

"No, you don't. In fact, I changed this morning to the —, naming one equally good, but quieter, and more frequented by regular pedestrians."

"You went there! As Mr. Bolt says, 'we are not to be separated.' I changed there this morning too."

"Simply because the other was too crowded?" he says, with a smile.

"That's the only reason why you left it, I suppose?" I answer.

Then we both laugh, but promise, nevertheless, to look out for one another at the table d'hôte.

"And I shall be left alone with the Frenchman," says Mr. Bolt, with mock seriousness.

"No, come and dine with us," replies Mr. Frith.

"And bring the Frenchman," I add. "Then we can have a rubber afterwards. He will be sure to play."

When the time for the rubber comes, we find that he does play, and a first-rate hand into the bargain. Before he leaves us he makes a little speech. We are in a room by ourselves, so he stands up and drinks our healths, and then says that it is the happiest day in his life, for he has made us friends forever.

We cannot persuade him to join us on our next day's excursion, for which the three of us start together instead of meeting half-way. That excursion is followed by another, and that by another, and so on, for a fortnight, till we reach Aosta, and are there forced to part.

Since then we have all met again at No. 9. But the three names are no longer the same on the doorway. Mr. Frith's alone remains. Mr. Bolt and I, however, often go there; and it was only the other night that we were making arrangements for starting on our next trip together.

MADAME DE POMPADOUR.

IF one could create an expurgated edition of history, one might put Madame de Pompadour out of sight; but alas! the eighteenth century, and even the French Revolution, cannot be understood without taking her into consideration. She was possessed of greater power in Europe than any woman of modern times, with the exception, perhaps, of Elizabeth of England, and Catharine of Russia. She was the Sultana of France for twenty years, with the Sultan in leading-strings. Therefore history, with a blush, is obliged to chronicle the doings of the Pompadour.

The President Hainault — who was one of the little coterie of friends who formed the consolation of the deserted Marie Leckzinska — met this destructive creature first in 1742.

"I found at Madame de Montigny's," he writes to Madame du Deffaud, "one of the prettiest women I ever saw, Madame d'Etiolles; she knows music perfectly; she sings with all possible gayety and taste; she has composed a hundred songs, and acts the comedies at Etiolles on a stage as good as that of the Opera."

Destiny seems to have marked her out from her cradle and educated her for the sultana form of existence. She was, as is well known, originally a Mademoiselle Poisson by birth, Jeanne Antoinette Poisson. Her mother was beautiful, but depraved. Her nominal father, M. Poisson, was the son of a peasant. M. Poisson became chief clerk to the famous speculators, — the brothers Paris Daverney, — who, as contractors for the army, had accounts with the French War Office which were found fraudulent. M. Poisson was fixed upon as the chief culprit, and condemned to be hung, a fate which he escaped by flight, and he was hung only in effigy, and lived to get his pardon by intercession with the authorities. He was a cynical, intemperate, vulgar person, who would naturally never have attracted the notice of posterity but for the notoriety of his nominal daughter. She took care to keep him as far away from Versailles as possible; where, however, he would come sometimes, and put her elegance to the blush. On such occasions, however, she always treated him with respect, and, moreover, she paid his debts, gave him one estate, and got him another.

He took little notice of Jeanne Antoinette, however, till her strange fortune was made; but left her, and his wife, and a boy who bore his name, and became the Marquis de Marigny, to the charge of M. le Normant de Tournhem, the veritable father of Jeanne Antoinette, a rich fermier-général, who took every pains, and spared no expense, in educating the little Poisson; for Jeanne Antoinette was one of the most graceful and charming of blonde-haired children, and already full of intelligence, wit, and vivacity.

Her mother from the first styled her "un vrai morceau de roi," and was enchanted with the possession of so bewitching a daughter; and this the more, as when Jeanne was at the age of nine, a fortune-teller, one Madame Lebon prophesied that she should become mistress of Louis XV. There can be no doubt about the fact, for in Madame de Pompadour's accounts there exists the record of a pension granted to one Madame Lebon, for having predicted her future elevation. M. de Tournhem gave his protégée an education in which nothing was neglected but morality. She had the very best of masters for every accomplishment suitable to a royal Thais or Aspasias. Jelyotte, of the Opera, instructed her in singing and the harpsichord; Guibaudet, in dancing; Crébillon and Lanoue, in belles-lettres and declamation. She was taught to be a most graceful and accomplished horsewoman, and to draw and engrave on copper and stone. Her playing and singing were such, even as a girl, as to excite veritable enthusiasm; so that in society on one occasion, when Madame de Mailly, the first mistress of Louis XV., was present, the reigning favorite rushed at her and clasped her in her arms with admiration. Such are the strange contrasts which destiny loves to exhibit, — the present and the future mistress of Louis XV. embracing each other!

How beautiful she was may still be seen in her portraits by La Tour, Boucher, and others. She was tall, voluptuously and finely made, with the whitest and smoothest of skins; her eyes were brown and brilliant; her teeth were white and small; her arms round and perfect; her hands beautiful and fine; her blonde hair, which she wore only half disguised with powder, rippled beyond her white temples in the freshest of little waves; and her small mouth was closed with delicate lips, which had an infinitive cherry-like freshness and fullness, till they became pale and withered with the convulsive bitings which the never-ending affronts and agitations of her Versailles life produced. Her enemies, male and female, at Versailles, in later days, watched the daily withering of these lips, and the gradual emaciation of the round lines of her once-blooming cheek, and found comfort. We must add to these charms of person her taste for dress and for elegance of all kinds, which was exquisite for the time. In matters of this nature she was accepted as sole arbitress; for no porcelain vase, no sedan-chair, no pen, no slipper, nothing noticeable in dress or furniture comes down from those days without speaking of the Pompadour. Notice in the portrait of La Tour, at the Louvre, the serried rows of light lilac bows of ribbon, called in those days "nœuds de parfais contentements," which are arranged across the little low bodice over one of the most graceful of bosoms, with the lace-trimmed, flowered satin body of her dress cut and scalloped away on either side, and think of what the Pompadour must have been when she was dressed.

Such charms at nineteen were sufficient to turn the head of the nephew of M. de Tournheim, M. le Normant d'Etiolles, and he wanted to marry her; but his parents held the immoral reputation of the Poisson couple in such loathing, that they refused to hear of the match. Nevertheless, their scruples were overcome, as such scruples are too often overcome, by money. M. de Tournheim was very rich, and offered to give half his property at once to the young couple, and to settle the other half on them, and the marriage was made.

This was Mademoiselle Poisson's first promotion in life, — a step which made her subsequent elevation possible. As Mademoiselle Poisson, she could hardly hope ever to become reigning mistress of Louis XV., but as Madame le Normant d'Etiolles, with the entrée into the gilded salons of the great financial people, — her husband was a fermier-général, as was her uncle, — she felt sure of gaining a reputation as one of the most charming women of Paris, and of making her name reach the king's ears, — for to be royal mistress, and nothing else, was the object of her ambition. It seems strange that when so many great and beautiful ladies, constantly under the eye of the king, were aiming at this position without success, that this little bourgeoisie should have set her heart upon it, and have succeeded without much difficulty; but there seems to have been a most wonderful conspiracy of destiny, of chance, of all 'occult and evil influences, to make the Pompadour succeed, and she did succeed.

And yet, leaving morality aside, her position as Madame le Normant d'Etiolles was infinitely superior to that for which she longed. She was respected, and might have been adored, by the most distinguished men in France. Her husband was not handsome, but he was passionately devoted to her, and was an upright, honorable man. She had a fine town house, and a splendid country house at Etiolles, near Corbeil. Diplomats and men of letters crowded to her salons. She was feted and incensed without a thought of self-interest in those days by such men as Voltaire, Montesquieu, Fontenelle, Bernis, and Maupertuis. During the three or four years that she lived with her husband she had two children; one of whom died, indeed, an infant, but the other, a daughter, was full of grace and promise. On all this her ambitious spirit looked with contempt. Without a thought for the man she had married, she was scheming to break up forever his life of domestic prosperity and happiness, and to deliver him over to the loves of opera-girls, while she herself should mount to a throne of illicit glory, — where her soul should be devoured by daily and hourly jealousy, anguish, fear, and despair, and be subject to never-ending horrible agitations, to agonizing tensions and clinchings of the nerves, to devouring of the lips and convulsions of the heart, — all in the presence of malignant, envious, and triumphant eyes.

She began to play for her stake very soon after her marriage. As often as the French king went to hunt in the forest of Sénart, near Corbeil, he was sure to be met by a ravishing creature, either on horseback or in a pony-carriage, dressed in the most fairy-like fantasies of blue and rose hunting dresses. But these were the passionate times of the royal favor of Madame de Châteauroux, with whom Louis was then too deeply engrossed to allow him to take much notice of the devices of Madame d'Etiolles. However, Madame d'Etiolles's little stratagems were not unnoticed by the Châteauroux, for one evening, in her apartments, when the Duchesse de Chevreuse asked the king if he had seen la petite d'Etiolles, Madame de Châteauroux walked up to her and stamped with her red heel so fiercely on Madame de Chevreuse's foot, that the poor duchess fell down in a faint; and shortly after, at the motion of Madame de Châteauroux, notice was sent to la petite d'Etiolles that she had better desist from appearing at the king's hunting parties at all.

Destiny, however, removed the superb Châteauroux, with her haughty graces and her domineering airs, out of the way of Madame d'Etiolles. The duchess died the tragic death we all know of in the Rue du Bac, just as she had arrived at the very zenith of her ambition. And not long after, at a grand masked opera ball, in Paris, a lady in a blue domino excited the curiosity of the king, with witty and caustic speeches, and when pressed to unmask, showed him the sprightly features of the lady of the forest of Sénart. She withdrew at once, however, into a circle of friends, contriving to let fall her handkerchief, which the king picked up and threw after her, — upon which, of course, the universal mot was, "Le mouchoir est jété." Madame d'Etiolles happened — destiny again! — to have a relative in the palace, one Binet, in the very handy situation of valet de chambre to the king, and through Binet's mediation, Madame d'Etiolles became very shortly lodged in the Palace of Versailles, in the very apartments of Madame de Mailly, the enthusiastic admirer of her harpsichord performances, and was supping with the king, and the Duchesse de Lauraguais, the Marquise de Bellefonds, the Ducs of Ayen, Richelieu, and Boufflers, in the little cabinets.

Before, however, Madame d'Etiolles had effected her purpose of getting lodged in Versailles as titled mistress, there was necessarily a preliminary period of seduction and negotiation, during which she had got her husband invited away into the country, to the house of a M. de Savalette. When the poor man was about to return to Paris his uncle, M. de Tournheim, came and found him, and broke the news to him that his wife was now the mistress of the king. At this M. d'Etiolles fell down in a faint. As soon as he returned to his senses, his desperation was so great that it was feared he would commit suicide.

For some time all weapons were taken out of his way, and the inconsolable husband at last, after vainly threatening to go to Versailles and tear her away out of the arms of the king, wrote a suppliant letter, begging her to return, with all the energy of affection and despair. Madame de Pompadour, whose heart must have been made of rock-crystal, had the brutality to show this letter to the king; but Louis XV. disappointed her by saying coolly, "Madame, you have a husband of excellent principles." Nevertheless, it was thought advisable to remove M. d'Etiolles from Paris, which it was easy to do, since he was a fermier-général, and provincial employment in the south was given him. After being seriously ill with grief, he ultimately succeeded in entirely curing himself of all love for a heartless woman, and in a year and a half he returned to Paris. Madame de Pompadour had been a wife to him for about four years. Of their two children, the son died in infancy, and the daughter lived only to the age of eleven. Madame de Pompadour had taken the precaution of having a separation deed drawn out at the Châtelet, on the 15th of June, 1745, immediately after her instalment in the château de Versailles.

During the absence of her husband in the south, Madame d'Etiolles had become, by letters patent, the Marquise de Pompadour, and it was during this journey that, at one of the provincial dinner-tables to which the fermier-général, in consequence of his position, was a frequent guest, he was observed by a country gentleman, who had noticed the civility with which the stranger had been everywhere treated, and had asked his neighbor who he was. "Pouvez-vous l'ignorer?" said his neighbor; "c'est le mari de la Marquise de Pompadour." The simple country gentleman knew nothing of either M. d'Etiolles or the newly created Madame de Pompadour, but, wishing to be civil to a stranger, seized the opportunity of a moment's silence to rise, glass in hand, and address M. d'Etiolles thus: "Monsieur le Marquis de Pompadour, voulez-vous bien me permettre d'avoir l'honneur de saluer votre santé?"

Not, perhaps, in all history can be found an example of such a domination as that which Madame de Pompadour established over Louis XV. He was really her superior in knowledge of affairs and of men, and in capacity. For Louis XV. was by no means an ordinary man. He had great talents, and was capable of energy in emergencies. What, then, was the secret of Madame de Pompadour's power over him? It was this. He was governed by his indolence, his ennui, and his sensuality; and she undertook to govern these. If he was her superior in capacity, she was his superior in will, and he was only too happy to give up to a mistress the power he would never have confided to a minister. But to make her hold on him secure, she had to study his character, and to humor his weakness, to a degree which has never, perhaps, been surpassed.

All her energies, all her quickness of perception, were watchful day and night to keep him in her bonds, and to this she sacrificed every dignity and delicacy of woman. For it was not only for the king that she had to play daily and nightly the parts of Circe and of Scheherazade. She had to defend herself day by day against the contrivances of her enemies, who were incessantly scheming to force a new mistress on the king. Many, and painful, and long were the agonies she had to endure on this score. Not that there was one pang of jealousy mixed up with such agonies! They were the mere convulsions of ambition on the brink of destruction. The beautiful Madame de Coislin gave her many a bitter hour; but her most dangerous rival was the Duchesse de Choiseul Romanet,—who, indeed, extracted from Louis a promise that the Pompadour should be dismissed. But Madame de Choiseul Romanet was betrayed by her own cousin, M. de Stanville, afterwards the Duc de Choiseul; for which service the Pompadour took charge of his advancement, and ultimately made him prime minister. After incalculable pangs and fears of this kind, Madame de Pompadour devised the most ignoble system for attaching the king to her, which it ever entered into the head of a woman to adopt towards a lover.

Conscious that the king's passion for herself had faded away, and that she was in no position to recall it, she determined to provide herself other mistresses for the king, but mistresses from whom she would have nothing to fear. A great lady might become a rival, and oust her from her place; but she took care that the small houses of the Parc aux Cerfs should not have for inmates any dangerous rivals. Yet still the Pompadour had to be on her guard. Even here a too-fascinating creature, younger than herself, and of superior beauty, might step in. And, though she was thus defended, the ladies of the court were still dangerous to her. Should a true rival turn up, adieu to all the splendors of Versailles, to her loge grillée at the theatre, where she sat alone with the king,—adieu to the seats for herself and suite in the royal gallery of the chapel of Versailles,—adieu to the crowd of daily worshippers, grands seigneurs, duchesses, and others who crowded to her antechamber every morning, in attendance on the goddess of fortune, whom one turn of the wheel would throw into the mire from which she sprang,—adieu to the long days with the king at la Muette, at the Trianon, at Choisy, at Marly, where, like a veritable Queen, she sat by her royal lover and talked with him for hours in face of the whole court,—adieu to the splendid gifts of New Year's Day, to ivory tablets jewelled with diamonds, marked with the arms of France, and containing notes of 50,000 francs, and to other presents, like that of the great diamond of the Duchess of Orleans, valued at 80,000 livres,—adieu to the gorgeous household state which she maintained,—when once the royal exchequer should be closed against her! Her groom of the chamber was a Chevalier d'Henin, a gentleman of one of the best families of Guenno, who unblushingly waited in her antechamber, and when she went out walked by the side of her sedan-chair with her mantle on his arm. Her waiting-maids were two ladies of good birth. Her steward was a lawyer who wore the cross of Saint Louis. Even the very footman who waited behind her chair at table was a chevalier de Saint Louis; and her yearly expenses have been calculated at one million livres, at the least.

The most dangerous rivals, however, she ever had to fear at court, in her capacity of prime enchantress to the king, were the king's own daughters. The king began to find a charm in their society, which menaced the influence of Madame de Pompadour. The whole royal family naturally detested her, with the exception of the queen, who was too good-natured to detest anybody; and the daughters of Louis—Loque, Coque, Chiffe, and Graille—made a desperate attempt to be as amusing as Madame de Pompadour, and to supplant her by drinking champagne most jovially at the royal supper-tables; but Madame de Pompadour managed to render all these little stratagems nugatory by forestalling the princesses in the occupation of an apartment at Versailles, which placed her in closer communication, by a secret staircase, with those of the king.

The king, indeed, with the exception of the time he gave to hunting, and to his visits to the Parc aux Cerfs, passed nearly his whole life with his sultana. He went into her apartments early in the morning, was present at her toilet, remained with her till the hour of mass, came back with her after chapel, then took soup or a cutlet with her, and did not withdraw till six in the evening. On hunting days he was away, of course, but he supped with her. All Madame de Pompadour's talents of conversation, all the devices of an inventive mind, were put in action to amuse her sultan; all the little tittle-tattle of Paris and Versailles, all the scandal of the time, came rippling from her fluent tongue into the ears of a king who was the greatest conceivable lover of gossip, and most curious of every small detail of private life;—one of whose greatest pleasures, indeed, was the perusal of private letters, selected and unsealed for him in the cabinet noir of the Paris post-office. The king, as is well known, was so much at a loss for occupation that at one period of life he took to needlework and tapestry, at another to wood-turning with a lathe; and at Madame Pompadour's, when he had nothing better to do, he would have a delinquent domestic of his mistress's household called up before him for cross-examination, and on one occasion he cross-questioned a footman for two hours, who was accused of having stolen some lace. After talk and scandal, the marquise fell back on her musical accomplishments, and with that perfect grace she possessed, sang and played to the king on various instruments. She had especially the tact of applying herself to the royal humor, of being gay when he was gay, and being serious when he was serious. On these latter occasions it was, however, sometimes not so easy for her to go wholly with the royal caprice.

On one occasion, when the king's humor, as often was the case, took a gloomy, semi-devotional turn, he entered her apartments with a volume of Bourdaloue in his hand, and expounded to her the serious reflections which the reading of the sermon had called up, and proposed to re-read the sermon in company with her. The marquise naturally had a frightful dread of any signs of reformation in the king, and she refused to hear the discourse most energetically, and tried to change the subject of conversation, upon which Louis went off to his own apartments, saying, "Eh bien, je m'en vais donc chez moi continuer ma lecture," leaving the marquise in a state of tears and inexpressible anxiety.

The astonishing favor with which the mistress was regarded naturally created crowds of enmities and jealousies. The royal family was, of course, among those most hostile to the Pompadour. As for the queen, she had long given up all hope of reclaiming her husband, and she was as content to see her place occupied with the Pompadour as by anybody else. Indeed, Madame de Pompadour did all she could, by every kind of forethought and attention, to conciliate Marie Leckzinska, and the queen was touched by her humility, and thought that she might be better off thus than with a haughtier rival.

Marie Leckzinska's good-will was a wonderful protection for the mistress, who made use of the amiability of the queen to fortify her position as much as possible. She got permission to ride in one of the queen's carriages when the court changed its residence, which gave the favorite a position in the eyes of the public very different from that she would otherwise have held; and Marie Leckzinska made no objection to her seat at chapel in the royal gallery. In matters of religion, however, the queen's conscience did not permit her to be so lenient. She refused to allow her husband's mistress to carry one of the church vessels in the ceremony of the Cène, or to be one of the quêtesuses on Easter Sunday.

Marie Leckzinska, too, in one instance, showed some pleasant malice in her way of receiving Madame de Pompadour, which proved that she was not so resigned as she appeared to be outwardly. Madame de Pompadour entered her apartment one day, before her little court, to pay her respects. She bore a large basket of flowers in her fine hands and arms, without gloves, as etiquette required. As she stood in front of the queen, after making her obeisance, the latter, in a cool way, out loud, and with measured voice, proceeded to make a running commentary on the beauties of the marquise, as though the Pompadour were a statue or work of art, which justified the taste of the king. Her complexion, her eyes, her fine arms, were all the subject of a praise which could not be taken as flattering from the superiority of tone in which it was administered; and finally the queen requested the favorite, as she stood in that awkward attitude, with her basket on her arm, to sing something. It was vain to refuse.

The queen insisted, to the surprise of the company, Madame de Pompadour sang forth, with all the force of her fine voice, a monologue from Glück's "Armida": "Enfin il est en ma puissance." Marie Leckzinska changed color at this audacious outburst, and her whole court hardly knew what attitude to assume. But the poor queen was too used to humiliation to show any resentment; and not long after she made a visit to Madame de Pompadour at her château at Choisy, at the invitation of the king, who had never been seen to be so attentive to her as on that evening;—which so delighted Marie Leckzinska that she was heard to say, "Je ne m'en irai d'ici que quand on me chassera."

Not so pleasant, however, were the relations of the favorite with the younger members of the family. The young Dauphin, when obliged to give her the accolade of etiquette, thrust out his tongue at her on one occasion, and was banished from court for some time in consequence. All the royal children sought to mortify her as much as possible,—as on one occasion, when they rode in the same carriage to a hunting party with her, and never addressed her a word during the whole ride. But Madame de Pompadour revenged herself fully in her quiet way; for, as the Dauphin grew up, and naturally wanted to assist in the advancement of his friends and attendants, he found Madame de Pompadour before him at every step.

She was informed of every vacancy, every office at court, in the army, or in the administration, to be given away, and when the Dauphin applied to the ministers for a protégé, he was always informed it had been already promised to a relative or dependant of Madame de Pompadour; and on one occasion, when a protégé of the Dauphin cried out at the injustice of a nomination over his head, he was, in spite of M. le Dauphin and his protestations, sent off to cool his indignation to the state prison of For l'Evêque.

Once or twice only did the Dauphin and the princesses manage to score a point against her. Madame de Pompadour had, however, to put up with an occasional checkmate from the fine spirit of railery of some of the old noblesse, who refused to pay court to this bourgeoisie mistress. The Prince de Conti and she were always at war. She hated the prince because he directed the secret diplomacy of Louis XV., into which she could gain no initiation. The Prince de Conti was, moreover, one of the most capable and honest men in the kingdom, but would do nothing to conciliate the favorite. He was obliged to visit her, nevertheless, one day on the king's business, when she omitted to offer him a seat. The interview was in her bedroom, so the prince coolly seated himself on her bed, saying, "Voilà, madame, un excellent coucher." The marquise behaved just the same to another great seigneur, M. de Beaufremont, who on the occasion tranquilly stretched himself in an arm-chair. The most audacious repartee of this kind, however, came to her from the Marquis de Souvré, one of the most witty courtiers of the time. The marquis, in an easy way, seated himself on the arm of her own chair till he had concluded his conversation.

Madame de Pompadour complained to the king, who spoke about the matter to M. de Souvré. "Sire," replied he, "j'étois diablement las, et ne sachant où m'asseoir, je me suis aidé comme j'ai pu." Louis, who was always good-natured and loved a joke, laughed loudly at the reply; and the marquise could get no redress on M. de Souvré. As for smaller people who offended her, it is well known she filled half the Bastille and other state prisons in Paris. Everybody has heard of Latude and his attempted escape from the Bastille, where he was shut up for forty years at the original motion of Madame de Pompadour; but it is not so well known that his heirs, in 1793, brought an action for damages against the family of Madame de Pompadour for the imprisonment of their father, and that they obtained a verdict in their favor, condemning their opponents to the payment of 60,000 livres, only 10,000 of which, however, were paid.

It may be said that all the world, both within Versailles and without it, were the enemies of Madame de Pompadour, — excepting only they who were attached to her by some obligation past, or the hope of some favor to come; and at the slightest cloud of disfavor her enemies raised their heads and redoubled their endeavors to oust her from her position. To retain a hold upon the king was in itself sufficient occupation for the energies of any ordinary woman, but beyond this she had to be ceaselessly on the watch to guard against the contrivances of the world without; and when we add to all these occupations that of ruling the ministers, making foreign alliance and treaties, and governing or misgoverning the country, it must be conceded that her office was no sinecure.

It is a matter of history that no minister was, in the long run, able to hold his place against her, and she disposed of the first dignities of state and the command of armies just as it suited her caprices. Orry, the Contrôleur-Général, accustomed to the frugal administration of the Cardinal Fleury, having remonstrated against the fresh burst of prodigality of the king towards his new mistress, was replaced by M. de Machault d'Arnonville, a creature of her own, — who, however, having fallen under her suspicions at the time of the Damiens assassination, was then also dismissed. The Marquis d'Argenson, the Minister of Foreign Affairs, having put her out of patience by stammering, was sent into exile. His brother, the Comte d'Argenson, the Minister of War, a more obsequious character, having opposed the Austrian alliance, was dismissed after some years of service. But the greatest difficulties she had to encounter were in the resistance of the Comte de Maurepas, the chief minister, and the Duc de Richelieu, the first gentleman of the chamber. Maurepas, relying upon the support of the rest of the royal family, his own facilities for making work come easy to the king, and the general elasticity and caustic frivolity of his character, believed he was a match for the Pompadour, and would make no advances or concessions to secure her favor.

Indeed, she attributed to him, and apparently with reason, some of the worst Poissonades which circulated about Versailles. The king, indeed, had a real affection for the frivolous Maurepas; but the minister was soon obliged to give way, and to acknowledge the slippery nature of the ground on which he stood. Louis being all day with the Pompadour, the minister was necessarily obliged to seek the monarch in her apartment to confer with him on matters of pressing importance; but the favorite always contrived so to engross the attention of the infatuated monarch, that he barely gave M. de Maurepas the slightest sign that he was listening to him. If at any time Maurepas contrived really to interest the king, the Pompadour cried out, "Allons donc, Monsieur de Maurepas; vous faites venir à Sa Majesté la couleur jaune. Adieu, Monsieur de Maurepas." On another occasion she insisted on M. de Maurepas's annulling a certain lettre de cachet which he had signed. "Il faut, madame, que Sa Majesté l'ordonne." "Faites ce que madame veut," rejoined the king. Maurepas, in his light way, turned these unpleasant scenes into ridicule, and revenged himself by the bitter, sarcastic verses which he had an especial talent for writing; and they followed in swift succession, each one more bitter than another.

There came forth at last an epigram whose point turned on a malady of the favorite. She bounded into fury and exasperation, and went off to Maurepas herself to demand the names of the authors of the chansons. "Quand je le saurai, madame, je le dirai au roi." "Vous faites peu de cas, monsieur, des maîtresses du roi." "Je les ai toujours respectées, madame, de quelque espèce qu'elles fussent." After this the Pompadour was determined on his dismissal at any cost. She affected to believe that Maurepas intended to poison her, for there had been a silly report that Maurepas had poisoned

Madame de Châteauroux. She slept always with her physician, Quesnay, in the next room, and with antidotes near to her. She would never eat or drink at table till the dishes or wines had been previously tasted before her; and after wearying the king for some time with such affectations, the weak monarch gave way, and exiled Maurepas to Bourges. It was not so easy for her to get rid of the Duc de Richelieu, who himself, with his libertine, light, courtier air, was almost as indispensable to the king as the Pompadour. Nevertheless, on one occasion when the Duc de Richelieu, as first gentleman of the chamber, had opposed the whims of the Pompadour, the king said to him at his débotté, "M. de Richelieu, combien de fois avez-vous été à la Bastille?" "Trois fois, sire," said Richelieu, with a fallen face. She was not able to prevent Richelieu from obtaining some of the most important military commands; but whenever he met with any such success, she prevented the king from giving him the gracious reception he expected. Thus when he returned all glorious after the taking of Minorca, all that Louis said to him was, "Maréchal, vous savez la mort de ce pauvre Landemalt," — one of the royal huntsmen; and he added, "Les figues de Minorque, sont-elles bonnes?"

Madame de Pompadour, to say the truth, made the less opposition to a command being given to Richelieu, since she hoped some great failure would bring about his disgrace. "M. de Richelieu, il est assez fanfaron pour vouloir se charger de cela. Il mettra autant de légèreté à prendre une ville qu'à séduire une femme; cela serait plaisant. Il lui faudrait quelque bonne disgrâce pour lui apprendre à ne douter de rien." The miseries and reverses which the incapable creatures of Madame de Pompadour, who were made ministers and generals, brought upon France, are marked in the history of France in characters of blood and shame. The people of France and of Paris knew well enough the authoress of all these calamities, and if she could have been caught at times in the capital, they would have torn her to pieces. In the days of her parasite Machault, there were printed papers distributed about the streets of Paris, — "Rasez le Roi, pendez Pompadour, roulez Machault." And as for the Poissonades, as the bitter verses were called which were written against her, both Versailles and Paris were flooded with them.

To console her, however, somewhat for these violent pasquinades, Madame de Pompadour could have recourse to a large collection of verses of an opposite character, composed by her friends, men of letters and others. At the head of these was Voltaire, who burnt a good deal of coarse incense at her shrine, and was rewarded by being made historiographer of France, an academician, and gentleman ordinary of the chamber.

The Pompadour, indeed, never forgot the pleasant hours she had owed to men of letters before her arrival at her anomalous place of power, and she was willing to befriend any writer when she could. She would have done something for Rousseau, the Genevese owl, as she called him, had not his savage independence repelled her; though the letter which is commonly attributed to him, on the subject of a hundred louis rejected with indignation, is spurious. Marmontel, however, was her great favorite, and every Sunday he in company with the Abbé de Bernis, — afterwards Cardinal de Bernis, — and Duclos, paid her visits at her toilette at Versailles, and he was indebted to her for his seat in the Academy. She gave Piron, the author of the "Métromanie," "qui ne fut jamais rien," a pension of 1,000 francs.

Montesquieu was indebted to her for some acts of considerate kindness. Her protection of the publication of the "Encyclopédie" is well known. Musicians, sculptors, painters, architects, and artists of all kinds found in her liberal support. She was herself a clever draughtswoman, and engraved in a mediocre way on copper. On her former talent Voltaire made the best lines he ever wrote for her; they contain a "divin" or a "divine," of course: —

"Pompadour, ton crayon divin
Devrait dessiner ton visage:
Jamais une plus belle main N'aurait fait un plus joli ouvrage."

A good many of her engravings are preserved at the Bibliothèque Impériale in Paris.

Madame de Pompadour had barely been mistress of the king for two years when she began, like Madame de Maintenon with Louis XIV., to despair of her resources for amusing an unamusable king, and called in the theatre to her assistance. She remembered the success which she had achieved on the stage at Etioilles, and she proposed to establish, and succeeded in establishing, the theatre in the château, known as the "Théâtre des Petits Cabinets." To obtain a place among the audience, was one of the great objects of ambition at Versailles. The owners of the greatest names were refused, and the Maréchal Duc de Noailles, in consequence of a refusal, retired for some time in disgust from Versailles. Naturally, therefore, the honor of playing in the troupe was still more solicited. A certain Marquis de V — gave an important place to a dependant of Madame de Pompadour, on the sole condition that he should play the part of exempt de police in one of Molière's pieces. If we may trust accounts, the acting was universally good, not only in farces, vaudevilles, pastorales, &c., but in high comedy; and finally a tragedy of Voltaire's "Alzire," was triumphantly performed.

At the inauguration of this theatre, Madame de Pompadour not only sang and played in several parts, but encountered audaciously the perils of the ballet; and at the end of the performance, on one occasion, Louis said, enraptured, "Vous êtes la femme la plus charmante qu'il y ait en France."

The cost of this theatre was something frightful! In one year the accounts of the Duc de la Vrillière reached 280,208 livres. The king — who, after the first novelty had worn off, often yawned horribly at these performances — at last suppressed the theatre at Versailles, and it was transported to the château of the marquise at Bellevue.

The effect of the accounts of the performances on the public mind raised apprehensions, and it was supposed the monarch was influenced in his decision by the following passage, in a pamphlet of satirical sketches after the fashion of Labruyère: —

"Lindor, trop gêné dans sa grandeur pour prendre une fille de centimes, se satisfait en prince de son sang, — on lui bâtit une grande maison, on y élève près un théâtre où sa maîtresse devient danseuse en titre et en office; hommes entêtés de la vanité des sauteuses lauderelles, ne pensez pas que le dernier les Gyges soit mort en Lydie."

But the theatrical extravaganzas of Madame de Pompadour were nothing in comparison with the millions and millions she squandered away in buying estates, in altering or decorating old châteaux, in constructing new ones. Her largest château was at Crecy, but she had others at Compiègne, Fontainebleau, Saint Ouen, Montretent, La Celle Saint Cloud, at Bellevue, two at Versailles, two or three at Paris, of which one was the palace now known as the Elysée. Her last acquisition was the vast estate belonging to the Marquis de Menars, and she even contemplated purchasing the principality of Neuchâtel from the King of Prussia, as a place of retirement in case of disgrace, or the death of the king. The furniture of all these châteaux was, of course, of the most expensive kind. She was a mine of gold for the tapissiers of the time; and the fêtes she got up at her various residences for the amusement of a blasé king cost fabulous sums. Every effect that bright illuminations, fireworks, artificial water, gondolas and barges, mummeries and masquerades in silk and satin, and silver-spangled gauze and feathers, could produce, was tried upon the king, and very frequently without success.

She founded, however, two institutions, both of which have been beneficial to France. Of the first, the whole credit of invention and execution is due to herself,—the manufacture of porcelain at Sèvres. The other institution was the military school of the Champs de Mars.

The public hatred against the favorite increased with the duration of her reign, and rose to an alarming intensity during the disasters of the Seven Years' War, in spite of all the pains she took to increase the number of her partisans and flatterers. Madame de Pompadour now spoke of retiring to her estates. Even she felt overwhelmed with the public detestation. She never travelled at this time except well accompanied, and in her journey from Choisy to Versailles went in the middle of a squadron of horse-patrol. Louis himself began to feel a little. He exclaimed querulously, "On me nommait ci-devant le Bien-aimé; je suis aujourd'hui le Bien-hai." He made no attempt at reform, however, though the state of the public mind was such that he no longer ventured to cross Paris, and had a road made by which he might go to Compiègne without going through the capital. The road was called the Chemin de la Révolte, and still bears its name.

To console the marquise, she was allowed ducal honors at court, the tabouret in the presence of the queen, the ducal mantle to her coat of arms, and the velvet hampercloth to her carriage. The public execrations had their effect upon her, however; for she endeavored to change her position in respect to the king, and towards the court. She desired now to maintain only innocent relations with the sovereign, but had no thought of resigning her position as confidential friend and prime minister in petticoats, with her magnificent monopoly of state patronage. She wished, in fact, to preserve all the golden fruit of her immorality, and to have all the honor due to immaculate virtue.

She put in play an immense deal of hypocrisy and double-dealing to achieve her purpose, and, after one first great repulse, she partially succeeded. Her chief aim was to be named by the queen as one of her ladies of honor, after which the world could have nothing to say to her residence at Versailles. She made this request, but the queen naturally replied that she could not receive her, as she lived apart from her husband and never took the Communion. With every protestation of repentance, and of an intention to lead a devout life in future, Madame de Pompadour applied to a confessor,—no ordinary one, but a confessor of the order from which the kings and queens of France were wont to select their spiritual advisers,—a Jesuit, le Père de Sacy. But the Père de Sacy was inflexible. He refused to give her absolution. He declared that however innocent might be her actual relations with the king, yet her very presence at Versailles was a scandal on religion and on morality. Madame de Pompadour was irritated against the confessor and his order, and dismissed him; and hence arose one of the causes of grievance which induced her to support Choiseul in the expulsion of the Jesuits from France.

However, in the end, she accomplished all she wished; for the first objection any confessor would make to her would be that she had left her husband. She contrived, by a hypocritical letter of repentance to M. d'Etiolles, and an offer to return, to extract a refusal from him to receive her. It is true she had him warned beforehand, by M. de Soubise, that the king would be much displeased if he accepted her offer; but this did not operate at all with M. le Normant d'Etiolles, who, since he had been driven by her conduct to sanction illegitimate connections, had become passionately attached to a lady of the Opera. M. d'Etiolles said he wholly forgave his wife, but could not possibly receive her back. Madame la Marquise was now a triumphant, repentant creature. She had done all she could to repair her little sins, and, with all the confidence of rejected virtue, she secured a more convenient confessor, who gave her absolution and the sacrament, and the queen was outwitted,—for the only two objections she could make to the Pompadour's request were thus answered. She was presented, consequently, to the queen, after her nomination to a place in her household, in 1756. But the next year she was in a greater danger than ever of losing her position, on the occasion of the wound received by the king from the hands of the assassin Damiens.

She expected every moment to receive orders to start, for she knew the king had a horror of dying in a state of mortal sin. She was deserted by all the world but her brother, who had become through her influence the Marquis de Marigny, Madame du Hausset her femme de chambre, and the Abbé de Bernis. Machault, the garde des sceaux, who owed his advancement entirely to her, observed that the king never mentioned her name, and took care to avoid her until he received word from the king to give commands to Madame de Pompadour to leave forthwith.

Her agitation was horrible. Orange-flower water was given her, to soothe her, in a silver cup; for her teeth clinched together so convulsively that she would have crushed a glass. Another hour, and Versailles and its splendors and the golden millions of France would exist no more for her. Her part was played out. No marvel so ambitious a nature ground her teeth in nervous desperation. Nevertheless, in this agony of grief, her trunks had to be packed up. The carriages were ordered, and the coachmen were on the boxes, when la petite maréchale,—the wily, little, unscrupulous Maréchale de Mireport,—the bosom-friend and confidante of the Pompadour,—she who is said to have taken cherry-stones from the Pompadour's mouth as she ate cherries one day in her carriage, to save the favorite's gloves, entered, and cried, "What's all this? What do these trunks mean? . . . Qui quitte la partie la perd." And the marquise remained to triumph once more over all her enemies.

A comment on this crisis of the Pompadour's career is to be found in the correspondence of the Cardinal de Bernis with M. de Choiseul, — both her creatures, and both afterwards prime ministers by her choice. The virtuous indignation of the ecclesiastic at the enmity of the court to his patroness is edifying: —

"Le roi a été assassiné, et la cour n'a vu dans cet affreux événement qu'un moment favorable de chasser notre amie. Toutes les intrigues ont été déployées auprès du confesseur. Il y a une tribu à la cour qui attend toujours l'extrême-onction pour tâcher emprunter son crédit. Pourquoi faut-il que la dévotion soit si séparée de la vertu? Notre amie ne peut plus scandaliser que les sots et les fripons. Il est de notoriété publique que l'amitié, depuis cinq ans, a pris la place de la galanterie. C'est une vraie cagoterie de remonter dans le passé pour l'innocence de la liaison actuelle: elle est fondée sur la nécessité d'ouvrir son âme à une amie éprouvée et sûre, et qui dans la division du ministère est le seul pont de réunion. Que d'ingrats j'ai vus, mon cher comte, et combien notre siècle est corrompu!"

But such agonizing emotions, — the intense anxiety and watchfulness of her daily life, the never-ending fatigue and weariness which the necessity of being, at every moment, "up to the mark," which her position required, — was daily telling frightfully on the marquise. She herself said that her life was terrible, — "C'est un combat." She was, in fact, from morning to night, dancing the tight-rope over a fall to her as horrible as that of Niagara; and the rope, too, might be cut at any moment. She gave way sometimes, and sank down in floods of tears before her brother or Madame du Hausset. She was, however, resolved to die game; and if we can admire spirit and a defiant independence, minus morality, the Pompadour has a right to be admired.

The faded favorite became so ill at last that she was a pitiable object. All the fine lines of her form, the childlike roundness and softness of her limbs, the infantine freshness of her features had passed away.

She was a mere skeleton, — all elbows, and shoulder-blades, and collar-bones; and her smooth, pure cheek and forehead were channelled by care, fatigue, and pain, with hideous wrinkles, which she tried to conceal with a thick crust of artificial white and red. All that remained of her old beauty was to be found in her fine brown eyes, which grew larger and more brilliant with the decay of her person and the emaciation of her face. Alarming symptoms followed close on each other with increasing gravity. The palpitation of the heart became so violent that she had fits of suffocation, till at last her energetic will could no longer support her enfeebled, diseased form, and on a visit to Choisy she was obliged to give way and take to her bed. Louis XV., to do him justice, did not show himself unfeeling as long as she lived. On the contrary, he paid her every attention, and consulted her on public affairs up to the last; and after he had left Choisy for Versailles, the duty of the first gentleman of the chamber was to bring him news of the health of the dying favorite. It was only after she was dead that he made the unfeeling speech which has been recorded of him; and, bad as the man was, it is clear he often said worse things than he meant out of sheer cynical bravado.

The doctors who were called in gave her a slight respite, during which stage of amelioration she was brought to her apartment at Versailles; but everybody and, with others, she herself knew that her case was hopeless. She met death with great courage, regarding it, after all, as a deliverance from a life which it was impossible to continue; while her presence of mind and her head for business never failed her up to the last. She received her friends graciously as long as she had breath; and made one of them a present of a gold snuff-box, engraved with verses she had composed a day or two before. On the very morning of her death, being warned of her approaching end, she read over her long will and codicils attentively, and dictated a fresh codicil with a number of additional legacies to friends. She had named the Prince de Soubise, her unfortunate general in the Seven Years' War and closest male friend of twenty years' standing, her executor. After this she had herself dressed, had some rouge put on her cheeks, and prepared to receive death as she would have received the king. The chief Master of the Post-Office, who daily made reports to her of secret correspondence, came and was received as usual, — "pour travailler avec elle."

On the departure of the gentleman from the Post-Office, the curé of the Madeleine de la Ville l'Evêque, at Paris, was introduced. She accounted herself his parishioner, since her hôtel was in his neighborhood. She talked cheerfully to him for some moments, and, as he was about to go, detained him with a smile, saying, "Un moment, Monsieur le Curé; nous nous en irons ensemble." She died very shortly after this pretty speech, at the age of forty-two years and six months.

As for Louis XV., the queen wrote to the President Hainault, a few days after, "Au reste, il n'est non plus question ici 'de ce qui n'est plus,' que si elle n'avait jamais existé. Voilà le monde; c'est bien la peine de l'aimer." Indeed, the king had long ceased to think of her as anything else than an encumbrance. He was tired of her, but had not had the courage to send her away, convinced that a dismissal would be to her a death-blow. He had wept himself ill for Madame de Vintunille, and had wept also for Madame de Châteauroux and Madame de Mailly; but he had not a tear for the Pompadour. Perhaps he reproached her for having made him what he was, — the most despised king in Europe; and this he certainly would not have become under the management of either of his former mistresses, — for all the Nesles had some grandeur of soul. The property of Madame de Pompadour, all with the exception of the legacies, went to her brother, the Marquis de Marigny, who was the most estimable member of her family, and who died childless; after which it went to a relative who had formerly been a drummer in the army, but for whose advancement she had provided in her lifetime. The quantity of furniture she left was so enormous that the sale of it lasted a year, and the auction-room where it was sold was the great sight of Paris during all that time. "It seemed," says a writer, "that all the regions of the earth had paid tribute to the extravagance of the marchioness."

The body of the worn-out favorite was deposited in a vault at the church of the Capuchins, in the Place Vendôme, which she had purchased from the great family De la Trémouille, where she had then lived, to have herself buried alive if the king should leave her. She had already deposited there her mother and her daughter; and, as the Princess de Talmont said, the great bones of the La Trémouille family must have been astonished at finding themselves in company with the fish-bones — les arêtes — of the Poissons. Many pretty epitaphs were made for her, of course, and some, indeed, of a character not presentable in the present day, notwithstanding their drapery in Latin hexameters. It would be unjust, even to the memory of a light woman, to leave out of account that part of the mental agony which wore her to a skeleton, arising undoubtedly from remorse at the ill success of her political schemes, and for the calamities of the Austrian alliance, and the Seven Years' War which she brought upon her country. And it would be unjust not to state that in later years she strung the whole forces of her nature to endeavor to repair some of the mischief she had done, and to open a career of victory for France. But as she had exiled all the most capable advisers of the crown from the Government, and was served only by the servile and the incapable, her own maceration was of little use to her country. England, however, owes a great deal to Madame de Pompadour, for Chat-ham had free play over the whole world with the Pompadour as petticoat minister of France.

• THE GERMAN WÖRTERBUCH.

THE great "Wörterbuch," or dictionary of the German language, set on foot by the Brothers Grimm has now reached about the midway of its course towards completion. It is seventeen years since the first instalment appeared, and its progress has been carried on continuously and methodically ever since. The work itself forms an important era, not only in the history of German literature, but in that of other European nations also, and it is not uninteresting to glance back over some particulars of its origin and execution, as we find them stated in a recent number of the German periodical, the Gartenlaube.

In 1837, seven professors of Göttingen University had to give up their chairs, and quit the territories of Hanover on account of the part they took in upholding the Constitution against the arbitrary measures of King Ernest. Among these were Jacob and William Grimm, both deeply skilled students in philological lore, whose researches had led them into much curious discovery concerning the antiquities of the German language. The leisure which was now thrust upon them found them happily provided with a subject of literary interest which their professional duties would never have left them time to prosecute. At the suggestion of the publishing firm of Wiedmann, they undertook the compilation of an exhaustive dictionary, which was to embrace the history of every word used in German literature since the time of Luther inclusive, giving its origin, its derivation, and its different applications and modifications, as the individual mind of different writers or the changes of custom may have produced them, the terminus ad quem of the range of inquiry being fixed at the end of the third decade of the present century. Some years after their expulsion from Hanover, the King of Prussia gave the Brothers Grimm seats in the Academy of Sciences at Berlin; and the first instalment of their dictionary, which was published in 1852, had thus the advantage of appearing with more honor than if it had issued from their comparative retirement at Cassel.

Fourteen years had been taken up with preparations for the work. The result, as seen in this first instalment, fully justified the pains with which the material had been collected and sifted. The method pursued was this. The brothers took a general survey of all known authors, great and small, who had contributed to German literature since the era of the Reformation. They then made application to a vast number of students throughout Germany, requesting them to read such or such books carefully, and annotate or extract for the purpose in hand. Many offered their services spontaneously; and it was a proof of the national interest excited by the project that among the volunteers were literary men of the most diverse opinions, provinces, professions, and tastes. Jacob Grimm, in his preface to the first published part, enumerates no less than eighty-three coadjutors in this way. Then special directions were forwarded to each. On a piece of paper of prescribed size and shape he was to set down each word which struck him as employed by his author in any way unusual, characteristic, or for any reason worthy of attention; and with it the passage, prose or verse, in which it had occurred.

After a while, a mighty mass of material poured into headquarters, from east, west, north, and south, — about a million of billets in all, it is roughly computed. To sort them was the next business, and to arrange them under alphabetical heads. Two men were thus employed during a period of six months, working from early morning to late evening, collecting for each word the various citations applicable to it, and fastening them in a bundle together, then placing the whole in two gigantic chests ready for the further process of deciding the proportion of quotations and authorities to be retained, and tracing chronologically and otherwise the shades and transitions of meaning. The genius and taste of individual writers had to be considered as influencing the value to be attached to their testimony. Of the authors in the sixteenth century, with which the range of investigation begins, the greatest weight is attached to Luther, to Hans Sachs, and to the remarkable satirist, Fischart, who, indeed, for this early period of the literature, is considered the most valuable of all. The seventeenth century, a period of stagnation, or rather of retrogression in Germany, owing to the effects of the Thirty Years' War, furnishes no more eminent authorities in the use of language than Gryphius, Opitz, and Lenau; while for the eighteenth century the foremost rank is assigned to Lessing, Jean Paul, and Schiller. On the whole, the three authors most carefully collated and analyzed for the purpose of determining the changes and legitimate uses of the written language are Fischart, Luther, and Goethe.

For a time much doubt was entertained as to the practical success of the scheme. It was thought too vast in its proportions to be carried out by men who, like Jacob Grimm and his brother, had other pressing literary avocations to occupy their time, and the appearance of the first part of it in print was something of a surprise to the sceptical. In 1854, however, a whole volume was completed and published; in 1860 a second made its appearance; in 1862 a third. Soon after this, Jacob Grimm, the chief promoter and manager of the undertaking, died; he had been preceded a short time before by his brother, his inseparable companion throughout almost the whole of life, but had labored on with undiminished energy, till, while occupied with the word "Frucht," he, too, was called away.

Happily, the impetus given by these famous scholars did not die with them. Their undertaking was carried on with vigor by the contributors they had enlisted in the task. Hildebrand, of Leipsic, Weigand, of Giessen, and Moritz Heyne, of Halle, have had the chief hand in it since. Professor Hildebrand is now busily occupied with the letter K.

No similar work had previously existed in the literature of any other nation. The Great Dictionary of the Paris Academy came nearest to it, perhaps, in importance; but then the Paris dictionary was a record of words in legitimate use only, — a kind of statute-book of the French language. The labors of the Grimms were directed to the compilation of a historical repertory of words present and past in all their changes. But the idea has worked by example on other nations since. The Dutch literati are engaged on a "Woordenboek der Nederlandsche Taal," the tenth volume of which appeared last year; and the French Academy have published two numbers of a "Dictionnaire Historique de la Langue Française," which, however, since 1865, has stood still at the word "Actuellement." Another French dictionary, by Littré, on the same plan, is making more rapid progress, having reached its twentieth part and the word "Perdre." Of the English dictionary projected on so grand a scale by Archbishop (then Dean) Trench and the Philological Society, we fear there is nothing but an account of unfulfilled promise to be recorded.

The German "Wörterbuch" has been restricted throughout to the "High" German dialect, the "Low" German being left aside as material for a separate dictionary; but during the progress of the work a much more varied range of the High German has been included than was at first contemplated; the spoken as well as the written language has been taken into account. Moreover, the range of time has been extended backwards, many examples being now taken from the mediæval and Gothic forms. There is, consequently, a defect of symmetry in the work, and an inevitable incompleteness, for the spoken uses of the language, past and present, must needs be too manifold, too changing, and too evanescent to admit of perfectly faithful registration. These, however, are but small drawbacks to set against the eminent merits of this grand monument of German nationality.

FOREIGN NOTES.

A NEW opera by Flotow is proposed at the Théâtre Lyrique, Paris, in the autumn.

A COUSIN of Miss Ada Menkin is said to be a candidate for the lesseeship of Astley's Theatre, London.

A BLIND pianist, gifted with an astonishing memory, is exciting wonder, the Musical Standard states, in the musical circles of St. Petersburg.

THE English papers agree in calling the Derby this year a very dull Derby, a race on which most people lost their money, in which there was no surprise, and by which no first-class noble was hopelessly ruined. Nobody even committed a swindle big enough to be written about, and nobody was quite killed either by the roughs or the horsemen. It must have been dull indeed!

LORD RIBBLESDALE writes to the Times stating that a picture executed by himself has been refused by the Royal Academy. Sir Francis Grant, in another letter, admits the soft impeachment, but says that the Academicians were not aware that the rejected work proceeded from his lordship's hands.

A LARGE room has been discovered at Herculaneum which must have served for a kitchen. In it was a wooden clothes-press, entirely carbonized; also 14 vases, a candelabrum, and a lamp, all in bronze, several vessels in glass and terra-cotta; a small marble statue of a fawn, and two broken tables, one in marble and the other in slate. These excavations are carried on by means of the grant of $6,000 by King Victor Emmanuel, made for that object.

"THE Association of Dramatic Authors," says the Gazette, "is likely to be called on to settle a difference between Madame Rossini and M. Pacini. The lady had sold for 150,000 fr. the copyright of 160 pieces of music left by her husband, but the other, who is the author of the words belonging to the greater part of these compositions, naturally claimed a part of the money. The widow, however, refused to recognize his claim, on the ground that the words would be of no value without the music. M. Pacini is determined to maintain his rights. M. Pacini quotes from Hamlet, reiterating, —

"Words, words, words!"

FOR many months the papers have been full of suggestions as to the uses to which velocipedes could be turned, but the boldest innovators will be surprised to hear that the new-fangled vehicle has actually made its appearance in the bull-fighting ring. In the circus at Nîmes, the picadors appeared last week mounted on velocipedes instead of horses, and displayed such skill in the management of their iron steeds that the astounded bull was unable to dismount a single one of them. Should this fashion become universal in bull-fighting countries, the gain to common humanity will be undoubtedly great, but it is feared that the increased expense will prove an insurmountable obstacle to its general adoption, a single velocipede being worth, as a rule, at least half a dozen of the wretched horses yearly disembowelled by hundreds for the amusement of the fair ladies of Madrid and Seville.

THE London Examiner and Review, in a discriminating and highly eulogistic paper on Mr. Forster's biography of Walter Savage Landor, remarks: "Whoever chooses to read the book itself — and no one who has the slightest sympathy with literature or any curiosity in studying extreme developments of character will fail to do so — will see at once that we have ample guarantee for all that we mean to say in its favor. He will find the vague misrepresentations and guesses that have hitherto hung about the interpretations of Savage Landor's life and character dispelled by a clear, accurate, and remarkably frank narrative, in which one is no less struck by the largeness and interest of the theme than by the courage and honesty of the narrator. At the outset there is one circumstance that must have favored Mr. Forster in his laborious task. Not many of Savage Landor's contemporaries survive. Although it is but a few years since the tidings of his death came over to us from Italy, the first day of this century saw him a young man of twenty-five. He belonged to the last generation, — to the period of Wordsworth, Shelley, Byron, Coleridge, and their fellow-men of letters, whose names and lives have already become picturesque to us. A biographer, therefore, had much liberty in writing of the personal surroundings of a man who had thus outlived his contemporaries; and, especially in the case of Landor, some such liberty was highly desirable.

A PHENOMENON of the most extraordinary nature has lately been witnessed by the inhabitants of the borders of the Caspian Sea. This huge salt lake is dotted with numerous islands which produce yearly a large quantity of naphtha, and it is no uncommon occurrence for fires to break out in the works and burn for many days before they can be extinguished. Early last month, owing to some subterraneous disturbances, enormous quantities of this inflammable substance were projected from the naphtha wells, and spread over the entire surface of the water, and, becoming ignited, notwithstanding every precaution, converted the whole sea into the semblance of a gigantic flaming punch-bowl, many thousands of square miles in extent. The fire burnt itself out in about forty-eight hours, leaving the surface strewn with the dead bodies of innumerable fishes. Herodotus mentions a tradition that the same phenomenon was once before observed by the tribes inhabiting the shores of the Caspian Sea.

THE right for women to vote is possessed more extensively than is commonly supposed. In Austria women can vote as nobles, in their corporate capacity as nuns, and as taxpayers. In some cases, however, they vote by proxy. In Hungary, up to 1848, widows and single women who were landed proprietors possessed the right to vote. They were deprived of it by the revolutionary government, and are now petitioning for the restoration of this right. In Canada, as in several of our own States, women are allowed to vote for and serve as school trustees. In the British Australian colony of Victoria women universally assumed the right to vote about four years ago, having found that the law had been so framed as to permit them. In Sweden, chiefly through the exertions of the late Fredrika Bremer, an indirect right of voting was in 1862 granted to all women possessing specified property qualifications. In Italy a widow, or wife separated from her husband, may vote if she pays taxes. Also in Holland, single women possessing property are entitled to vote on all questions likely to affect its value. In many towns in France women possess and exercise the right to vote in municipal affairs.

THE Pall Mall Gazette calls attention to one of the penalties of great wealth. "Now that Mr. Peabody is no longer in England" says the editor, "the begging letter-writers will have the opportunity of concentrating their attention on some other victim. If Mr. Peabody chose to be communicative upon the subject, he could set before the world a moving picture of the miseries of a philanthropist. Everybody thinks he has a right to persecute him for money. The man whose goods are about to be seized for rent, the broken-down actor who wants ten pounds till next Monday, the gentleman who has gone into a rash speculation and burned his fingers, — these, and a thousand others, think that a man like Mr. Peabody is bound to help them. The world has no gratitude and no sympathy for the benevolent. Its cry is ever 'give, give,' until at last it is strange if the philanthropist does not turn into a misanthropist. Nine tenths of the letters he opens are applications for money. Whenever he appears in public he is followed by importunate cries for relief. If he goes out to dinner, the lady whom he takes down pesters him about that very deserving family in whom she takes an interest. He dare not have many personal friends, because they are sure to expect him to do something for Tommy or Annie. When people are attentive to him he knows that they expect to be well paid for it. Mr. Peabody has given away £ 350,000 to the poor of London, and about £ 200,000 for the establishment of schools and charitable institutions in the United States, besides large sums in private charity. But all this only encourages the harpies who would rather do anything for a living than work. The abject, fawning, worthless set who hang upon the skirts of those who are reputed to be rich give him no peace. It would be useless to appeal to their better feelings, for they have none, but we wish it were possible to place some of their names before the public eye as a caution to the rest of their tribe."

A FRENCH author has published an elaborate treatise to reassure nervous invalids who fancy that under the existing law, which prescribes interment twenty-four hours after decease, there is an increased chance of their being buried alive. It appears that 60,000 corpses have passed through the well-known establishment at Frankfort, where, on payment of a certain sum, dead bodies are kept for several days before being finally consigned to the tomb, surrounded by every appliance necessary to discover the faintest traces of lingering animation, and that no single case of resurrection has been known to occur; and it is affirmed that since the institution of duly qualified "inspecteurs de morts" at Paris, premature burial has become practically impossible. Still, should this be true with regard to the capital, it is hardly probable that equally trustworthy inspectors are to be found in every department, and the rule of precipitate interment prevails throughout the length and breadth of the land. Even admitting the skill of the inspectors, it is a disputed question whether it is possible to pronounce an absolutely safe verdict before decomposition sets in. Monsieur Flourens has demonstrated that "curare," the preparation used by the savages of South America to poison their arrows, paralyzes the nerves of motion, leaving those of sensation intact. All action, even breathing, is suspended; consciousness alone survives. But although death pervades the whole organization, except the brain, in such a manner as to deceive the most skillful physician, revival is still possible, and it is admitted by many great authorities that the same effects may, in rare instances, be produced by natural causes. At the last sitting of the Academy, for the reception of the celebrated Claude Bernard, reference was made to Monsieur Flourens's experiments; that the result was not called into question, is scarcely comforting for nervous patients. The French law rests on the assumption that if a man gives no sign of life he is dead, or ought to be, and hurries him to the grave as long as he is unable to make any objection.

THE Paris correspondent of the London Star finds time amid the excitement of the French elections to pen this bit of social gossip: "You will remember the sensation produced last spring by the Duke of Beaufremont having been warned by a fair friend of the danger he was in of being poisoned by means of a bon-bon to be offered to him at one of the bals de l'opera. The duke left Paris after the affair. His name has come again before the public in consequence of his wife pleading for separation de corps et de biens. The duchess, née Valentine de Chimay, was still at the convent where she was educated when her consent to her marriage was asked by telegraph. The young heiress, flattered by the prospect of becoming the wife of a distinguished officer, consented by the same unromantic mode of transit. Immediately after the wedding ceremony she accompanied her husband, with whom she fell desperately in love, to the various garrisons where he was quartered, followed him on all possible occasions, and especially appears to have risked her health by taking long and fatiguing rides in his company. Two children were successively born, when the Mexican war gave the duke a pretext to separate himself from her. The duchess took her children to her château near Nanteuil, where, during his absence, she acted as agent and superintendent of the property, writing by every mail long and admirable reports of the improvements she was carrying out on the estate. Her attachment unfortunately never diminished, although in her family the duke's flagrant infidelity was perfectly known. Her anxiety for him during the Mexican campaign impaired her health, and immense was her joy when the return of the expedition was announced. With nervous impatience she awaited the telegram which would bring her the glad tidings of her husband's return. All her illusions soon revived and even strengthened in her absence. She conjured visions of renewed and eternal happiness. At last the anxiously expected missive reached her chateau. It was dated, not from St. Nazaire, where the troops had landed, but from Paris, and ran thus: 'I cannot find any shirts; inform me by telegram where you have put them. — (Signed) BEAUFFREMONT.'

ARTHUR HELPS, in one of his Short Essays, says: "Of all the resources of government, none are so wastefully employed as their powers of conferring honor. This is true of nearly all countries. In Great Britain the waste is not occasioned by profusion, but by caprice, uncertainty, irrelevancy. The king (it was in George III.'s time) is asked to give a right of going through the park to some gentleman. 'No, no,' replies the king, 'I cannot do that; but you may make him an Irish baron.' The above is not an unfavorable specimen of the way in which honors have been granted.

"There are many points worthy of notice as regards this subject.

"First, there is the foolish idea that men do not care for honors. This is an entire mistake. There is nothing in the world they care for more.

"Then there is the delusion that the granting of many honors would weaken the value of them. At present, when what few honors are granted are given for the most trivial and inadequate reasons, these honors have anything but their full value. Of course, it takes away from the value of a peerage when a man is made a peer because he is rich, and because he has fought party battles in his county or his borough, with liberality and vigor. Everybody feels that that is not a service done to the state; and accordingly the honor loses much of its value and its dignity.

"The same with knighthood. If that honor is given as a mere formality because a man has presented an address, or has received a sovereign at dinner, the honor in question is proportionately lowered.

"Then it is said, and this is a favorite argument of men in power, that if you oblige one man by giving him an honor, you disoblige three or four persons who think that they have exactly similar claims. There is some truth in this, but it must be remembered that you keep all those three or four persons in a state of hopeful expectation that if they work on, they, too, will eventually gain the honor. There is no telling the quantity of good service that a government might get from people, if these people only saw that they had a fair chance of receiving honor for good service. And frequently there is no other way of paying them, for they do not want money. Now, as the tendency in modern times is to make government more and more difficult, it behooves government to husband all its resources, and to make the best use of them.

"I pass to another head of the subject. A state which has many colonies should seek to win its eminent colonists, and to knit the infant to the parent state by a careful distribution of honors in these colonies. When an eminent colonist can say, not merely civis Anglicanus sum, but eques Anglicanus sum, depend upon it, he is sure to become an attached citizen to the imperial government. The Privy Council of England should be enriched and enlightened by the introduction into it of some of the most distinguished colonists, who, when in this country, should be able, as it were, to have some voice in the government.

"Now to another branch of the subject. Why should we chiefly honor and dignify the members of one or two professions or callings, to the exclusion of the rest? Why should many lawyers and soldiers be promoted to honor, while doctors and surgeons, men of science, men of letters, great merchants, great employers of labor, distinguished civil servants, are for the most part left out in the cold? In France they could have their Baron Dupuytren, while in England there is not an instance of a great medical man being raised to the peerage, though it is said Sir Astley Cooper much desired that honor.

"Again, as to men of science, art, and literature, people say it would be so difficult to found an order of merit for such men. I cannot see it. It appears to me that the world knows very well, or nearly well enough, who are the distinguished men in science, art, and literature. Some mistakes would of course be made; but, upon the whole, the public would take care that the dispensers of honors to this class of men should not go far wrong.

"There is another very important point connected with this subject, namely; that this just dispensation of honors would tend to correct the inordinate craving after wealth, which is the sin and sorrow of the present day. Moreover, it would tend to correct the frantic desire of getting into Parliament which besets so many men who are unfit for that vocation, but who discern in it the only way of arriving at personal honor and social distinction."

AMERICAN FEELING TOWARDS ENGLAND.

BY EDWARD DICKEY.

WHAT is public opinion, is a question wellnigh as difficult of solution as Pilate's famous query about truth. In both instances, we can only hope to arrive at an approximative answer; and in offering this contribution to the stock of knowledge on the vexed question of the feeling of America towards England, I do not profess any absolute conviction as to the correctness of my theory. All I can say is, that for many years I have enjoyed somewhat unusual facilities for forming an opinion upon American affairs; and that my opinion, be it sound or erroneous, is based upon a knowledge of the subject-matter not possessed by most English writers on trans-Atlantic questions. The subject is far too wide a one to be treated in a short essay. All I can hope to do now is to throw some little light upon the extent to which the public opinion of America is represented by Mr. Sumner's speech, and the reasons why it is so represented. It is certainly not my wish to put myself forward as an apologist of that remarkable piece of declamation. Judging it, in so far as an Englishman can, from an impartial point of view, it seems to me false in fact, feeble in argument, turgid in diction, and dishonest in spirit. At the same time, I am forced to the conclusion that the majority of the senator's English assailants have hardly read the document on which their strictures were founded. Had they done so, they would not have failed to see that the speech is in no sense of the "stand and deliver" order, commonly assigned to it in this country. Mr. Sumner, it should be borne in mind, was arguing for the rejection of the Stanley-Johnson treaty, on the ground that it failed utterly to afford reparation for the wrongs which, in his judgment, America had sustained at the hands of England; and in support of his argument he asserts that, if abstract justice could be consulted, England ought to make a formal apology, and to indemnify America for half the outlay of the secession war. But he never proposes, either directly or indirectly, that this claim should be enforced, or even officially asserted. To say, when you have no adequate reason for so saying, that if you could have your rights you would be owner of all the Grosvenor estates, may be a very objectionable and dishonest proceeding; but it is by no means identical with bringing a suit of ejectment against the Marquis of Westminster. I have been told on authority, which ought to be correct, that immediately after the delivery of his address, Mr. Sumner stated to a friend that he had made a very pacific speech; and this statement, odd as it may seem to us, was, I have no doubt, made in honesty. That Mr. Sumner might use language calculated to bring about a collision between England and America, is possible enough; but that he should wilfully counsel a war between the two countries is a fact not easily to be credited by those to whom his private character and his public career are alike familiar. Indeed, after an indirect fashion, Mr. Sumner's speech may actually have a pacific tendency. Americans will, I fancy, be more inclined to listen to reason, now that their national feelings have been gratified by a distinct and outspoken utterance of their real or alleged grievances. The gain to the interests of peace is assuredly of a doubtful advantage; but this much is certain, that the utterances of Mr. Reverdy Johnson had created an amount of popular irritation across the Atlantic, which could only be allayed by some such vehement protest as that of which the senator for Massachusetts has made himself the mouthpiece.

It will be seen from this that in my judgment Mr. Sumner has expressed not unfaithfully the common sentiment of the mass of his countrymen. I regret that this should be so; but upon an issue like the one now separating England and America there is no good to be secured by representing facts as other than they are. At the same time, unless I am mistaken, Mr. Sumner, and the section of the American nation to which he belongs, are animated by an especial irritability towards England, which is not shared by the common American public. Mr. Sumner is not only a New Englander, but he is a New Englander of that class whom it is the fashion in English society to talk of as "the best type of Americans"; and amongst that class the irritation against this country for its sins, both of commission and omission, is to be found in its highest stage of development.

Within the last few weeks I have constantly heard sensible Englishmen talk in perfect good faith about Mr. Sumner's ingratitude, because, after having received so much civility when he was a visitor in this country, he has made a speech which he must have known would be displeasing to England. The feeling which lies at the bottom of this assertion explains much of the irritability to which I allude. Lord Stanley has visited the United States; and I have no doubt that his lordship was entertained by the principal citizens of the towns he sojourned at, was elected a member of the clubs, was introduced to everybody worth knowing, was made at home in house after house, was treated, in fact, with that frank, cordial hospitality of which America nowadays seems to me to have preserved the monopoly. But if Lord Stanley was to make a strong anti-American speech in Parliament, anybody would be laughed at, and rightly laughed at, who talked about his ingratitude. Yet the two cases are exactly parallel; and the only difference consists in a latent conviction of the English mind that Mr. Sumner, like any other distinguished American visitor, is not quite the equal of the English grantees who showed him civility. And this same sense of half-conscious superiority pervades all our intercourse with our American cousins. I have constantly known Americans congratulated in English society on not looking at all like Americans; I have heard English people, when wishing to be polite, inform Americans that they had once met some countryman of theirs, who was really quite like a gentleman; and so on. These are small matters, but straws serve to show which way the wind blows; and, I think, any one who tries to look impartially at the relations of the two countries will admit that in all our official as well as private intercourse with America, we are influenced by an unfortunate persuasion that, at the best, Americans are an inferior order of Englishmen. New Americans are keenly alive to the existence of this conviction on our part; and the class who feel it most acutely are exactly the men whom we describe as "the best type of Americans"; that is, in other words, the type most like ourselves. In the ecclesiastical dictionary of Dr. Farquhar Hook, there will be found, unless my memory deceives me, a statement, under the head "Moravian," to the effect that some divines have thought this sect was the less to be condemned inasmuch as in their doctrines and rituals they approached closely to those of the orthodox Anglican faith. This, however, we are told, is an error; on the contrary, the Moravians are the more to be condemned, because, having approached so nearly to the truth, they have not attained to it. Now I have often thought that in political matters we share the theological views of Dr. Hook on the subject of Moravians. We deem the Americans worthy of even greater condemnation than ordinary foreigners, because being approached so closely to the one orthodox English type they have not quite attained thereto; and that we do so condemn them the Americans themselves are well aware.

Moreover, if you desire to deal out equal justice to each side alike, you must fairly own that New England entertains towards the mother-country a kind of perpetual soreness, for whose existence England can hardly be said to be responsible. Mr. Seward, during the early stages of the war, when the anti-English feeling was very strong in the States, said to an informant of mine, who remonstrated with him on the popular injustice of ignoring all offences that proceeded from France, "Well, the plain truth is, that we do not care a cent about any country but England"; and the saying, though true about the whole Union, is especially true about the old sea-board States. England is the public from whom the educated and intellectual class of Americans desires recognition; and the unfriendliness, and still more the indifference, of this public constitute a real source of grievance to a sensitive people. In the eyes of the world at large England intellectually overshadows America. The men of Massachusetts may claim, with abstract justice, that they are as much entitled as the men of Kent to the glories of Shakespeare and Bacon and Milton; but the claim, somehow is not acknowledged. When the great Anglo-Saxon firm dissolved partnership, the partners who kept possession of the old premises, who continued to enter their accounts in the same old books, and who retained the old name of the house, were regarded by the customers of the business as the sole representatives of the grand old concern. It could not be otherwise; and the great mass of the American nation are perfectly well satisfied with the new connection they have formed, but New England still cherishes the conviction that, if justice were done, she would share with the mother-country the glory of the past, while she would reserve to herself the promise of the future. Moreover, the world of which Boston is the centre prides itself among its own people for its literary and intellectual pre-eminence. The pride, as far as America is concerned, is well-grounded enough; but it is not equally well-grounded if the "Hub of the Universe" be considered as part and parcel of the English speaking and reading community. Without denying for one moment the high achievements of a certain number of New England intellectual celebrities, it is patent to impartial judges that in the world of English letters, art, and science, England is still the capital, New England only a province. And, as usual, the capital ignores the province, and the province resents bitterly the indifference of the capital, all the more galling because it is unconscious.

Then, again, apart from these sentimental grievances, Massachusetts and its sister States have causes for resentment towards the mother-country not shared in to the same extent by the other sections of the Republic. The sufferings of the wars of independence and of 1812 fell with especial heaviness on the New England States. You would hardly find a family there which has not the tradition of some personal injury sustained in times past at the hands of Great Britain. The exploits, the sufferings of the Revolutionary era are preserved more faithfully in New England memories than elsewhere in the Union, and these recollections are all tinged with the anti-British feeling of the early days of the century. In many respects New England is far ahead of the rest of the United States. In culture, in education, in orderly freedom, in popular government, in moral character, and in earnestness of purpose, it stands on a different level from the less-advanced communities of the South and West. By no means unconscious of this superiority, New England is at the same time fanatically attached to the great Union, whose manifest destiny it is to rule one day over the whole of the North American continent. Yet while New Englanders would be bitterly offended if they were not recognized as Americans they are also offended if the outer world, and especially the English outer world, fails to recognize the fact that they are not like other Americans; and the result is, that the sneers about Yankee rowdiness and Yankee vulgarity, which always find so hearty a welcome in the mother-country, are resented by New England with a bitterness not felt by the rougher and ruder States of the Union, to whom, as far as they apply at all, they attach rightly. Somehow or other, partly of malice prepense, partly out of ignorance, we have gone on "sticking pins," to use an Americanism, into New England; and we can hardly wonder if we have been successful in producing irritation. Moreover, the anti-slavery party, which represents a very influential section of New England society, has especial reasons for unfriendliness towards this country. For many years the American abolitionists maintained a rather close connection with England, of a kind that could hardly fail to be associated with painful recollections. An American might deem slavery a sin and a shame, but yet he resented hearing his country held up to infamy by foreigners as a nation of slaveholders. For the sake of the real or supposed benefit to their cause arising from English anti-slavery support, the abolitionists put up with a great deal of sympathy, which was unpleasantly like patronage; and yet for so doing they incurred amongst their countrymen the stigma of being wanting in patriotism. And when the crisis came, — when the cause of the Union became identical with the cause of emancipation, — and when it was found that anti-slavery England stood aloof from the North, the American abolitionists — the party of which Mr. Sumner was the political leader — joined in the anti-English cry with an eagerness intensified by the memory of bygone humiliations sustained in consequence of their quondam connection with England.

Thus, if my own view is correct, you will find the anti-English feeling developed most strongly amongst the old anti-slavery section of the cultivated class in the New England States. From this class have come most of the visitors with whom English society is familiar, and to whom we think we are paying a compliment when we describe them as "the best type of Americans." This feeling does not militate against the utmost kindness and good-will towards individual Englishmen. But the civility and the cordiality that are shown throughout New England to all our countrymen who visit the States are shown, I think, to Englishmen, not to England.

But though the peculiar animus exhibited by Mr. Sumner towards England appears to me characteristic of the class and the district to which the senator belongs, I am afraid the feelings to which he gave utterance are more or less shared by the great majority of his fellow-countrymen. Throughout the Union you will find but one sentiment, and that is, that England was a heavy offender against America during the years of the war. No doubt the intensity of this sentiment varies with the degree of irritation felt against this country on general grounds; and, as I have endeavored to show, this irritation is stronger in New England than elsewhere; but the sentiment extends far beyond the limits of the old Puritan States. Now I am not pleading for the justice of this sentiment; I am prepared to assert that if an account could be taken of the real and sentimental grievances of which either country has a right to complain at the hands of the other, the balance to the credit of the American account would be found to be by no means a very heavy one. But I do say that, taking human nature, and especially Anglo-Saxon human nature, for what it is, I cannot wonder at the existence of the sentiment referred to. I have long come to the conviction that Americans and Englishmen differ from one another only in the external conditions of their existence, not in the essential characteristics which appertain to individual nations; or, in other words, that Americans are only Englishmen who have settled in a new country. This conviction of mine would be gainsaid alike by most Englishmen and by most Americans. I can only say it is confirmed by all my experience of America and Americans. And of this I am sure, that if you wish to know how Americans will feel and act under given circumstances, you have only to consider what would be the conduct of Englishmen under like conditions.

Now the faculty of seeing that there are two sides to every question is pre-eminently not an English one. We see our own side with extreme distinctness and reasonable fairness, but we find it almost impossible to believe that other people can honestly arrive at a different conclusion from our own in arguing from the same data. As it is with us, so it is with the Americans. They look at everything from their own point of view, do what seems right in their own eyes, and are perfectly astonished if they discover that what seems right to them is not recognized as right by others. And even if by any chance they acknowledge themselves to have been wrong, they hold that that acknowledgment is a quittance in full, or even more than a quittance, for any shame attaching to them in virtue of their tort. Taking this national frame of mind for granted, it is easy to understand how Americans regard the attitude of England throughout the Southern rebellion. Let us suppose, for the sake of hypothesis, that Ireland had risen in revolt against British rule, that this revolt had threatened for some four years the very existence of the empire, that it had only been suppressed after sacrifices of life and treasure to be felt for generations to come, and that the struggle had been prolonged and intensified by the expectation that America would interfere in behalf of the insurgents. Given these facts, we should be disposed to place an unfavorable interpretation, to say the least, on all proceedings of the American Government and the American people; and these proceedings, pursuing our parallel, would be of a kind capable of any unfavorable interpretation. Our case would be that while the insurrection was still in its infancy, the American Government hastened to grant belligerent rights to Ireland without waiting four-and-twenty hours for the arrival of the envoy we had sent to explain our position; that at the moment of our darkest fortunes we were compelled, by a threat of war, to deliver up to America, under circumstances of especial humiliation, two Irish rebel leaders, whom we had captured on their way to negotiate a hostile alliance against the empire; that while Ireland had not a ship on the high seas, or a port she could call her own, privateers were built, equipped, and manned in American ports by American members of Congress, and despatched through the actual connivance or wilful negligence of the American Government, to prey upon our trade under the Irish flag; that our commerce was literally destroyed; that throughout the war, until, in fact, the fortunes of the rebels became manifestly desperate, the insurrection was encouraged by the constant prospect of American intervention; that the leading statesmen of the two great parties in the Republic went out of their way to proclaim their conviction that the ultimate triumph of the Irish rebellion was assured; that the press of America, with scarcely an important exception, supported the cause of the rebels, and lost no opportunity of insulting our efforts to suppress a wicked and unjust insurrection; that the weight of American influence and popular opinion was thrown upon the side of the rebellion; that whenever any question arose between us and the insurgents, it was invariably decided by the Americans in favor of the latter; and that, in fact, they gave every possible aid to our internal enemies, which could be given without incurring the risk and cost of an actual declaration of war. This being our case, what would be the feeling we should entertain towards the Americans? It would be surely that they had acted towards us in a manner for which it might or might not be wise to exact reparation when we came to a position to do so, but for which no mere nominal compensation could afford adequate atonement.

Well, if we substitute the Confederacy for Ireland, and England for America, we shall have a very fair statement of the case against us, as any average American would put it. There is, without doubt, a rejoinder that might be made with very telling effect, if we could only get the Americans to listen to it. There are two sides, and two very distinct sides, to this Anglo-American question; but, measuring the Americans by ourselves, I am not surprised they fail to see anything beyond the grievances to which they have been subjected. If they were, as a nation, philosophical and magnanimous, they might be much nobler-natured than they are; but they would not be true to their English parentage. It is also to be remembered that the Irish element in some of the larger States is very powerful, and that this element never loses an opportunity of embittering popular feeling in America against England. That the Irish emigrants hate us with most exceeding bitterness, may be our misfortune, and not our fault, but it certainly is not the fault of the Americans.

Given, then, the fact that Mr. Sumner, though he may have expressed his views with an acrimony and irritation peculiar rather to his own section of the community than to the nation at large, yet did express the popular sentiments of his countrymen, it remains to ask what is to be the upshot of this state of feeling? My own impression is that neither for war nor peace, neither for good nor evil, can there possibly be any immediate upshot. The Americans think, whether rightly or wrongly, that they have little to gain, and that we have much to lose, by the non-settlement of the Alabama controversy. The probability of an European war is confidently looked forward to on both sides the Atlantic; and whenever we are engaged in war we may expect much the same kind of neutrality from Americans as we exhibited towards them. The apprehension of such a state of things is galling to us; and the very knowledge that it is so galling indisposes the Americans to relieve us from what they deem the righteous penalty of our own misconduct. To be unwilling to forgive and forget is un-Christian, but it is not un-English. For these reasons I disbelieve in the possibility of procuring an immediate settlement of the Alabama question. I regret this the less, because I am convinced, for my own part, that any convention, however scrupulously worded, could not avert the danger it is designed to render impossible. We have good reason to know ourselves how extremely difficult it is for our own Government to hinder breaches of neutrality on the part of individual citizens; and this difficulty would be magnified tenfold in the case of a government like that of the United States. The authorities at Washington might be as anxious as — well, as Earl Russell and Mr. Gladstone to prevent any infraction of international law, but their instructions would be constantly baffled by the unwillingness of their subordinates to see them executed. If the State of New York, for instance, was governed by an Irish majority, as might well happen, and if popular opinion was hostile to England, we should have Alabamas sailing from the Empire City, no matter what conventions had been entered into between the Governments of Washington and St. James. That this should be so, is perhaps not creditable to American respect for law and national obligations; but we who recollect how Mr. Laird was cheered in the House of Commons, when he claimed credit for having built the Alabama, can hardly complain because American public sentiment is not more scrupulous than our own.

Against the danger to which I allude there is therefore, if I am right, no provision possible. The proposition I have seen gravely discussed in serious English journals — that we ought at once to go to war with America, in order to make her feel kindly towards us in the event of a future war — is too silly and childish to be answered. And yet short of that we can do nothing but wait for what the future may bring us. Time is upon our side; and the American nation, with its rapid growth and internal development, is hardly in a position to cherish rancor for any length of time. As years go by, the popular irritation about the Alabama, the Trent affair, and the recognition of the South, will lose its intensity; and then an arrangement may be made which would be frankly accepted on both sides the Atlantic. Moreover, with each year, as America becomes more consolidated and more self-supporting in intellectual as well as material respects the morbid susceptibility to English criticism which characterizes "the best type of Americans" will also pass away. But for the present we must make the best of a bad business. Having made our bed, we must lie in it. Nor can we wonder, if the fact of our attitude being attended with discomfort is not unwelcome to the Americans. That it is welcome to them is natural, but not creditable. And while our Anglo-Saxon character remains unaltered, there will always be found some statesman ready to become the mouthpiece of all popular sentiments, which are at once natural and not creditable. In Parliament, he may be called John Arthur Roebuck; in Congress, Charles Sumner.

TOM BUTLER.

III.—UNCLE JACK.

ABOUT three years later, when I am out on some foray through the streets, a large hand claps me on the back, and a larger voice sings out cheerily, "Halloa, my boy, this you!" For the moment, I could not recollect; but having only a limited round of acquaintances, memory in a second laid its finger upon the noble, chivalrous, valiant, and gallant Tom. Not much changed in his face, though his nose had grown more aquiline, but a great deal in his clothes. He was arrayed in a superb blue frock coat, with gold down the front, a crimson sash, and golden oyster shells on his shoulders; in fact, he was an officer, and this he called his undress. "Well, who'd have thought it?" he said; "and how have you been? Do you remember the licking I gave the Frenchman? Now we can go at them in the regular way, and no one can stop us. Come, where are you going?" We walked, and he told me all his adventures. I think now what a really good-natured and quite a chivalrous fellow he was, and how few of his cloth would be inclined to "be bothered" with a boy. He told me how the "poor governor had gone under at last, and was buried in the English burying-ground. He never liked me; and the poor old duffer was shamed into getting me this. It only cost him a letter, but faith it costs me a deal. That don't matter, so long as it lasts."

The renewing of this acquaintance brought some delightful days. He graciously said he would make a point of coming to see "my people," who received him with distinction, though he did not know how often I had been warned against his company. His ready off-hand manner, his loud laugh, his stories, his honest good-humor, at once established him as a favorite. He came to dine very often; he had influence with the head of the house, and could make her do what he pleased, — in reference to me. But poor Simpson, our governess, he, so to speak, floored. Her he could, indeed, persuade to do what he pleased. Her heart, never before invaded by the sweet seduction of the gentle passion, and who, at most, had but a severe and intellectual communion with Lindley Murray and Mr. Mangnall, was now literally burst into by the gallant Tom. He was very good-natured to her. He was so amusing. He used to sing, too, in a rude way; but like such inharmonious songsters was passionately fond of the art. He was always interposing between me and retribution or ruin. As this pleasant friendship was renewed, an event occurred which seemed to me to combine extraordinary dramatic significance; and the circumstances were these: —

One morning there was an astonishing commotion. Up on the Mont Blanc of our house we heard betimes strange sounds and scufflings towards the Grand Mulets below. Scouts at the window, half-dressed scouts, too, hanging out, reported with delight, "That there was a horse walking up and down." This was always an incident of surprise and speculation, much as would be the entry of such an object on the stage. There were presently agitated descendings and rustlings. Miss Simpson abandoned her sentry-box and musket, our vigilant maid did the same, and the whole barrack, with a true and amazing instinct, that anticipated logic or information, inferred that something of vast importance had taken place, and that we might give ourselves over to universal riot and breakage, — which we did accordingly.

The morning went on, and we heard nothing. First, because no one felt bound to offer us the courtesy of an explanation, and naturally enough thought we had no need of it; and, secondly, because so long as we were assured of liberty and relaxed discipline, we were not inclined to be too nice on the point. I am bound to say, it was to the bursting importance of a superior intelligence that we at last owed the news. For Miss Simpson, restless and swelling with importance, could not long restrain herself, and imparted the cause of the commotion. The man on the horse, who had long since ridden away, was an "express" from the country.

"Come here, Jane, come here. You, sir, come here, and be serious for a moment. Let that chair alone. I declare if he has n't cracked the leg —" Thus grouped we listened.

A dreadful and unexpected business had taken place. It was slowly and impressively broken to us. Miss Simpson began: "Death was a dreadful and an awful thing. We must all submit to it, the highest as well as the lowest, — there was no escape. Even Lady Jane Mortimer opposite, who drove the lovely grays." Adopting the more immediate illustration, entirely to the prejudice of what it was meant to illustrate, I instinctively turned to look out of the window, and see the spectacle alluded to, which for me had an exquisite charm. On this I was dragged rudely round, and told, as usual, that I would end disgracefully. But the point of the whole was this: our dear great-uncle, of whom we had often heard our good mamma speak, one of the best of men (my eyes were widening with wonder, who could it be?), the kind friend who was so thoughtful, who used to send up the hampers at Christmas (now I knew), had gone, had left this weary world, and we would never, never see him again! — a prospect, considering that I had never yet seen him, which did not affect me much. But I had logic enough to see that his departure would materially affect the recurring hampers.

But we little anticipated the surprises of that most dramatic day. There was advice and consultation with Mr. John; his suggestions were received with docility and respect. I caught those words of his: "The captain would be home at nine o'clock, please God, and then we'd know. Don't, don't worry yourself ma'am, and we'll all come right in time." Then arrived Mr. Bickers, who on occasions of moral crises was as indispensable, and came up the stairs in the same way, as the great family doctor in an illness. He had been sent for, and he came, as it were, professionally. All that day he was on the premises, walking up and down the room, drinking sherry, declaiming, giving advice, generally speaking, as to himself and his advice, not worth a rush. He read out "a fine passage, ma'am," from Bowdler's sermons, which I was sent for to listen to. "The great leveller, ma'am," he was saying as I entered — "the scythe, the scythe, ma'am! Well, sir, how do you feel now, — under the valley of the shadow? Have you come to that chapter in your catechism?"

"Indeed, Mr. Bickers, I am sorry to say he seems very little alive to the awful visitation that has occurred. There is a sort of levity about him that is incomprehensible. But it will break on him at last. How fine the words of the burial service. Ah!"

Here entered my two sisters, who were composed, amiable little hypocrites! to a decent and subdued bearing. There was apparent even such hasty tributes of respect to the deceased as a black ribbon tied round their waists in an enormous bow. This was of course provisional, en attendant a more organized display of grief which Miss Simpson was at this moment purchasing at a shop.

"Nothing could have been nicer," I heard it whispered to Mr. Bickers, "than the behavior of those girls. I assure you women of fifty would not have shown more sorrow."

It occurred to me that people at that time of life would have exhibited less; and if I had not been living under penal laws, I should perhaps have ventured on the remark; but at this moment I already saw the artist who had made the famous green frock crossing the street, and coming up our steps with an air of recognition. He had seen me, and pleasantly imitated, in a sort of pantomime, the art of measurement. Mr. Bickers was at that moment sonorously expatiating on "the fine passage" in the burial service, to which the little ladies, so well brought up, were listening, I fear, with only the respect of unintelligence, when the spectacle of the arriving artist seemed to me of such overwhelming importance, and was so dramatic, that I burst in on the "fine passage in our burial service" with the inopportune remark, made in a rude, enthusiastic, "blurred-out" fashion: —

"O, I say! here's the tailor. He's coning to measure me!"

Mr. Bickers looked angry and offended. "Take him away!" was the cry. "Go up stairs, sir!" But it was true — quite true. The tailor had been sent for to accommodate me with a suit which would figure in the bill as "an extra double-milled wire-wove superfine black jacket," with everything to match; and the operation was got through with speed. More marvellous still, it was to be sent home in the morning. There were other signs and wonders. My quick eye had noted motion and general operations in the stable, and, stealing out, I found John in the act of what he called "shaming" the green chariot. But he was mysterious about that great family monument, and declined to admit me into confidence. "We'd see to-morrow or next day," — a term which, unknown to him, corresponded to the popular relegation to the Greek kalends, things, of course, of which he had never heard. A more interesting spectacle was his operations with the lamps, into which he was fitting candles. He said, this, too, would be explained "to-morrow or next day." It was most singular. Death, it really seemed to me, without irreverence, was a most singular, mysterious, yet not uninteresting thing, since it brought with it such dramatic events, carriage lamps, &c., and, above all, suspension of house discipline. Dinner, even, of which Mr. Bickers was induced to stay and partake, was got over in a spasm, after which he walked up and down, and I well remember, in the absence of the head of the house got into a discussion with Miss Simpson, who, presuming on the crisis and general laissez faire established, had supported an opinion. "Ma'am," I heard him say, distinctly, "you are a fool!" — a rudeness to which she replied by rising and leaving the room, saying that "he quite forgot himself, and that no gentleman would address any lady in that way." Everybody sat up very late that night.

On the next morning there was greater joy and excitement in the house. John was heard below in the hall saying to some one, "Then, indeed, it's I that am glad to see you, captain! Welcome a thousand times from over the mountains, captain," for with a profusion of this sort of Eastern salutation did he usually love to greet his friends. Down we came stumbling, scrambling; female voices were heard more faintly behind, for "the captain" — Uncle Jack — was infinitely popular in that house. Between me and him especially there was a community and fellowship, born of similar tastes. He understood me; every one understood him. He was long and lame, had a hooked "Duke's" nose, and, indeed, he was said to resemble that eminent commander, but with the gentlest, softest blue eyes. His history was said to be curious; the youngest of innumerable younger sons, with a commission begged for him, certainly not purchased, he had been sent out from his native bogs with — he after told it — "a five-pound note in his pocket." Yet from that hour he wanted nothing, and his own father owned sometimes, "he must say that from the day Jack left him he had never written for so much as twenty pounds in all his life." A scarcely fair way of putting it, as implying that application had been made for sums lower in amount by Uncle Jack, who owned to me, modestly, that he could never bring himself to trouble them for sixpence. God knows, he said, they had mouths enough to fill. From that hour he never wanted anything, simply because he never wanted friends. Generals clung to him with an almost romantic friendship, and, as these were "jobbing" days, one of them triumphantly carried through a most flagrant job, triumphing in the interest of his friend Jack. He was not forty, but was placed on the retired list in the enjoyment of full pay. He used to relate the stages of that corrupt transaction, half comically, half with a little shame. "To think of my useless four bones costing the country all that, and with all those honest, hard-working fellows struggling to make both ends meet." He had a charming little villa and farm combined, far down in the country, which bore the name of Lota, and where it was known that Uncle Jack kept the best horse, and the neatest little carriage, and the best dog, with a good gun, and a good bottle of wine, and a jar of whiskey "that was worth drinking." Indeed, these things came to him without trouble, of course allowing for his own nice judgment in such matters, having the "best eye for a horse in the whole country." As may be conceived, his gentle nature was turned to profit by numerous reduced relations who had started far more auspiciously in the world, and who now considered "Jack" as one who had had unfair advantages. Many was the ten-pound note that went off to these applicants, to say nothing of a little annuity here and there. By gentlemen of his family the honor of Uncle Jack's name to their bills was eagerly sought; but on this point he was inflexible. Here, too, they considered they were scurvily treated, and loudly inveighed against Jack's selfishness, he who had such advantages, being "pushed on" in every way; and they grudgingly accepted the twenty pounds or so, which was humbly offered as a solatium. Such a loan was, of course, but a handsome synonyme for gift.

It was always gala time for us when Uncle Jack arrived from the country, and put up at our hotel. Between him and me there was the most perfect accord, chiefly as to mechanical taste, — repairs, sharpenings, &c. He knew the most acceptable present he could offer me was a penknife, which he usually chose of beautiful workmanship, and, knowing beforehand that it would be seized by the officers of justice and confiscated, he, with rare delicacy, stipulated with the authorities that I should be allowed to retain it. I am sorry to say this engagement was only held to during his presence, as some fatal wilfulness was sure to precipitate me into an unmeaning overt act, such as cutting open a "darby" to look at his springs, or in gashing my thumb frightfully. Imbrued in my own blood I was seized, and never saw the instrument again.

IV. — AN EXPEDITION.

The present occasion was too serious for these delassements. An agitated council was held almost in the hall, and I heard the question put, "Well, can you go?"

"To be sure, my dear," was the answer.

"Then that's all right. And the chariot is ready, and John, and —"

"O, tut, nonsense!" protested Uncle Jack. "Indeed, no. To be battering your beautiful carriage all down the country roads. No. I'll just get a chaise comfortably from Baker's."

He shrank from the profanity of laying hands on the sacred vehicle, which he revered as though it had newly come from Hooper's. But such protest was unavailing. That good fellow, Tom Butler, had at once volunteered to go down, and represented affecting even a kind of interest in the deceased, having met him, he said, somewhere at dinner. This kindness was so like Tom, and was really delicacy on his side, for he knew that in these mortuary arrangements, a handsome show and an air of crowd and pomp, while it soothes the poignancy of grief, at the same time ministers to the pride of the living. Mr. John was presently taken into council, as if he was an "elder," and seemed to speak with great collectedness, gravity, and weight, with many a "So best," "So be it," and was listened to with respect. The past was utterly forgotten, and the captain, who respected him highly, said he must own that John had made the coach "look better than the first day. You could see yourself in it." Mr. John took this compliment modestly, and "must say that, as far as 'shaming' went, and polishing, he had spared neither wind, limb, nor bone." I almost think he was going to add something about being "heart-scalded"; but, in delicacy to the situation, he refrained. After we were led away up to bed, a new surprise was in store for us. We were just going to sleep, when a deputation seemed to fill the room, dazzling lights to multiply, and a crowd to enter. The crowd was only the head of our house and the captain.

"There's news for you, my boy," he said. "Mamma has given leave, and you can go in the back seat. Will you be ready at seven sharp?"

"Miss Simpson will get him up, and his new clothes have come back."

"That's a good lad," said the captain. "And I'll bet my new hat it's a fine account I'll bring back of him. You won't mind sitting behind with John in the dicky, — for a time, that is; but we'll have you in now and again, my boy, on the folding-up seat."

Mind the dicky behind! Why, it was the very spot I would have chosen, — the paradise of the vehicle, — with the sunny day, the quick motion, above all, that translation into a genuine actual reality, instead of the meagre coach-house pantomime of clambering into a merely stationary back seat, — poor enough entertainment. Now, if I were so minded, I could rehearse, with real danger, that performance of mounting and scaling the seat hastily.

It was hard to sleep that night, but it was contrived somehow. Betimes I was awake, and saw with exquisite delight the new extra superfine black suit lying neatly folded beside me. There was, besides, a hat, about the size of a little flower-pot, an article without which it was impossible to have the true air of mourning. I had never had one on my head before, save, of course, in the way of sportive experiment. Once, too, I had furtively tried on one of the Goodman's hats which was lying in the hall.

Every one was down. The captain was exquisitely shaved, even at that early hour, as by machinery. The brave and noble Tom Butler came rattling up in a cab, just in time for the really sumptuous meal that was set out. I was encouraged to partake largely of the delicious broiled ham and mutton-chops, and, more succulent still, the richly buttered muffins, which strewed the board in profusion. Surely the only moral I tried to draw was that mourning, and the stroke that brings mourning, must be a more agreeable thing than it was generally depicted, and that those well-meaning clergymen whom I had heard from the pulpit asking death where its sting was, and the grave where its victory, might well pause for a reply. Victories and stings, indeed! The embodied muffins and fried ham were not to be spoken of thus unfairly. We were all in good spirits, too, and even gay, the captain making a passing allusion to "poor old Ned's wake," and the hearty Tom rallying Miss Simpson pleasantly. At last we were ready. There was a sound of wheels, and soon the green chariot came clattering up to the window, shaking and bobbing on its C springs. The postilion had quite a festive air, as if he was about to take in a wedding party. Heads came to the other windows in our modest street, for John had taken care to let the news get wind, and this pageant and journey implied a sort of magnificence both for the deceased and those who mourned him. Finally we emerged, the whole family on the steps and about the hall, the captain, in his dark, scarcely black suit, I alone glistening like a little snake, while Tom, who had good-naturedly made an attempt to join in harmony with his afflicted companions, did not get beyond mere neutral tints. John, who had banged down the steps with needless violence, — a recollection of his old lackey days, — stood holding the door open in genuine though slightly rusty sables. To say the truth, these mournful occasions were highly to his taste, and he always requested permission to attend when he thought there was the least excuse for paying that last mark of respect. He never lacked a seat, and there were, besides, the inducements of the dismal decorations, scarf and hatband, which ornaments, unbecoming to a degree, he wore with a pride and complacency the most splendid livery could not have extorted.

The captain and the brave Tom were seated inside. I was already in the "dicky," yet having, alas! already "blocked" the new hat against the C spring! It crushed in fearfully, with a half-crackle, half-rustle. The misfortune was seen by Miss Simpson only, but she was generous, out of decency, I supposed, to the occasion; otherwise I expected to have been dragged down and brought up summarily before the justices. Then the whip cracked, and we were off.

Delightful day! We were posting it, and were to go about sixty miles. For me it was a new sensation, — the freedom, the keen air, the motion, the commanding elevation, even the jolting! Above all, I began to be gifted with an amazing fluency and volubility, and invited John to unfold to me experiences of his amazing life, which seemed to me worthy to be placed beside some of the adventurous voyagers whose stories I had read with such interest. But with an almost dramatic relevancy, he confined himself to details that sprang, as it were, from our present attitude. There was a posting journey from London to Cheltenham, "on the loveliest road," and on which he had met the famous Colonel Berkeley, himself driving four-in-hand, "and the two grooms sitting up behind with their arms crossed — the loveliest brown and gold liveries on them, and a lady, the creature! alongside of him." Then we got out in the fine smooth country roads, — strips of gray and yellow winding out like a ribbon of a rich green silk dress; then a hill rose up before us like a ladder, and we had to get out and walk, and the glass was let down and a cloud of smoke came out, — the captain and the brave Tom Butler smoking together. They talked to me cheerfully, and when we got to the top of the hill there was a halt, while, mysterious operation! we all assisted in putting on the drag. I loved the grinding sound as we scraped down the hill. The postilion had an interest for me, owing to the strange mechanism of his inner boot, — a protection against the pole. We passed little villages, all scraps of white in a very green ground. Then came a snowy "pike," where I should like to have lived and taken the money, and in about two hours drew up handsomely at an inn called The Plough, where we were to change horses. Ostlers came out, and retired with our horses, grown very lanky of a sudden. I heard our late postilion wishing "long life" to the captain, — I had no doubt a sincere wish, for the captain's manner of bestowing a half-crown made it five shillings, and there was a supplemental wish that he might drive at the captain's wedding. Then we rattled off with a plunge, Mr. John being savage, for I had called "All right" from behind, and he had to run hard, and with difficulty got up.

At the next stage all the voyagers descended at "McCallum's," where the captain recollected stopping fifteen years ago, and where there was actually some one that recollected him, or seemed to recollect him. But, in truth, there was in the captain's face always such a gracious, kindly recognition of his fellow-creatures who were below him in station, that it seemed the renewal, as it were, of quite an old acquaintance. So when he had greeted Mrs. McCallum warmly and gallantly, also telling her she was as dangerous as she was twenty years ago, that smart lady fair recollected the visit and the compliments paid to her.

We were to lunch here. I remember to this hour the peculiar fragrance of the inn parlor, the air half of beer, half the flavor of sawdust, and yet not disagreeable. Such ale — such a round of beef — such cheese! But in those days everything had "such" before it, from the want of a frequent standard of comparison. "Cut and come again," said the captain, who took good care that Mr. John should be carefully attended to, — possibly a superfluous precaution. The brave Tom was in boisterous spirits, making jokes, and eating prodigiously. What I admired in both gentlemen was their amazing command of easy conversation, and the pleasant rallying they kept up with Mrs. McCallum, — the imagination, the ready wit, so it seemed to me. Nor was she behindhand, and, I dare swear, talked long after of the green chariot and the two pleasant gentlemen it brought. I was greatly delighted with the series of paintings, as they appeared to me, that hung out from the walls in a beetling manner, as if they were going to fall down on our heads. They were of an absorbing dramatic interest, representing passages in the life of a huntsman, — a vast and confused crowd of red coats, and a number of very high stocks and painted "gills." The captain recognized them at once. "Ay, Tom Moody — poor Tom Moody — I have them all down at Lota. See, there he is going over the ha-ha, and there they're all like ourselves, bound for a funeral. We have n't as long faces as they have, quite; eh, Tom, my boy? See here. Look at this horse, with his whip and his spurs. Immensely well done."

Now we were on again, with fresh horses, and Mrs. McCallum stands courtesying and smiling at the door, and I am convinced she feels the loss of the captain very much. I recollect now the captain rallying brave Tom on something that occurred in the passage. "When my back was turned too," said the captain, — "a shame! taking advantage of an elderly veteran." I did not know then what this joking was referring to; but I think I can make a guess now. I was taken inside and seated on a little seat contrived to let up and down, and never was so entertained, contributing myself no inconsiderable share of the conversation, and being invited to do so. Then I was asked to sing, and greatly pressed by the captain, who said, "Mark his words; but I would astonish them yet with an uncommon fine organ of my own!" I gave them my cheval de bataille — the Pilgrim of Love, Mr. Inledon's, I believe, favorite ditty, which I had found in an old red music-book between The Battle of Prague and a song called the Rosy Beam of Morning. I am not a little amused to see that this old favorite has since come seriously into fashion, voiced by welkin-splitting tenors. The captain's own gifts were of a modest sort, confined chiefly to a gentle accompaniment of "Tum, ti, tum, de, dee, ti, tum, tum, toy." Yet he could play on a violin, and often delighted us by an account of doings at "Mrs. Dodd's boarding-house, — a tip-top place," where he lived "with the best," about the time quadrilles came over from France, and where the passion for the dance was so strong that the ladies and gentlemen would begin at once after luncheon, closing "Dodd's" shutters, and lighting up the rooms, while Uncle Jack, good-natured always, would sit at the head, and fiddle "Payne's Quadrille" over and over again. But I am digressing.

THE TRADE IN LOCKS.

THERE are "locks and locks," — to adopt the favorite formula of the day, — and it is not of the patents of Chubb, Bramah, or Hobbs, or of tumbler, safety, detector, or other mechanical fastenings, that we are about to speak. It is of the "hyacinthine locks" alluded to by Milton, and more especially of those borrowed tresses which women nowadays covet to that degree as to make one think that, like Samson, all their power lay in their hair.

Does any one believe that all that has been written by moralists, and censors, and medical men to boot, during the past two or three years, against the practice of wearing false hair, — that all the horrible stories which have been told about chignons being made of hair cut from corpses, — or the terrible revelations which have been made respecting "gregarines" and other parasites, or even the recent threat of the Bishop of New Jersey not to lay his episcopal hands on the heads of young ladies who present themselves before him to be confirmed in borrowed tresses, — has caused one false chignon, repentir, cachefolie, tête-à-point, or Alexandria curl the less to be worn? The trade in hair is as flourishing as ever, and the choicer samples still command exceptional prices. One of the largest Paris dealers still finds customers for his blonde ardent chignon at 1,500 francs, although silk counterfeits are common enough in all the passementerie shops for as little as ninety centimes.

Every one knows by this time that the bulk of the false natural hair worn in the British Isles is imported from France, for with us the very poorest never sell their hair, excepting the canny Scots, who supply the Paris market with the best red and flaxen hair. France, by this time, must send us about £ 60,000 annually; still, what is this among the five million women given to plaiting and treiring their hair? Positively less than threepence per head, — a mere bagatelle for such astounding results. It is Brittany that sends the largest supplies of human hair to the Paris market. "Since the Roman conquest," writes Chateaubriand, "The Gallic women have always sold their blond locks to deck brows less adorned. My Breton compatriots still resign themselves to be clipped on certain fair days, when they exchange the natural covering of their heads for an India handkerchief."

Happening to alight on the above passage in a volume of Chateaubriand's Memoirs, which I found lying about the hotel at Combour, where I chanced to be on the eve of the 4th of September last, — the day of the famous fair called the Angevine, held, as Chateaubriand tells us, in "the meadow of the lake," though the road to Rennes now separates lake and meadow, — I strolled in the direction of the château, of which and of the gloomy life of its inmates Chateaubriand has left us such a vivid description, to see the preparations for the morrow's fête. In the meadow referred to, and along the high-road adjoining, I came upon a sort of camp. Carts and wagons half unloaded, horses tethered to stakes fixed in the ground, canvas tents and little booths in course of erection; with hammers constantly rapping, children gambolling and squalling, and caldrons suspended over crackling wood-fires, steaming and smoking. Among the objects that were being unpacked and piled up pell-mell on all sides were an abundance of common household utensils, knives, pottery, wooden shoes, felt hats, drapery goods, printed cottons, religious trinkets, and cheap jewelry, but I looked in vain for the foulards and the corahs for which the Breton girls bartered alike their fair and raven locks with equal readiness.

Next day I visited the fair when the crowd was at its height, and explored all the stalls in the meadow and by the roadside in vain search after those shearers of young girls' tresses, respecting whom I felt some curiosity since reading the foregoing passage in Chateaubriand's Memoirs. Arrived at the outskirts of the fair, at the wings of the spectacle in fact, I noticed under a wide-spreading walnut-tree, and partially hidden behind a large crockery stall, as though the spot had been selected as affording a certain degree of privacy, a hooded cart half filled with packages, its shafts resting on the ground, and a lean horse, fastened to one of the spokes of the wheel, grazing beside it. The owner, a little square-built, muscular man, about forty years of age, seemingly half peasant, half horse-dealer, was sitting on one of the shafts close to a parcel of printed cotton goods. One detected something of the rogue in the twinkle of his insolent-looking eye as, unfastening a small packet, he brought forth one by one half a dozen showy-looking handkerchiefs, and expatiated on the particular beauties of each as he produced it to an old peasant woman, who held a bare-footed young girl of twelve by the hand, whose "catiole" had been removed, the better to display the profusion of beautiful black hair which fell in cascades to her waist. As I approached the group, I noticed that the man suddenly became silent, but I heard the woman say, —

"One handkerchief is not enough for such a quantity of hair." The girl seemed to have no voice in the matter, so she contented herself with regarding with covetous eyes the brilliant treasures displayed before her.

"My good soul," replied the dealer, in a coaxing tone, "I really can't give more, or I should lose by it, for I have already got more black hair than I want. It is only light hair that fetches any price nowadays: still, as I promised you a handkerchief, you shall have one. I'll not cry off the bargain. You know where to find me when you have made up your mind."

The old woman made no reply, but proceeded to assist the child to do up her hair, rolling it chignon fashion inside her loose "catiole." The pair then walked away, but returned a moment afterwards to accept the dealer's terms, who, without more ado, set to work. Seated upon a three-legged stool, he gripped as it were his victim, her hair all hanging down, between his knees. In his hand was a pair of large open shears, which he pressed close to the girl's head. "Monsieur," cried she, "you are hurting me, pray don't cut it all off; leave me one lock to fasten my comb to."

The dealer, however, was deaf to this sort of entreaty, and with a few snips of his large scissors cropped the child's head almost close. He then rolled up the bunches of hair, and, after securing them with a knot, put them into a bag, while the girl, raising her hands to her head, felt instinctively for one moment for her missing tresses, then hastened to conceal with her catiole the ravages the dealer's shears had made. This done, the old woman selected the gaudiest of the half-dozen handkerchiefs, and hurried off her granddaughter into the crowd. Certain French writers of romance pretend that, in the majority of instances, the young girls of Brittany and Auvergne who sell their hair only do so under pressure of some dire distress. Nothing is further from the truth. In Brittany selling the hair is, as Chateaubriand tells us, as old as the Roman invasion of Gaul, and the custom may now be said to run in the blood. The style of coiffure common there certainly conceals the absence of the customary tresses, but even if it did not, no one would think any the worse of the poor shorn lamb. At Mont-lucon, again, girls who are betrothed sell their hair, with the consent of their future spouses, to provide themselves with the wedding trousseau. And even well-to-do farmers' wives, in a spirit of prudence, will at times part with their hair for a serviceable dress. Breton hair being so highly prized for its fineness, it is not on fête days alone that dealers display their tempting wares and drive hard bargains with the hesitating fair. All the year round, pedlers, with packs of showy cotton prints on their backs, tramp from village to village, trying to tempt the hundreds of girls they meet on the highway, tending pigs and cows, to part with their flaxen or raven locks for glossy looking red and yellow cotton handkerchiefs worth about a franc each.

In the towns, it is the hairdressers who insinuate to all the young girls that they give as much as twenty francs a pound for long back hair, — this is the market price throughout the north of Brittany; but as female labor is better paid in these parts, commanding about a franc a day without board, they do only a moderate amount of business, and this chiefly with girls who have to lose their hair for sanitary reasons, and, when they are forced to sacrifice it, think they may as well get from ten to fifteen francs for it from the hairdresser. The average value of a head of hair sur pied, that is to say, not as it stands, but rather as it grows, is ten francs. The finest crop, reaching far below the waist, hardly ever weighs a pound or commands the coveted golden Napoléon. Years ago, before the era of railways, the hair merchant used to bar-tar, not merely handkerchiefs, but caps, ribbons, little shawls, scarfs, and plated earrings for a head of hair, but nowadays when hair is more in demand, and young girls or their guardians have come to know more of its value, he must be prepared to pay money in the towns if he hopes to reap a handsome crop.

In Auvergne, which is quite out of the ordinary tourist's line of route, and is — as a couple of maiden ladies, whom we met last year travelling in search of the economical, in preference to the picturesque, confidentially assured us — the only part of France not overrun by English, and, consequently, the only part where living is really cheap, — in Auvergne the itinerant dealer in human hair does business in a perfectly public fashion. He makes a point of arriving in the village on market-day or during the annual fête, and might be easily mistaken for the travelling dentist or quack doctor, who extracts teeth or extols the healing quality of his drugs to the gaping peasants assembled in the market-place.

At Ambert, St. Anthème, Arlanc, Olliargues, and Riom, their cabriolets and booths, surmounted by little tricolor flags, are huddled together in the midst of the egg and butter stalls; and grouped around them will be peasant girls with baskets of fruit and vegetables, accompanied by their parents or their husbands, and all ready to sacrifice their locks to the highest bidder. At Issingeaux, on market-days, the sight is exceedingly picturesque. The hair-merchant takes his stand on a low platform or wine-cask turned on end in front of a booth formed of canvas, and a few planks, and with his shirt-sleeves rolled up to his shoulders, invites the women, in a loud voice, to step up and show their hair. Around him are a crowd of men and women in sabots from the surrounding country, come to sell either a cow, a pig, or a couple of fowls, the women dressed in a short serge petticoat and cotton apron, with a cap or a colored handkerchief bound round their head in winter, and in summer wearing a broad-brimmed straw hat; the men in short apple-green cloth jackets and large felt hats, similar to those worn by the privileged porters at the Paris market.

One by one the girls will mount platform or wine-cask, and throwing aside their caps, will loosen their tresses and

"Shower their rippling ringlets to the knee."

The hair-dealer makes a rigid examination, followed by an offer, and as soon as a bargain is struck, the girl steps inside the booth, and in five minutes the dealer's assistant will have cropped her close, when off she will run amidst the laughter and jeers of the crowd, which, however, does not prevent the remainder of the girls in the village from following her example.

It sometimes happens, however, that the young men of the place, who look upon the hair-merchant with no kindly eye, will commence assailing him before he has succeeded in packing up his traps and decamping. He then has to trust to his horse to carry him beyond the reach of the enraged swains.

Mud, stones, rotten eggs, and every kind of filth at hand fall in showers upon the hood of his shabby cabriolet; but being tolerably accustomed to this sort of thing, he takes care to be provided with an excellent horse, which soon places him beyond the reach of the mob, and next day he will sustain the principal part in much the same scene in some adjoining village.

In Normandy most of the girls have their hair cut very short with the exception of the chignon, over which they coquettishly arrange their high caps, which, like the Brittany coiffure, so completely covers the head that they appear to have lost or rather sold nothing at all.

When the hair-merchant has finished his tournée in the provinces, he takes his merchandise to Paris or some other large town, where he sells it, at prices varying from twenty to a hundred francs the pound, to dealers who, after preparing it, make it up into chignons, curls, bandeaux, nattes, &c. On visiting one of the largest of these establishments, we found the four walls of the sale-room lined round with shelves, reaching from the floor to the ceiling, on which were piled up chignons upon chignons of all qualities and all shades of color, from raven black to the most delicate blond, done up in packets of six, the smallest number sold by the house, which does no retail trade. Half a dozen assistants were executing orders which customers gave in person, or which had been received that morning by post from the travellers of the firm. In an adjoining warehouse the raw material was lying in heaps upon the floor beside scores of young women, who were sorting and weighing out the chignons of the future, allowing so many grammes for one sort and so many for another. The place, in fact, was redolent of hair. There was hair in all the drawers, hair in cardboard boxes, hair hanging from the ceiling and clinging to the walls, hair upon the counters, upon the chairs, and in the very inkstand; there was even hair in the air itself, moving about as it were in clouds, which when you agitated them disagreeably caressed you.

Most of the hair, we learned, reaches the establishment in bulk, in large sacks, each holding about a couple of hundred weight. It is first of all subjected to a thorough washing in boiling water, to remove all the grease and other impurities, after which it is placed in a bath of potash and then thoroughly dried. The various tresses are now sorted roughly according to their length and shade, then what is called in technical language the evenage takes place. This consists in separating the principal locks of the same tress that do not resemble each other closely in shade. Then comes the recarrage or equalizing of the upper ends of each tress, after which a second and more careful sorting ensues, and the hair is arranged in bundles weighing from ten to twelve pounds each, to undergo a new series of operations.

First of all the hair is taken in small handfuls by the workmen, who powder it thoroughly with flour; it then receives a vigorous combing upon iron carders, after which a second carder comes to the assistance of the first and holds the hair tightly while it is pulled out in lengths, of which the longest are separated first. The final operation to which it is subjected is styled the delentage, and consists simply in again combing it upon carders of extreme fineness. False tresses are now formed by mixing together, in certain proportions, hair of the same tint and slightly varying in length. To arrange a grand chignon the hair-worker will at times employ the spoils derived from the heads of no less than thirty women.

Our hair-dealer was careful to assure us that all the stories told about hair cut from dead bodies being worked up into chignons were devoid of truth.

"Hair thus obtained," he said, "is too brittle to be curled or twisted into proper form; and as for 'gargarines,' these may exist," he observed, "in Russian chignons made from hair procured from the dirty Mordvine and Burlake peasant women, but I never heard a duly authenticated instance of their being detected in French chignons.

Not a lock of Russian hair comes to France except on Muscovite heads. We get, by way of Marseilles, a large quantity of hair from Italy, chiefly from Sicily, Naples, and the Papal States,—you remember about the young Roman girl who sold her hair to buy the pope a Zouave,—and a moderate quantity from Austria, Bohemia, Belgium, and Spain, across the frontiers, but our principal supplies are home ones, and chiefly come from Brittany, Auvergne, Artois, and Normandy, and in a less degree from Languedoc, Limousin, Poitou, and Bourbonnais. We count the Breton hair the most valuable of all by reason of its extreme fineness, and from its having been covered up in the large caps the peasants wear during its most active period of growth, from its never having been previously curled, but simply rolled up in bands, and finally because it has rarely even been combed!" Auvergnat hair our merchant pronounced to be too coarse to use alone, though it worked up very well mixed with other kinds. Spanish hair, good enough in itself was too decidedly black, too sombre, to suit ordinary complexions; it was therefore requisite to mix this also, to soften it, in fact, with hair of a more delicate shade; the same with the tow-like tint of the Flemish hair, which had to be made more sunny-looking by the addition of German hair of a richer blond. Neapolitan hair, we were informed, was but little esteemed in the trade, a circumstance at which we were surprised, as the hair of the Caprian peasant women, which is dark, lustrous, long, and massively rippled, is among the finest in the world. The particular German hair from which the chignons of the tender shade termed angel's blonde are made, commands, it seems, the highest price of all.

The long hair pulled out of ladies' heads by the comb, and which in Paris is thrown every morning on the rubbish-heaps of the city, is carefully picked up again by the chiffonniers and sold by them for making what is called têles-et-pointes, that is, the cheap curl or tuft of hair, the roots of the individual hairs composing which are not all at one end. Nothing in the way of hair would appear to be wasted; that of a bad shade of color is dyed, generally black, and even the clippings, which the hairdressers can turn to no other account, are sold by them to be manufactured into perukes and chignons for the more expensive class of wax dolls.

One has spoken of chignons at 1,500 francs, but this is of course a purely exceptional price, arising first of all from the peculiar color of the hair, namely, a bright gold shade; secondly, from its great length,—nearly three and a half feet,—and thirdly, from its bulk and its extreme fineness, to combine all which necessitates a single chignon being carefully selected from an immense stock of hair, several hundredweight, in fact.

When this golden-tinted hair was the rage in Paris, and women, in despair of otherwise acquiring it, powdered their heads with gold, a hairdresser of the Rue Vivienne exhibited in his window a chignon formed entirely of the finest gold thread, and the price of which was 1,000 francs; but whether he ever manufactured more than this sample aureate chignon, or persuaded a single fair one to parade these veritable golden locks, we are unable to say. At the present time about 250 francs appears to be the average Paris price for a superior chignon of an ordinary tint, and from twelve to seventy francs for the commoner article.

We all know that the wearing of false hair by beauties in their prime dates back anterior to the Christian era, and that Ovid speaks of the German slaves' hair with which the Roman women sought to enhance their charms, going publicly to make their purchases at the shops of the Gallic hair-merchants situate near the Temple of the Muses, and under the peristyle of the Temple of Hercules. The chignon, however, has only been known under its present name since about the time when "coiffeurs" themselves first came into vogue in the middle of the eighteenth century. Up till that period there had been only barbers and perruquiers, the former of whom shaved and bled their customers, while the latter merely cut hair and manufactured wigs, so that ladies were obliged to have their hair dressed by their femmes de chambre. Gradually the race of coiffeurs arose to perform this intricate operation, and as a matter of course trenched on the privileges of the perruquiers, for they cut hair as well as dressed it. Ere long a storm of discontent ensued, and an action that kept all Paris in a ferment for months was brought by the perruquiers against the coiffeurs, who had at this time increased to 1,200 in number, for illegally infringing on their rights. The coiffeurs pleaded in their defence that the dressing of ladies' hair was "a liberal art," and therefore foreign to the profession of perruquier. "We have," said they, with ludicrous consequentiality, "to embellish nature and correct its deficiencies. It is our task to reconcile the color of the hair with the tint of the complexion, so as to enhance the beauty of the latter; to grasp with taste the variegated shades of the tresses, and so dispose the shadows as to give more spirit to the countenance, heightening the tone of the skin by the auburn tint of the locks, or subduing its too lovely splendor by the neutral shade which we communicate to the tresses." Thanks to the influence exercised by the fair sex the coiffeurs gained the day, and, elated with their victory, proceeded to form a corporation, baptizing themselves "Académiciens de la Coiffure et de la Mode," at which piece of presumption the French Academy itself took umbrage, and Paris was amused by a new trial. This time the coiffeurs were beaten, whereupon they modestly styled themselves "professors," a designation they were permitted to retain, as the professors of the French colleges, less susceptible than the Academicians, entered no protest against their usurping this title.

Nowadays hairdressers style themselves indiscriminately professors and artists, and have their occasional public exhibitions like other artists, with this difference, however, that they invite the public not only to admire the result of their labors, but to witness them produce their masterpieces. In Paris these exhibitions take place regularly at the Salle Molière, and imitations of them have more than once been given at the Hanover Square Rooms. A most ravishing picture is presented at the moment when the artist—his hand generally trembling with emotion at the outset of the operation,—undoes the band that confines the hair of the lady who submits her tresses to his manipulative skill. A blond, auburn, brown, or jet-black avalanche suddenly descends, enveloping the rounded shoulders of the fair one like a rich silken mantle. Gradually, beneath the dexterous fingers of the artist, all these recalcitrant tresses are gathered up and grouped with consummate skill according to some particular type of coiffure, such as the Classic, the Louis Quatorze, the Pompadour, the Watteau, the Premier Pas, the Caprice, the Hirondelle, or the Empire.

JINNY'S THREE BALLS.

I. — JINNY'S FIRST BALL.

"How kind you are!"

"Look at that girl, Fitz. I'll bet you anything you like she has n't been trotted out once to-night. Poor thing!"

"She's not bad looking; at least, not very, but awfully raw," said Captain Fitzpatrick, leaning against the doorway, and surveying the lady in question critically, while she dropped her shy eyes and blushed over ears and forehead.

"I wish I was n't engaged all the way down," continued his good-natured friend (who was called Dick Jones, and therefore surnamed by his brother officers, after the manner of their kind, "De Courcy"), "or that Sydney was n't such a lazy wretch."

"Look here! I'll ask her," interrupted Fitzpatrick, starting from his languid attitude, "else the unlucky little monkey will do something rash. Here goes. Put a bold face on it, and introduce me; there's a good fellow."

"My friend Captain Fitzpatrick, of the 190th — Miss Lake."

"May I have this dance?" asked the captain, sitting down good-humoredly on the so-long vacant bench, and showing his big white teeth in a pleasant patronizing smile.

"Yes. O, thank you very much."

"May I put my name on your card? Perhaps you have n't got one? Let me pick up your handkerchief. Stay; there goes the fan too. How cruel to give me so much trouble, isn't it?"

Then, at last, his shy neighbor looked up, and burst out vehemently: "I am so — so stupid and awkward. — No, I've no card; I have n't danced once this evening. Pray, forgive me."

"Forgive you! I should think so. What a shame! — This promises to be amusing." The last five words were spoken to himself, as he turned and contemplated his partner.

She was not much to look at, he thought; a tall, slim girl, with abrupt, awkward movements, a blunt nose, a wide mouth, and big, limpid, brown-gray eyes, with long level brows, and thick straight lashes. She was badly dressed in a tumbled tarletane, white, with blue flowers, ill made, ill fitting, displaying a sufficiently snowy, but lamentably thin neck and arms; and she wore an unfashionably tall wreath of forget-me-nots on her voiceless, thick brown hair, and a black ribbon round her long throat. She was not pretty, — she never would be; but she might one day have a good figure; and her eyes were fine, and her hair and teeth not bad. And then, she had a sort of innocent, babyish air, thought Captain Fitzpatrick, that made her look quite jolly sometimes, in spite of her "missishness." Poor little Jinny Lake of sixteen! It was a dangerous gift to her, that silly, happy, sweet smile, which lit eyes as well as lips; that low, cooing voice, which said such rash and simple things with that unconscious pathos of tender trust. At least, any one who loved Jinny unselfishly would have thought so, and trembled for her; but as no one did, it was no great matter. She might wear her heart outside, for daws to peck at, and no one would care; not, certainly, the aunt and sole guardian whose guardianship and affection were so careless and so torpid, they might almost as well never have existed. Before the music of the next dance struck up, Captain Fitzpatrick had learned almost as much of Jinny's life and prospects as could be told. The knowledge awoke in him such immense wonder and pity, that he determined to ameliorate her sad fate as much as lay in his power, and at the same time to form her character. Yet he had not the appearance of a safe mentor, as he bent towards her, his bright blue eyes dancing in amusement at her naïveté; his curved, delicate lips laughing beneath the silky curls of his golden-brown mustache; his glossy, close-cut head almost touching the ugly blue wreath. He looked kind, and good-tempered, and cheery, as he was, but a great deal too handsome and graceful, and agreeably conscious of those facts, for a safe instructor of susceptible youth.

"Well, you shall enjoy yourself for what's left of the evening," he said. "I'll tell you: I'll introduce two of our fellows to you, and —"

"There are only two dances more," answered Jinny, with alarmingly open appeal; "and I thought perhaps you —"

"Thought what, Miss Lake?"

"Nothing; at least — no, I mean you are so kind, that —"

"You'll just as soon dance, then, with your humble servant? Was that it, eh?"

"O yes; indeed, it was!" she cried with shy, vehement relief.

"All right; I shall be only too flattered, I'm sure," the captain observed, unable to resist a rather concealed drawl, and a complacent caress of his mustache by a slender silver-gray hand, no larger than Jinny's own, and far defter than her long young fingers. Then they whirled away, — Jinny in a seventh heaven of delight, doubting her own identity, and exciting the wonder of the sleepy old doctor who had consented to chaperon her to this, her first ball, but had not made the slightest effort to help her to either refreshment or dancing from the moment of their entrance until now.

When the last dance was over, and Miss Lake had made no movement to rejoin her chaperon, Fitzpatrick saw the matter was in his own hands. Partly through native docility, partly through her vast admiration of himself, she would have been content to sit all night with him in the empty ball-room. So he said, feeling quite benevolently prudent, "By Jove! I'm sorry it's over. I suppose I must give you up to that old foggy now?"

He did it accordingly; and then Jinny, holding out a fervent hand, said, "Good-by" in a depressed and gloomy manner.

"O, it's not 'Good-by,'" he answered, laughing; "of course I must see you to your carriage; and then —"

"But I'm going to walk," avowed literal Jinny; "a fly's too dear."

"All the jollier. I'll come with you, if I may?" There was nothing very tender in the pleading of his bright blue eyes, but Jinny found it irresistible.

"O, I should like it!" she whispered, and soon came forth from the cloakroom with a thin old shawl huddled round her; her dress caught up, regardless of grace, in a great bundle in front, and such an eager, shining, fluttered face as made Fitzpatrick feel at the same time thrills of affection and contempt for her. Poor Jinny! She was lamentably ignorant of these little details of the art of pleasing, to be so imprudently ready to be pleased.

Old Dr. Irving (in deference to some vague notions of "leaving young people alone") plodded on behind the two, who hardly noticed his forbearance, and never thought of a comic, sad, little romance, over years ago, of which a raw young Sawbones and a retired grocer's daughter were hero and heroine. It was a longish walk, and Fitzpatrick became a little tired, and thought with angry sadness of a big cushioned carriage which had brought him and somebody else back from many balls; but Jinny was radiant, and he could not spoil the pleasure ringing so sweetly in the foolish, soft accents, nor mar the perfection of her happiness, because she could not make his own.

The same motive, he believed, made him say, when he left her, that he would "do himself the pleasure of calling."

"Do, please, do!" cried she, squeezing his hand. "O, how kind you are!" And she stood and watched him when he had bid a cheery, respectful good-night to the old doctor, making his way light-somely down the muddy road with the sort of dancing walk, funny enough in its way, which characterizes many cavalry men, but which seemed to her inexperience only another individual charm.

He would almost have laughed could he have guessed the passionate gratitude and trembling reverence with which Jinny regarded him; the latter feeling, indeed, I think little Captain Fitzpatrick had never, in the course of his five-and-twenty years, inspired before. She went up stairs slowly, and sat down on the bed in her little room, without once looking in the glass, as most girls would, under the new and agreeable circumstances, have done; but she was thinking of him, not of herself. She was so bewildered she could not have uttered one of her thoughts distinctly; and after sitting quite still, with a dreamy smile on her lips, for a long time, her head drooped on her shoulder, and she fell asleep.

As to Fitzpatrick, he was on the whole happier than he had allowed himself to be for a long while. This poor child's awkward admiration soothed the self-esteem which had recently received a sad shock; and its character was novel; people were wont to pet, and chaff, and be warm friends with him; but no one had ever seemed to look up to him until now. He resolved inwardly to be very kind and patronizing, and show the world in general, and ~~one~~ lady in particular — whose ears it might reach — that he could be worshipped as well as worship. And then, he really pitied this poor little Miss Lake, wondering that girls did not die, or "go cracked," who led such weary lives as hers.

He came to see her next day, sending in his card by a stolid maid, to whom he had first to explain this piece of courteous propriety. He found her alone, in a dingy, slovenly room, with a faded "Kidderminster" on the floor, fluffy green rep curtains, and stunted furniture of a mysterious red wood, which might have been mahogany, or deal red ochre, and varnish. There were some gaudy cheap china vases, containing bouquets of paper flowers, on the mantelpiece, reflected in a little greenish chimney-glass; two portraits of Jinny's parents (a pale ugly clergyman, and a pale pretty governess), flanked with some smudgy prints, decorated the walls; while the signs of occupation, which sometimes redeem an otherwise dreary apartment, were here only added uglinesses, — some checked dusters in process of hemming; the Slap Bang Polka dog's-eared, open on a rickety, old-fashioned piano; and the ball-dress of last night thrown forlornly on the sofa, to be cobbled up for next time: all this made Fitzpatrick shudder as he came in.

Jinny jumped down from the window-seat, where she had been undisguisedly watching for him, and ran to meet him very gladly, unconscious of the bad policy of her eagerness, which made her visitor cooler in his greeting than he might otherwise have been.

When he was seated he looked at her critically, and came to the conclusion that she was better looking in the day than at night, and her awkwardness rather less apparent in the high woollen dress that veiled her thin, sloping shoulders, and fell in straight, heavy folds — pleasanter to look at than that stiff crumple of tarletane — to her feet. Besides, her hair arranged without attempt at effect, and roughened by the window-curtain against which it had been impatiently rubbed, suited her better; and the creased pink ribbon, twisted inartistically through it, did not "go" badly with her flushed cheeks and soft, colorless eyes. But for all that, — for all her happy look and almost fond smile, — Fitzpatrick was not going to let her off that offence against propriety, — the making this visit look like a rendezvous, by her eager cry: "Here you are at last," and her non-mention of her aunt. It was his duty to teach her such things, so he began in a society tone, tinged with a certain rebuking courtesy: "I hope I shall have the pleasure of seeing Mrs. Lake?"

"I told you she was an invalid, and never came down," returned the mal-à-propos Jinny.

"Did you? Ah! I'd forgotten," said the captain, fibbing, with a view to avenge himself for her persistent want of tact. But she was not hurt by his forgetfulness; she had never thought his gracious ears could remember her silly words; for silly even the every-day folks round her said she was; and what must he think! So she only answered: "I'm glad — no, I don't mean that, only, now, you have no one to talk to but me, have you?" and Fitzpatrick could not but be disarmed by her persistent humility.

He paid her a long visit, and promised to come again. He ascertained where she took her walks, and said inwardly he would sometimes look her up in them; although, when his minute inquiries had led her to cry delightedly, "Are you going there too?" he had replied coldly that he more often rode than walked. He went away much raised in his own estimation, and consequently pleased with Jinny, leaving her in a self-depreciatory state, possibly quite as happy in his way.

She saw him again very often, although he was quartered at the next town, and had to ride or drive over each time. He was always kind to her, and more complimentary than any one else; and he would sometimes hint at a secret trouble in his life, in a way which gave him additional interest in her eyes. Jinny had never known any young men, had scarcely seen any so handsome, or, at all events, so refined, and in a manner fascinating, as Francis Fitzpatrick; no one took any interest in her, cared whether she was pleased or sorry, looked well or ill, laughed or cried, except him. He used to give her hints about etiquette, gravely consider and advise her toilet, lend her novels and poetry, and sometimes send her music, — not songs, for she excruciated him by her faulty pronunciation and "veiled" voice, but easy pieces, or perhaps the last valse.

Then at times he would praise her, and make love to her a little carelessly, — half laughing at his own sentimental speeches, half doubting whether, after all, this humble, adoring little soul would not make a better wife than another he had once courted in vain. And, meanwhile, he ran up to town, paid visits and went to balls in the neighborhood, flirted in a harmless way with every pretty girl he came across, rode in local races, played in local cricket-matches, and was more popular than any other man in his regiment, and deservedly so. Every one liked him: alas! it is a fatal thing to love with entireness somebody whom every one likes. I can hardly tell what were Fitzpatrick's real feelings for Jinny; perhaps he did not know himself; certainly he would not inquire about them too closely, lest they should not warrant his words and actions with regard to her. He pitied her very heartily, enjoyed extremely her deep trust and open adulation; but beyond this, mystery reigned, — a mystery his friend Jones's clumsy, though conscientious efforts to clear up had only increased. Jones had first chaffed him about "the native," and his jokes not being taken as he, Jones, conceived a man in love should take them, he remonstrated, and made Fitzpatrick very angry; his anger with his friend being, perhaps, due partly to anger with himself. But, unluckily, neither had any effect on his conduct towards Jinny.

And Jinny? Three words tell her silly story plainly enough, — she loved him. She had not paused to weigh his love for her, nor think whether he treated her with proper deference, nor whether their positions coincided, nor anything. Her heart had gone from her before she knew she had a heart, almost; and, whatever happened, she could never, never take it back. This awkward girl, with her half-grown ways; with the cooing, tender voice that said so many foolish, frank words; with silly, soft eyes, like those of some gentle, half-tame animal; with her piteous utter ignorance of how to win a lover, and retain him: this country simpleton, who had not even begun to care about dressing becomingly, yet loved with the woful strength, the rash self-abnegation, the dreadful faith that has made of women noblest martyrs and basest criminals in all ages; which bade fair to make of her, with her commonplace surroundings, only one more, it might be, hard old maid, it might be, happy wife and mother, — happy despite her unlikeness to her husband's people.

For alas! when Jinny tried to put her love into words, none seemed so fit to express it as the answer to that question in the Catechism which she had learned before she was confirmed; "What is thy duty towards God? To believe in Him, to fear Him, to love Him; with all my heart, with all my mind, with all my soul, with all my strength, to worship Him, to give Him thanks, to put my whole trust in Him, all the days of my life."

An unutterably piteous profanity, almost to be pardoned when you think of the certain promise of failure and despair in the application of such awful words to a mere human being, especially a human being like Captain Francis Fitzpatrick.

But Jinny, rejoicing in the sunshine, recked no more of a better Light than she did of the coming darkness, and considered him missionary rather than tempter. Did he not tell her what was proper, and did he not say propriety was goodness polished, and in a society setting? She never told herself he could not change, because that would have been, to her single mind, to acknowledge a possibility of his not loving her, and his looks and tones declared — O a great deal more surely than words — that he did! And to care for a stupid, ugly thing like her must be great love indeed, all his virtue, and none of hers.

So Jinny reasoned, and grew more familiar with her gay captain, and now came and sat near him, and stared devotedly in his face, or took his hand in her long, thin fingers, admiring its delicacy, or the perfection of his dress, from the brown velvet morning coat to the Indian gold coins that fastened his wristbands, and the marvel of a boot that defined that high-bred, slender foot. And Jinny's open and lavish tribute began to shock him a little; that other, had she loved him ever so, would never have let him see it so slavishly; Jinny's fond flatteries began to pall; there had been stinging sweets of old, far racier in flavor. Besides, the wound Jinny had soothed was healing, and invalid diet became proportionately mawkish. "But it would be so awfully awkward to cut the thing suddenly, and really she was a dear little child, and too good for a heedless fellow like him, — in some ways, — not good enough in others; not fair, nor stately, nor clever enough to present to the regiment and society as Mrs. Fitzpatrick. No doubt the affair would in some way die a natural death, and if not — if not — why, hang it all! the girl should n't have made love to him in that way!" to which girl, next moment, he would make such a speech as: "No, you may n't be pretty, exactly, but I'd rather sit here with you than with all the pretty girls under the sun."

And Jinny would give a tender half-shake of her head, and stare at him with her big, wistful eyes in silent, adoring gratitude.

After these impulses of treachery, Fitzpatrick was subject to revulsions of kindness, in one of which he committed a rash act. He asked Jinny, and old Dr. Irving, as her chaperon, to a dance his regiment were about to give prior to their departure.

The unfortunate child danced about the room when he revealed the former fact to her (carefully concealing the latter); her joy was not quite so graceful in act as in feeling, and Fitzpatrick, with rather a cross laugh, told her she would tire herself before the party if she did not stop.

So she crept up to him, instantly subdued, and asked with an absurd air of tragic anxiety: "Can I wear my tarletane frock again?"

"No, by Jove! I don't think you can," he answered. "You must manage something else, — coax it out of the aunt, or spend your pocket-money; there's a good child. I want you to look nice."

A sweet, warm feeling made Jinny thrill at the "owning" sound of his last words: to be a credit to him, for him to be proud of her! If Jinny had been offered marriage by the Prince of Wales, and an act of Parliament made on purpose, it would not have flattered her half so much. She grew confident, and said, with a new little air of dignity, "O I'll manage somehow."

And the impressionable little officer thought he might rely on the feminine art he had been the first to awaken. Jinny's aunt, who always heard of his visits, and always said, in answer to her niece's rapture, "He must be very agreeable,—give me my drops, dear," and then always shut her eyes and slept,—gave her consent; the doctor said he would take her; so there was no obstacle in her way, and she was perfectly happy.

II. — JINNY'S SECOND BALL.

"I have no one but you!"

Jinny's dressing for the ball was a feverish affair indeed, and when she took a final survey of herself in the glass, a burst of tears was the result. "I look so—so ugly," she sobbed; "he'll be ashamed of me." And then she scandalized her clumsy attendant by adding in a low, piteous tone: "If I'd only prayed to be pretty all this time, I might have been made so by now."

However, she had to choke down her tears (it was well, for she had not the rare art of crying becomingly), for the fly, which Dr. Irving paid, was at the door. She had no loving, last inspections to go through; her aunt had been in bed an hour, and their one maid had "no opinion of Miss Jinny." Besides—awful thought!—she might keep him waiting. So she ran down stairs, jumped into the fly, with breathless, fervent thanks to Dr. Irving, and was on her road to paradise.

The moment of alighting, of finding her arm instantly in his, of being led into a whirling world of lights and music, and all wonder and beauty; of flying with him down a long vista made by shining dresses and uniforms, seemed to Jinny ever after (such a brief earthly "ever" as hers was!) like an incredibly glorious dream. She could not speak, nor clearly see what went on around her; could only breathe out the weight of her happiness in long sobbing sighs, till the first dance was over. Then she looked up at him with such mingled rapture and devotion that he was moved and half-frightened, and exclaimed, "By Jove! you absurd little thing, what is it? What are you making those big eyes of yours bigger, if possible, about?"

"It is all so delightful!" she answered, clinging closer to his arm. "I think that night Fitzpatrick found it delightful too; for Jinny, dressed all in white, with a tall "mother-of-pearl" comb in her brown hair, and the unfailling black velvet round her throat, looked her best (though she had not thought so), and was stimulated to unwanted powers of repartee by a certain playful tenderness which peeped out in her "friend's" manner, by certain small attentions too, that seemed to her guileless mind very serious and sweet signs. At first, perhaps, she danced with too hearty enjoyment to be graceful; but the passion of happiness, for which her stagnant existence had ill prepared her, acted like physical fatigue. She soon sank into a state of silent and exalted bliss, too great for words or gestures of delight; only her poor little face beamed, a great still radiance lit her round eyes, till they seemed gazing at paradise; and whether she sat at Fitzpatrick's side, or danced with him, or looked up in his face as he bent over her, there was a fond, helpless, clinging confidence in her attitude that told the same tale: "My sun, my strength, my life, how should I live without thee."

But the moment came when all this bliss was to end, and forever, if she had but known it. Unhappy child! it was perhaps her very own silly hand—silly, because it forgot all else in his clasp—that wrote the first letter of the fatal "Finis." When she was cloaked, when Dr. Irving had gone to see about the fly, Fitzpatrick stayed with her, and told her he should see her home. "We can drop the old doctor," he said, gazing into her face with a very kind smile, and pressing her hand to his side. "And then I'll see my guest home. That'll be quite the right thing to do, eh, Jinny? Won't it, little one?"

She nodded vehemently; he felt her droop and lean against him with a movement of trusting love he could not misinterpret.

"Are you tired, darling?" he asked, with a vague impulse of caressing gratitude. "Not tired of me, you wicked little child?"

"O, how could I be!" she sighed; and then Dr. Irving came to announce the fly, and acquiesce sleepily in Fitzpatrick's little arrangement; and they three got in, and were driven off.

"Good night, my dear; sleep well," said Jinny's chaperon, with a curious doubt and tremble in his voice, and a curious suspicious glance at her companion. "Take care of her, sir; she's alone." Then he got out, and pattered up the path to his dreary little cottage, without ever a look back at the clear stars just waning in the early morning grayness, though dead-and-gone memories were wakening in his dull breast.

Fitzpatrick was quiet enough during the rest of the drive, though he did not draw back from the girlish figure that leaned against his shoulder; though he took the thin hand that was so woefully ready to be taken, he refrained from putting his arm round her, or speaking more words of love. Slumbering honor was stirring a little; Jinny was so utterly and awfully in his power, he was for the time more afraid of her than of the most self-possessed prude in the world.

But this was not to last; when the fly had set them down, and rattled away, Fitzpatrick still lingered, and stood close to her. The sky was growing from deep blue to warm pearly gray; the stars fading tranquilly out; a soft air stirred the shrubs in the little garden, and blew a long tress that had lost its curl against his cheek, and sighed a tender little song in Jinny's ear. The sky, and the wind, and the flowers were very sweet: in that July night, society, society's restrictions and obligations seemed worlds off. He forgot for a moment that he had given his heart elsewhere; he forgot that Jinny Lake was ugly, and simple, and poor, could only spoil his worldly career, and never satisfy the fastidious cravings of eye and mind. He only realized, looking down on that innocent face, shining with a soft glory of believing love, that he was all her life to her; had moulded her every thought and deed since their first meeting, that here was a worshipper who, disowned and rejected, no after power and success could ever give back to him.

"O Jinny," he began painfully, and stopped.

Then she found words at last,—words piteous through trust, not through doubt.

"Oh, I do, do love you! You won't leave me, will you? I have no one but you, indeed, indeed, I could not live."

Her head had fallen on his shoulder; her large eyes were lifted, wet with tears; in the faint starlight he saw the half-smile of fervent happiness on her lips, and bent and kissed them, — kissed that smile away from them.

"And I love you, too, my own, dearest little Jinny," he murmured.

She lay quiet on his breast till he saw fit to release her, which he did presently with a troubled: "I must not keep you in the night-air, my child. Give me another kiss for 'Good-night.'"

She was very obedient: she trusted him so; her lips were put up like a child's; she never asked whether he would come on the morrow, nor when, nor wanted promises and asseverations, as some women do.

"Good-night, my darling," he said, turning away.

"Good-night, good-by," said Jinny, crying happily. Then she gathered a late rosebud, and gave it him; and he taking it, — her first gift of love, — with tender and gallant thanks, left her.

She leaned her bare arms on the top of the little gate, and looked at him, picking his way daintily across the stony road; once he turned, and took off his hat, and she kissed her hand many times, fondly. She stayed there a long while, staring in vague, passionate thankfulness at the blushing sky, rehearsing over and over again in her own mind his words, his kisses, his kind looks, — wishing the morning sunshine would come and bring him back; for would he not be with her always and forever now, since he had said he loved her, and his love could not forsake or lie, whatever they said in story-books!

How she would obey and please him in all things! how hard she would try not to be awkward and foolish any more, to move and speak gracefully as he said girls ~~should~~ move and speak, to learn the music and sketch the scenes which Fitzpatrick had admired. She would go out that very day, later, and try and copy a barn, with a group of birch trees behind it, and then begin to practise a new valse. Well, it seemed very hard to leave the spot his recent presence had made lovely, to turn away from the magical morning glow breaking over the distant wood, from the low twitter of the little birds in the nearer trees, and shut herself up in her ugly little room.

But she should take her fairy gift of joy with her there, close to her heart, never, never to leave it more, except with life, and what outer dreariness could matter now? "Nothing, nothing matters!" she whispered to herself, fondling her own hand because he had held it in his, as she laid her head (such a dizzy, throbbing head!) on the pillow; "I can never be unhappy again."

Morning came; Jinny gave her aunt an account of the ball, in which Fitzpatrick figured prominently enough, but she did not repeat his words. She had a vague notion he would want to see that lady himself; and if not, why, there was plenty of time to tell the sweet secret that was, as yet, her very, very own, — no sharer in it.

So she drew, and practised, put on her prettiest dress, and then began to think it time for Fitzpatrick to come. She was not a bit exacting; but he had said he loved her, and she judged his love by hers.

She sat in the window waiting, or ran down the garden path, heedless of sun and dust, to look out at the gate, from morning to sunset. She strained her eyes till it was black night, and came back into the room with sad reluctance, but without the faintest touch of fear or distrust.

He did not come the next day, nor the next to that. But why drag out such a story? He did not come at all. Weeks — months passed. Through all the glaring summer, passers-by never missed the slight unformed figure crouched in the window-seat behind the faded green rep curtain, or standing at the little gate with its blistered paint, one thin hand shading the round, soft eyes that stared yearningly down the dull road, and blinked back the sad tears that would rise sometimes, or pressed against two simple lips ever in a piteous quiver of expectation. People learned to notice her, — notice the two muslin frocks she wore, — blue and lilac "week and week about," growing more limp and faded each time; the heavy hair she soon ceased to dress with care and pleasure; the plain face that was plain again now, and had a startled, feverish wildness in the great, wistful eyes. She did not care if it was fine or dull, whether the sun scorched or the rain chilled her: if the maid brought her a cloak, she would huddle it round her abstractedly, or perhaps let it fall. It did not much matter, — nothing mattered now, she repeated with dull iteration, not until he came.

I cannot tell her feelings; I can only say she loved him better than ever, if she believed in him so utterly no more. She might have thought him ill or dead; only one of the tradesmen, who sometimes went to the town where his regiment was quartered, had seen him at intervals apparently quite well and cheerful. She thought he must have some good reason for keeping away as he did it; perhaps he wanted to see if she really loved him.

She was patient; and waited because she could do nothing else, — she knew none of his friends, and she dared not try to find out indirectly about him.

Still less, at first, did she dare to write to him; she had heard him condemn so severely a lady who had taken some such step; but as his maxims of propriety faded, as the yearning to see him widened and deepened in the woman's heart, her fears forsook her. Four months after the July dawn that saw their parting she wrote him a letter, which abrupt and ill dictated as it was, had the pathos of a hundred impassioned appeals in its helpless pleadings. Twenty times it was written out in Jinny's best hand, and torn up: completed, it was, after all, a brief and simple epistle: —

MY DEAREST CAPTAIN FITZPATRICK, — Please will you tell me if I have done anything to vex you, for I am so very unhappy because you do not come. I know the young ladies you know do not write to gentlemen; but I have only you, and cannot help writing; and I will never do it again. Indeed, indeed, I do love you so very much, and am till I die your own JINNY."

Why did he not come? Poor Jinny! The question that perplexed her so was easily answered.

The morning after the ball, the evening glamour over, he took himself to task. He had gone too far with a child he never meant to marry, — a good, affectionate, ugly little girl, whom it was absurd to suppose could ever be his wife. He was truly very sorry to part from her, to lose her foolish flatteries and lavish sympathy; but for her sake, even more than his own, things must go no further.

It would not do to have farewell scenes, for he knew he was soft-hearted, and could not bear to see a woman cry. There were no presents to be sent back; one poor little rosebud he did indeed, with a sigh, fling into the grate; but the music he had given her, poor little soul! she was welcome to keep,—even to play it to some cad of a fellow whom she would end by marrying. He became a little plaintive on this text, thinking of little Jinny's loving ways; but was soon consoled by an invitation to stay at a specially "jolly" house in the neighborhood, where there were lots of horses and pretty girls. That was Fitzpatrick's epitaph for his last amusement.

Jinny's letter, coming when he was on leave, first gave him a fit of the blues, and then made him quite angry it should have had such a power,—so ill spelled, written, and expressed an epistle.

He tore it up, angry with himself and her, stamped about the room, and made a wholesome resolution to be careful of country-town innocence for the future.

After this ebullition, his spirits returned, and he soon became, to use his own phrase, "as jolly as ever."

"By Jove, cunning dodge that letter!" he laughed to himself. "But it's no go, my little friend; we are not quite so green as you fancy. If I ever console myself about the old trouble, it won't be with you. Ah! what a girl that other was; such a lot of style, and go, and pluck!"

Alas! if Jinny could have seen the reception of her first poor little heart-utterance, her love-letter, written when love, on one side at least, had long been over!

III. — JINNY'S THIRD BALL.

"You did not know what you were doing, did you?"

One day Dick Jones ran over to the town to visit some friends who were staying there. Returning from his call, as he walked down the High Street, a timid voice arrested him. He turned round, and saw, sad in the gleamy, winter sunshine, a wan young face, with great, yearning eyes in piteous search of his, a white, pinched mouth, and dark hair pushed carelessly back under a shabby brown hat.

"By Jove! Fitzpatrick's Miss Jinny," he cried, shaking her cold hand heartily. "But, I say, you've been ill, have n't you? O poor girl, you look awfully seedy!"

"I am not ill," said the soft voice, trying hard to be steady. "At least, I shall be well when—when he comes back,—Captain Fitzpatrick, you know. Is he well? Where is he?"

"O, Fitzpatrick's all right," the good-natured officer answered, soberly. "He's on leave, but coming back for our ball, you know."

"Your ball," said Jinny, hesitating, and with the ghost of one of her old painful blushes rising to her cheek. "I wanted—wanted to ask—I thought perhaps—O Mr. Jones!" She broke down, and put her hand over her eyes, sobbing.

"Go on, go on," said Jones, distressed and sympathetic. "Hang it, I'll do anything."

"I did so want a card for your ball," she murmured, looking up tearfully. "I have a sovereign

—I could pay—O, I would n't ask if I was n't—was n't—wretched!" And she cried again.

Mr. Jones did not hesitate a moment. "Pay! Bosh!" he exclaimed. "You shall have tickets, certainly,—you and that old fellow, the doctor. You should, if I had to sell my—my—grandmother. Only look here; don't you cry like that, you make one feel so horribly queer. Now, I say, that's worse!"

For Jinny had seized both his hands, and was trying to kiss them, a ceremony no one had assuredly ever performed towards this excellent officer before. He released himself, and departed, promising to send the tickets; and he was faithful, though he could not stay for the ball himself; he wished he could,—“For I'm sure the poor little soul wants looking after,” he thought. “O Fitz, you're a sad fellow; you've done a cruel job here, I'm afraid!”

Which “Fitz,” all unconscious of what was hanging over him, had become very cheerful, and much on the alert. She, “that other girl,” was coming to the ball, and, perhaps, who knows,—as he had been so constant. Such a pretty girl,—no end of style and pluck. Old Dr. Irving had been away a long time, and only came back because he received an imploring note from Jinny, begging his escort for the ball,—came, indeed, but just in time to call for her, and take her there. So he knew nothing of the town gossip,—of how Jinny Lake had lost her lover, and wore the willow openly, and how that lover was consoling himself.

This ball was no brilliant dream, but a tissue of dreary, cruel realities; this ball had no firm arm for her to lean on, no winning eyes, no fervent lips, to look and smile on hers, no bold, gay voice to whisper patronizing praise or kind instructions in her charmed ear, no envious feminine glances nor amused masculine ones, to follow her. Not that she had cared about those latter, save as confirmation of the happy truth, that seemed truth then, at least. She went down the room on her old friend's uncertain arm, trying to smile and talk to him, but looking wildly round and starting at every passing voice or step. She had read something about a gambler's last throw, and she thought to herself this was hers. If she won it, O, what might not be!—if she lost it, well, everything would be over. She must go away somewhere into the dark, and die; he might be sorry then, just a little, and believe she loved him,—him only.

Her last throw,—miserable little gambler! she was preparing for it, as with flaming cheeks, the eager, liquid glitter in her round eyes, restless gestures, and wild little laughs and exclamations, she stood by Dr. Irving's side. A fossil plesiosaurus and a living butterfly could scarcely have presented a greater contrast; the life in him nearly burned out, the life in the other leaping, throbbing, racing, in a passion of fear and love, at a fever heat.

Alas! she did not look her best,—she had not thought of trying to look her best; her dress was dowdy and unbecoming, her rapid movements and flushed, anxious face did not become her either.

“Where's your young officer?” asked Dr. Irving presently. “Before, he was here to meet you.”

“O, he is coming, coming,” said Jinny, faithful in her faith. “He is so kind.”

Nevertheless, she waited long and vainly. But, towards the middle of the evening, a slight, quick figure, the profile of a big mustache and a glossy cropped head, caught her eye. Her heart came up in her throat, and strangled the cry that rose there; the floor dipped, and the ceiling came down, she thought. But she made a violent, unconscious effort, and, recovering herself, stared with fixed entreaty at her false lover. Poor Jinny! she frightened his weaker nature by the very intensity of feeling that might have moved a stronger, as she stood with her neck a little stretched towards him, her quivering hands half open, as though waiting to clasp his, her large eyes aflame, as if each had a separate life, whose only object was his love, her lips starting with the quick leaps of her heart.

He glanced at her, then averted his eyes, inclined his head carelessly, and disappeared among the crowd.

A choked "O Captain Fitzpatrick!" pursued him, but it was too faint and sobbing for him to hear.

"My dear, had'n't you better go home?" said Dr. Irving, with a heavy, pitying look, pressing her hand a little.

"I don't want to," she answered, abstractedly, straining her eyes after the lithe figure gliding through the throng.

"You see, you don't know any one — and — had'n't you better?"

"No, no," cried Jinny, impatiently, and in a voice of despair; "leave me alone!"

So he ceased his entreaties, seeing too plainly that this frail vessel of hope would soon shatter itself against the rocks of inevitableness, and be at rest.

And Jinny thought that was not her last throw, after all, — she had one more left. One more: to get near him without his perceiving it, and speak to him before he could turn away. She would wait and be very patient, but she would speak that night; for — who knew? — they might never meet again, — she might die, or he go far away. She got away from Dr. Irving (he was not hard to elude) and wandered about; but Fitzpatrick seemed to have disappeared. She was beginning to feel sick and hopeless with her weary search, when the gay familiar tones fell on her ear. She was in a passage leading to the supper-room, and his voice came from thence: to where that voice, calling her fond names no longer, could yet speak, she went blindly, unconscious that the old doctor followed her.

The room was empty of all but two when she stood in the doorway, and looked in, — two, and who were they? A young lady, fair and pretty, and coquettish, beautifully dressed in pale blue satin and blush roses, with pearls round her white throat and in her ears, and dazzling golden hair dressed high, with showers of ringlets falling from it, — a young lady in whose face wretched, awkward, foolish Jinny saw not only beauty, but wit, and earnestness, and love, who was smiling a soft complacent smile, and glancing up with a look half impertinent, half fond at her companion, who was evidently her lover.

Her companion — her lover? No, Jinny's, — Jinny's by a thousand tender words, tender glances, tender thoughts, by those two passionate kisses in the dim sweetness of the July dawn, by all he had taught her which she could never unlearn, by the life which had no being save in his love now.

And her captain, tender and true, was leaning lovingly over this new girl, saying soft things in her ear, with a look of such utter satisfaction, joy, and rest, as he had never worn yet; and now taking a slender, lovely hand, and kissing it worshippingly, and now — it could not be! — holding her in his arms to his heart.

Jinny felt very tired; she thought she could hear her own heart moaning inly, because it was so lonely and so cold; her hapless eyes seemed strained wide open by cruel fingers; her lips got white, her knees wavered, her chest and her throat burned like fire. But she could not look nor move away, till, suddenly, Fitzpatrick's eyes met hers. Fresh from his recent triumph, beaming and tender, yet so familiar, she could not endure to see it. She threw up her arms with a stifled cry of agony, and staggered towards him. Then she thought something within her snapped and crashed; a strange sense of quietness, a numbness of death chilled the fiery pain, her strained eyelids relaxed, and she turned away, and came back waveringly to Dr. Irving. She did not care to look any longer, nor to hear what those two said. She knew it was all over with her; she did not care for anything, since God let such cruel things as this be, except to be quiet and away from all the people; to go back, and lie down in the dark.

"I am so cold. The light hurts my eyes," she said; and he, in silence, gave her his arm, and took her home. He was very sorry; but what could he do? Perhaps, after all, the worst was over, since she was so quiet. She could not come to much harm now.

She bade him "Good-night," and went up to her room very quietly; undressed in a dazed, mechanical way, and lay down. Even then she did not cry, or moan, or toss about. She lay open-eyed, without stirring a finger, staring into the darkness. So the maid found her when, as the morning sunlight streamed into the room, she came in full of questions about the ball, which Jinny did not hear nor answer at all, except when the woman mentioned Fitzpatrick's name. Then she stirred, and made a little sound of tired impatience, and turned away from the light.

She could not be persuaded to eat, nor get up, nor even sit up in bed. She shook her head when a book was offered her; she heeded the servant's indignation no more than the wind whistling outside; her aunt's message made no difference to her.

At last, Wilkins, the maid, got frightened, and sent for Dr. Irving. He came, felt the poor child's pulse, looked at her tongue, asked whether she had "any pain anywhere," — to which she shook her head, — and then stood drearily staring at her. "She's low," he said. "Wants tonics and cheering; but there's nothing to lie in bed for. Will you get up, Miss Jinny?"

She shook her head again, with a look of aversion. "Why not — eh? Nothing ails you, you foolish little girl; does it?"

Then Jinny looked up with a dim, scornful smile, and spoke at last: "I think my heart is broken," said she. "And, please, I want nothing."

Irving shrugged his shoulders, and went out. There was nothing to be done; Jinny could not well be dragged out of bed, or have food forced down her throat. Some soup and wine were, however, given her in the course of the day, but with no rousing effect. She did not speak, nor cry, nor give trouble; nothing seemed to pain her except the sunshine, from which she turned wearily away. Her aunt had been bedridden for years, and besides, could not realize Jinny's strange state.

So Jinny lay unvisited one day, — two, three, five, seven, ten days. Then the doctor came again looked very serious; and stayed a long while, trying to rouse her. He talked of the ball, of Fitzpatrick, — praised, blamed, reviled him; but even that once dear and powerful name was powerless now; her lips never quivered, her fixed eyes never moved.

He had her lifted out of bed, and supported (she was too weak to stand) to the window. She only shuddered a little, and seemed impatient to be disturbed. And Irving said, if she showed no signs of mending, another doctor must be called in.

In a week she had not mended, she was worse; and the physician summoned to her gave the astounding news that she never would mend, — news which chilled awfully those who had done their duty by her with indifference and almost with contempt.

"Miss Jinny" would never get well, to tease and trouble with her many wants, her awkward performance of the little tasks that fell to her share, her long, foolish dreamings, any more. She was beyond all that, — beyond the long watch and the vain waiting; forever beyond improvement and deterioration alike.

Wilkins, the maid, when she had cried over the sad truth, sobbed out a confession that she did not think the poor child "fit to go." Of late, Wilkins said — O, all last year — she had seemed to give over saying her prayers and reading her Bible; she had not seemed to listen or care when she, Wilkins, read it to her. The two doctors had not much to do with this, but they were sorry and disturbed. They did not guess what little messenger, soulless and dumb, was doing God's work with poor Jinny's wandering soul.

As she lay there, dimly wandering through the past year, one bitter thought, momentarily more intense, grew in her mind, that no one could ever love her, — not her aunt, not Wilkins, not her dear captain, not even He who took up and comforted the forsaken; that therefore she was lost forever; while with this strangely mingled the remembrance of her lover's last kiss. "No one cares for me!" she moaned. A low, soft cry answered her, something tender and warm touched her cheek. That cry, that touch, went to her very soul, though it was only the cat, whose kitten had died, and who was mourning it in her way. "O Kitty, Kitty!" she cried, "do you love me, after all?" And then the tears came forth, and ran down her cheeks, and she wept for many hours.

Wilkins need not have troubled herself about her state of mind; the cat was the best missionary to poor Jinny, who had been a little heathen in all save the forms of religion till now; and then she was very near death, and so saw things with wonderful clearness and truth, though she had no words to speak of them.

Her one great fault had brought a far greater anguish, and was bringing fast upon her the peace the world could not give. She was very sorry for all she had done wrong, and prayed humbly for pardon for her idol worship, — prayed that no punishment might come on the idol's head for her own silly weakness. Finally, almost at the last, when she had kissed the cat's head, and had said, "Pussy, I hope you will have another little one to comfort you," and it had been taken out of the room, she asked whether she might send a message to Captain Fitzpatrick. "Tell him I was n't angry, and I don't mind now. And give him my dear love; tell him, if he will come, I should like to give it him myself. You know," she said to the old doctor, taking his hand with a weak smile, "I'm not like Kitty, — no other can comfort me for him."

And Dr. Irving, seeing her calmness, and with a certain stern wish that Fitzpatrick should behold his own work, went and did her bidding.

It was a startling thing to be snatched suddenly from the sunny-scented boudoir, where his lady-love sat singing bright little French songs to him; to stand beside the death-bed of another, loving and true, whom he had done to death through her too tender trust, — stand in the still, darkened room, with no sound save her last labored breathings, alone with his victim. Though, as he followed the doctor through the familiar gate, this thought troubled him, the remembrance of Jinny's blind adoration rendered it less terrible. She would either adore him still, he believed, or else reproach and rave at him in a way that should do much to justify his desertion. Yet his light step was sober, as it paused at her door, his bright eyes wavering and troubled, for Fitzpatrick's heart and conscience were not dead.

"Jinny," said Irving, "will you see him now?"

"Is he come?" said Jinny. "O please."

Fitzpatrick entered gently, prepared to comfort, soothe, feign his old love, if need be; for she might die happier if so deceived. But the instant his gaze fell upon the bed, his hopes, his visions of keeping still the old superior position vanished. Jinny was grown a woman, was his first thought, and almost beautiful, — could not love him humbly now, as she used to do, nor trouble him with over-praise. She was white, and thin, and plainly dying; her mouth was drawn, and wore a sweet smile of conquered pain; her big eyes looked bigger than ever, and had a steady, peaceful shining, an almost divine radiance that brightened all her face. The very faint movements of her hands had a strange significance and dignity, — Jinny would never more be rude or shy, — awkward, silly, hoydenish, little foolish Jinny would never more believe and be betrayed, trust and be forsaken, cry, or trouble, or wait and weary, again. That was all over. It was Fitzpatrick now who had no words, who was awed, almost frightened, who needed her sweet welcoming gesture before he could venture to approach. Once his slave, — a queen was more approachable; once his toy, — now almost an angel of God; once praying pardon so piteously for small errors or none, — now, why, her very love, if love it was that made her summon him, seemed only the far-off pity and pardon of a glorified saint. He hesitated, a dark red flush covered his face, his eyes fell as he came near her, he dared not even ask if she forgave, but broke down and sobbed at the first word.

"O, don't cry like that," said Jinny, stroking his hand with both hers very tenderly. "Never mind; you are sorry; you did not know what you were doing, did you, dear? It was my fault; I wrote I could n't live without you, and I am dying, you see. But indeed, I don't care. I am quite, quite happy."

"O, by Jove!" cried Fitzpatrick, the tears running down his cheeks now. "Sorry? I should think so! You make me feel what a scoundrel I've been. I'd sooner you shot me than be so sweet, and, and talk in this way."

"But I must," Jinny murmured in her weak voice. "I could n't be cross the last, last time." Then she pointed to a chair by the bedside; and Fitzpatrick sat down silently, humbled, repentant, self-hating, as he had never in the course of his easy life been before.

Jinny spoke again presently, with a little sigh: "You are going to be married, are n't you, to that young lady in pink and blue?"

"Yes, I believe so," answered Fitzpatrick, hanging his head; he had almost added, in the depth of his remorse, "not unless you like it."

"Ah!" said Jinny, sighing again, "I hope you will be happy; but, my dear captain, you won't make any one else think you love them, and then leave them, will you?"

"Never again," answered Fitzpatrick, under his breath; "I shall never forget this, nor you."

Poor Jinny, she was past blushing; but she smiled a little, and her dim eyes brightened in the old fond, foolish way at his words.

Then she sank into silence, and lay quiet, holding his hand, and looking dreamily at the fading sunset red beyond the window, — an early sunset, like her own. Fitzpatrick rebelled against it; he could not bear to see her lying there with a weak smile of patient fondness flickering across her lips, or a sharp gasp and quiver of pain shaking her slight frame.

"Jinny," he asked, hopelessly, "won't you get well? What's the matter with you?"

She did not tell him, as she told the doctor, that her heart was broken, nor that it was so, as she told herself, by his desertion; she was meek and childishly tender now, as she had always been.

"No, dear," she said, faintly; "I'm going to die."

"O Jinny," he muttered, in a wild way, "if you could live, I'd be different to you, I swear I would."

"No; you love some one else, my dear captain, and you must be good to her. I know — I know I was n't fit to be your wife. But everything is right now."

It was getting very dark, and a strange trembling awe crept over gay Captain Fitzpatrick's soul as he sat alone with his innocent victim, her frail fingers clinging round his hand, her failing breath on his bowed face.

She was going to die, and for his sake. Her hand was getting very cold in his this minute, but she murmured something faintly.

He bent his head to hear the question, —

"Is n't there a new moon?"

"Yes."

"You ought to wish, ought n't you? I remember I did; but Christ's will is better than our wish, is n't it? Dear, I feel so weak, so — so —"

"I'll call the doctor. O Jinny!"

"No, don't call any one; I only want you. Don't go; I'm not afraid. Only say 'Our Father' to me."

He tried, but the first word choked him utterly, and Jinny began to whisper it herself. She soon ceased, and lay quite still for a while. Then, suddenly, she sat up, and groped in the dark.

"Where are you?" she panted. "I'm afraid."

"I'm here, quite close," cried Fitzpatrick, in terror. But she was thinking of him no longer, and he quailed. In the dark, he heard her nestle into the pillow, murmuring something that sounded like, "So, so tired — all alone — so glad to rest," and heave a long, satisfied sigh. He thought she was dead, and felt a strangely bitter pang that she had not said "Good-by."

But little Jinny was faithful in death as in life. Her weak hand felt over his face, and tried tenderly to wipe away his tears. Her voice, which now he strained his ear to catch, though once he had listened to it so heedlessly, murmured in a fond, pitying sigh, "Don't mind; don't cry, love. Please God, comfort and bless my —"

And before Fitzpatrick could credit and understand that this prayer was for him, Jinny herself was comforted, and lying in arms that could never grow cold or false, or let her go, as his had done.

He kissed her quiet hand timidly before he went away, and could hardly believe it would never stroke his cheek, or try to detain him as it used to do, any more.

He felt unwontedly heavy and sober as he left the mournful house, as though he had left there a bit of the world's brightness.

Soon, there was a little white cross in the churchyard under the old willows, — the willow no one could taunt her with wearing now, — and a simple inscription: —

JINNY. Aged 16 years and 10 months.

"He shall gather the lambs with his arm, and bear them in His bosom."

Old Dr. Irving, standing long after by that little grave, muttered to himself sadly, "Whom the gods love die young"; for though the first year there was a bunch of lilies and snowdrops upon it, the second it was forgotten.

MR. LELAND'S WIT AND HUMOR.

ONLY a few months ago the poetical works of Mr. Leland, an American genius, were added to our literature, and already they have achieved wide popularity and great renown. The Breitmann Ballads have been sold by thousands, by tens of thousands, in our own country and in the land of their birth. In America they are a rage; in England publishers are quarrelling for the honor and profit of printing them. They are read wherever the name of Mudie has penetrated; they are quoted more often than the works of any other poet living; and severe critics, even our contemporary, the Spectator, have laboriously explained and extolled them. And even till to-day we have been unable to discover in these verses any merit whatever. The subtle humor, the lively wit, the graphic description, for which they have been praised so heartily, — again and again we searched Mr. Leland's works for a sign of any one of these qualities, and found it not: what we did find was nothing more excellent or endearing than the fun of British music halls. Now it is an uncomfortable thing, of course, to be quite at discord with the opinion of the time; and therefore we are rather pleased with the idea that we have just discovered why the Breitmann Poems have seemed to us hitherto downright rubbish. It is because they are written in the jargon of a German clown who has half learned English. Why this wretched lingo should be chosen by the poet as the vehicle of his wit, his humor, his satire, is still a puzzle. Clearly, there is no humor in printing p's for b's, v's for f's; no very remarkable effort of genius in calling a piano a biano, or a party a barty. It would be an insult to Mr. Leland to suppose he thinks it witty to say "anoder" instead of "another," — an insult to his critical admirers to imagine that they take that for humor which, will nilly, is acquired by every hind and tinker who half learns a language not his own. No; the broken English must be accepted as a mere eccentricity, harmless perhaps, and not more to be regarded than a similar disposition of genius to be boorish and to go dirty. But then this eccentricity has, for all we know, utterly blinded us to the real merits of the author; and if this be its result in our own case, maybe other readers of the Breitmann Ballads have been misled in like manner. Then why not print an edition of these poems in good English? Why not strip them of a style that places them on a level with the Ballad of Jim Crow (which is written in another American dialect), and thus make their merits clear which now are so obscure? The change must be very easy;—it is only the alteration of a few consonants. Let us ourselves make the attempt. For this purpose it is only fair to take the writer's best poem; the work upon which its writer's reputation mainly rests; his first work; the ballad which in a single day gave him all the applause in America which has since been echoed on these shores. Here and there, where the rhyme requires it, we must retain the author's Germanisms, but these cases are not so frequent as to injure a really intelligible and plain version of that celebrated poem:—

HANS BREITMANN'S PARTY.

Hans Breitmann gave a party;
They had piano-playing.
I fell in love with an American girl,
Her name was Matilda Jane.
She had hair as brown as a "pretzel,"
Her eyes were heavenly blue,
And when they looked into mine
They split my head in two.

Hans Breitmann gave a party,
I went there, you'll be bound;
I waltzed with Matilda Jane,
And went spinning round and round.
The prettiest damsel in the house,
She weighed about two hundred pound,
And every time she gave a jump
She made the windows sound.

Hans Breitmann gave a party,
I tell you it cost him dear;
They rolled in more than seven kegs
Of first-rate lager-beer.
And whenever they knocked the spigot in,
The Dutchmen gave a cheer,
I think that so fine a party
Never came to a head this year.

Hans Breitmann gave a party,
There all was "soupe and brouse";
When the supper came in the company
Did make themselves to house;
They ate the bread and gusnybroost;
Sausages and roast meats fine,
And washed the supper down
With four barrels of Neckar wine.

Hans Breitmann gave a party,
We all got drunk as pigs;
I put my mouth to a barrel of beer
And emptied it up with a swig;
And then I kissed Matilda Jane,
And she struck me on the kop,
And the company fought with table-legs
Till the constable made us stop.

Hans Breitmann gave a party, —
Where is that party now?
Where is the lovely golden cloud
That floats on the mountain's brow?
Where is the heavenly shining star —
The star of the spirit's light?
All gone away with the lager-beer
Away in the ewigkelt. †

* Meaning "a cracknel, or bun."

† American-German for "riot and bustle."

‡ Which signifies (and what a world of humor lurks here!) slices from the breast of a goose.

We flatter ourselves that this little bit of translation is successful. The real qualities of the poem are apparent as soon as we cease to read it in a way which means infirmity when it is natural and buffoonery when it is affected. But even in this version we miss some of the finer qualities of the wit and humorist. There is unquestionably much force in the line

"We all got drunk as pigs."

It is concise. It has the merit of bringing before the reader's mind, at a single stroke of the pen, a distinct and agreeable picture; nor can we withhold the commendation implied in the word "graphic," to works which abound in similar beauties. But something, we know not what,—lack of delicacy perhaps,—forbids its claim to humor; and it is doubtful if more can be said for what is otherwise a striking passage in the same stanza—

"The company fought with table-legs
Till the constable made us stop."

But whatever misgivings may remain in our minds as to the scope of Mr. Leland's genius, we have the satisfaction of having made his merits clear for the first time. Of course we do not say that if all the Breitmann Ballads were subjected to the same treatment they would reveal a similar number of beauties. It must be remarked that we have chosen the best and most popular of them.

DOWN AMONG DEAD GODS.

No undertaking within the ambition of a respectable man is more easy of accomplishment in these days than the Nile voyage. Every step of this journey can be accurately measured before leaving Pall Mall, time fixed, and expense calculated to the piastre. With Murray in portmanteau, and circular notes in his breast-pocket, the traveller takes the Southampton or Dover train; in due time and course of things lands at Alexandria, reaches Cairo, embarks in his dabek, sails up the river, sails down, and comes home again. The gravest adventure he has met was a "spill" from donkey-back at Luxor, a Khamzin wind at Philoe, or a row with his guides in the great pyramid. Such is Nile travel as most men would give their true experience of it, whether princes or bagmen. And I would not in the least strive to undervalue the charm of the voyage even thus carried out; for I have seen—laugh if you will—a saucy little terrier, wandering through that still forest of painted columns which is called the great Hall of Karnak, struck dumb with awe, and I have watched a frivolous mind change and strengthen day by day, looking up at the swarthy sky of Egypt blazing from the zenith to the yellow mountain-line. Far be it, then, from me to disparage the Nile voyage, but if you undertake it thus, reader, and perform all the usual feats, do not, in the name of all the gods at once, boast of having "done" Egypt on your return.

For those Nile travellers who write books, and tell stories of their experience generally, do but skim the surface of the land's interest. The cream it is they enjoy, I will admit, but there are sights in Egypt more impressive than even temples and colossi, stirring deeper emotions than curiosity or admiration. Your dragoman, remember, will show naught that is not in his list, nor risk one inch of his lazy person out of the common track. He made a bargain on the customary terms, and he will perform his part in the customary manner; no work of supererogation, if you please, for Selim or Achmet, or whatever be his ruffianly name. In dread of such demands, he will carefully keep from your ears the merest whisper that might tempt towards the perilous desert, where lurk Bedouins, and sand-storms, and horrors of thirst. Your red book from Albe-marle Street, too, though all-admirable of course, and a glory to our land, will not encourage you beyond the beaten route. Whether the authorities who compiled that work, fearing for their future peace, — dreading the pallid ghosts of travellers hereafter to perish on the bleak sands, — avoided mention of the less known and more dangerous excursions which may be made; or whether the book was written without personal acquaintance with those spots of which I speak, it is not in my power to say. But most surely those who blindly follow Murray, though they may gather wondrous knowledge from its careful study, will miss very much of interest, and, with fair luck, yet more of adventure.

The Egyptians were unwilling always to reduce their narrow limits of cultivatable land, and therefore preferred to build their temples, to excavate their tombs, and to erect their statues, in the desert. Among savage and desolate places therefore, will the most curious remains be found; he who desires to make discoveries must explore the very spots which his dragoman, and all other persons conscious of moral responsibility, would earnestly advise him to avoid. Do not, however, hastily conclude that I am about to startle a blasé world with some such tale of marvels as that with which Bruce provoked our great-grandfathers to scorn. I chanced to explore several corners of the desert, which are not generally included in the narrow plan of a dragoman. In my diary I find mention of the "portico of Shinoun," which few Nile travellers look upon; of the temples of Dinam and Kortj, whereof the mere names are unknown, I find, to ordinary tourists. And among other such little-worn curiosities of the land which I visited, are the crocodile pits of Maabdeh, my experience of which I propose to set before you.

Some while ago, in the days before Fortune held any hostages of mine, — in the days when I was free to wander over every sea and continent, — in the days that I look back on now with a half feeling of envy, and a half of wonder at myself, — we lay off Maufalooch in a dreary, burning calm, my brother Arthur and myself, alone in a dabeeh with our dragoman and his ruffianly crew. The calm had already lasted three days. Of sucking oranges, of shooting pigeon matches, of smoking hasheesh, — which had no other effect upon us than to make us ill! — we were both tired to death, and, lounging in our tiny cabin, we even longed for the approach of that Khamsin wind which had for days been threatening on the west horizon. "Hassan!" then said my brother to the dragoman, "if you don't find us something to do, we'll break into the Pasha's hareem over yonder, and kiss his best wife."

"He! he! he!" laughed Hassan.

"We'll teach your little son on deck to sing Doctor Watts's hymns!"

"Ho! ho! ho!" he laughed uncomfortably.

"We'll overhaul your accounts, by Jove!"

"Ha! ha!" muttered the dragoman thoughtfully; then, after a pause of anxious consideration, "Sir," he said, "the caves of Maabdeh are only a few miles away from this in the desert. You might ride as far as the mouth of them."

Maabdeh seemed, somehow, a familiar word to me, but long I puzzled in vain over its sound. At length, memory responded to my call. When a very little boy in the schoolroom, it was the pleasure, or the duty, — anyhow, it was the custom, — of the dearest of governesses to read aloud works of travel in the hour between tea and bedtime. In a book, which I am afraid, is now held to be old-fashioned, but which was a wondrous favorite with us children, — a book wherein the most exciting narrative is judiciously delayed from time to time, that Harry's frivolous comments may be fittingly rebuked, and Julia's strict orthodoxy properly manifested, — in one of those well-meaning works which utterly perplex an intelligent child, and leave him in Cimmerian dooks as to the operations of Providence, while seeking honestly to explain its mysteries, — in this book, I say, was recounted the disastrous experiences of a certain Mr. Leigh, M. P., and two friends, in these very pits of Maabdeh fifty years ago. The work was called "Evenings at Home," or "Winter Evenings," — I am not very sure of the title now. But I remember very well that we children never felt more utterly abroad than when listening to the recital of this adventure in the crocodile pits of Maabdeh. There a conversation between Julia, Harry, and their mamma, — or some such persons, — at the end thereof, the boldness and reach of which struck my childish sense with nothing less than awe.

"Suppose," says Harry, "something had been done, at a critical moment, which was not even thought of."

"Then," declares mamma, emphatically, "something would have happened which was not in the least to the point."

"Yes," Julia supports, "and they ought" — to have acted in accordance with young lady-like philosophy, in short.

"And in that case," mamma calmly puts in, "Providence, my dears!"

This boldness of forecasting, this reduction of all things and chances to a preconceived formula, did utterly bewilder me at six years old, as the dogmas of modern science disturb my mental rest at present. But it was a dear old book for all that, this "Winter Evenings"; the stories were well and simply told, and the moral lessons, necessary, I suppose, though perhaps somewhat illogical, and somewhat ridiculous in themselves, were not put forward oppressively. As I have said, the study of it familiarized me in early life with the name of Maabdeh, and the tragic legend which hung about the spot; and therefore, when the dragoman incautiously let slip that these caverns lay within a ride of our anchorage, I determined at once to explore them, Mr. Leigh's terrible experience notwithstanding.

To enter the caverns, however, was by no means in Hassan's mind, when he proposed a ride in their direction, and our good dragoman, after the fashion of his class, did all that lay within him to dissuade us. But I must do a reasonably honest man the justice to admit, that when he found us resolute, not to be swayed by fears or expostulations, he did his duty well. The first point, of course, was to procure guides, for Hassan himself had not made the journey. This object was accomplished with some difficulty, and two boys from Amabdi were bribed to meet us at dawn with their donkeys.

The moon had already set, and the dim Egyptian twilight wrapped the scene, as, at the appointed hour, we pulled noiselessly across the river, and landed on the sand. The air felt dense, and even at that time sultry; for the Khamsin was at hand even now dimming the horizon. In front of us loomed the hills of granite, ground smooth by whirling sand and furious wind; behind, the swift Nile gurgling in its narrowing bed. Our guides were late, and we were compelled to wait their pleasure. Slowly the sky grew darker, as the reflected moonlight died from the horizon; the glimmering mountains vanished; even the white sand at our feet grew indistinct. Then the wild geese began their morning clamor, trumpeting as they sallied from their holes. A snowy ibis rustled past us, ghostly in the darkness. The "zic-zac" roused his mate with grating cry, and a desert fox, or jackal, slipped noiselessly through our midst, on his homeward way from water. It was just at sunrise the boys appeared, and glad indeed we were to see them; for, to stimulate our natural impatience, a species of the sand thistle had penetrated our shoes and trousers, so that we could scarcely move without dire laceration.

The route, when at length we got in motion, lay through vast fields of corn, such as usually border the Nile in Lower Egypt. It was in the month of April, very late for such travel, and the earth was already green. Breaking the level here and there, stood a tall patch of hemp or sugar-cane, the latter small and stunted in comparison with those great stems which are a boast of the farther East, but bright in color, and graceful in the droop of their grass-like leaves. Then, as the sun leapt up above the mountains with that eager triumph characteristic of his rising in this land, we skirted the mud huts of a village, passing unnoticed through their glimmering plantations of date-palm. And then we emerged again into the broad cornfields, warm in the white light of morning. Hoopoes fluttered from bush to bush as we approached, and lighting, waggishly shook their tawny crests at us. Glittering swallows, green as emeralds, the tayr allahs—holy birds of Arab superstition, circled swiftly over our heads. Pigeons—in such flocks they seemed like clouds descending—passed us by on their way to water, making a rustle in mid-air as of forest leaves in a summer wind. Gradually the mountains regained their dusty, yellow tone; the shadows purpled, the strange sharp outlines of the rocks stood out line by line in marvellous distinctness. Without encountering any man, we trotted across the fertile land, until, after two hours' journeying, the foot of those granite cliffs was reached.

After following their edge for a few hundred yards, the guides led us into a broad, sandy gorge, which seemed—so smooth and clean it was—to have been a carriage-road for the ancient kings. No words can give the untravelled reader an idea of this valley of desolation. Not a tree, not a blade of grass nor mossy tuft, concealed the yellow, wind-worn stone. No stain appeared upon it, no little heap of rotting leaves filled any corner. Every crack and cranny was swept clean. The blue shadows fell keen and cutting upon the sand, as though shaped of material hard as the rock forecast. Overhead, the hanging crags burnt and glittered and dazzled against the sky, reflecting the angry sun-rays back and forth across the valley. A sickly yellow glare beat up through our closed eyelids, shot with flashes of brilliant color; our mouths smarted and bled with heat and burning of the sand, which rose in clouds from beneath our feet.

Deeper and deeper we penetrated the blinding hills, now traversing a table-land radiant with heat as a furnace scarce extinguished, now clambering up a gorge, from the top of which the green Nile valley could be seen, and the opposite horizon of mountains. Not a sound had we heard for hours, except the shuffling step of our donkeys, and an occasional mutter from the Arab boys, who tramped with muffled heads beside us. So brilliant was the light, so complete the stillness, so monotonous the tints around, that our procession seemed shadowy and ghost-like as it moved. This effect is always to be observed in Egypt, more or less, but I was never so struck and impressed by it as on this occasion. There was no rounding of objects, owing to the keen abruptness of the shadows. A living man seemed to be but a painted image of himself, the thickness of a sheet of paper.

At length we reached the top of a ridge, where the sand was thickly mingled with a glittering dust, which made it sparkle quite prismatically. In a few moments more emerged into a basin surrounded by sharp rocks. In the centre thereof appeared an oblong hole. Our destination was reached.

Dismounting and tying up our donkeys, we examined the entrance, which was a mere horizontal cutting in the rock, like the mouth of a well. It was about ten or twelve feet deep, and from above we could discern a low, black opening, which led to the interior caverns. One of the Arabs expressed his willingness to enter; the other prudently desired to remain above. Thus, then, we arranged the party: an Arab first, then Arthur, then Hassan, and lastly myself. Without accident we let ourselves drop down the hole, and at the bottom made a toilet suitable for subterranean travel. Then, one by one, we slipped under a massive block of stone, which seems each moment about to fall and shut out inquisitive travellers forever,—perhaps also to shut a few of them in.

"And now," said Arthur, sitting leisurely down in the twilight passage, "what are we going to find here? Is it a treasure hidden by the late Captain Kidd, or is it coal, or is it—is it 'ile'?"

"Yes, sir," said Hassan, grinning, "it's a sort of 'ile,' sir."

"What? Why, I smell it already! Petroleum 'ile' it is! Of the finest description!"

"No, sir, not petroleum 'ile,'—crocod-ile!" And the dragoman leaned against the rock to laugh.

We then lighted wax candles, brought for the purpose, and, stooping down, advanced some eight or ten feet into the cavern, at which distance from the mouth a sudden lowering of the roof thrust us down on hands and knees. Still the height of the passage diminished, and, at about forty yards from the entrance, we were compelled to lie down full length, and pull ourselves along by hands and elbows. Just at the moment when I began to feel somewhat alarmed, the roof heightened, and we emerged into a chamber hung with fine stalactites. Its ceiling was lofty, but its breadth scarcely more than thirty feet; the flooring consisted of fine sand.

Entering a passage on the further side, we progressed for some yards in a comfortable attitude. Then again we were forced to our knees, and, some time afterwards, to the snake-like manner of march. Every yard the heat grew more stifling, and that sickly smell of bats, which every Nile traveller must recall so well, mingled in foul union with the odor of confined air, and the bituminous exhalations of the mummies within. How far this passage may have extended, or how long we were thus confined in a hole not two feet square, I cannot guess; quite long enough to make every one of us repent of his temerity. This part of the cavern may have been three hundred yards long, or only a hundred, I cannot say; certainly not more than the larger estimate, nor less than the smaller. The fact is, that a bachelor of intelligence and virtue is not so frequently in the habit of "playing at serpents" that he can calculate his probable speed in an enforced imitation of the reptile's movements. The atmosphere, as we penetrated deeper, became something horrible beyond description. I have had experience of heat in both tropics, and both hemispheres; I have sweltered in the desert, and cruised the Red Sea in the month of May, but never did I suffer such fearful oppression as in those foul caverns.

At length we again emerged from the narrow passage, and though still unable to stand upright, could at least stretch arms and legs, cramped by an hour, by a day, by ten minutes, of such travel. The chamber in which we found ourselves was a long, low cavern, blocked almost to its roof with vast masses of stone. Climbing cautiously from rock to rock, — for the interstices seemed bottomless, or at least were black enough to justify that fear, — we were encountered by a real cloud of bats, which darted straight at us, beat our faces with their wings, and clawed themselves tight into our hair and whiskers. Never, I conceive, were men frightened more utterly than we, when this rustling tornado enveloped us; Arthur dashed his arms about like a polypus in a squall, and no doubt effected great execution among the foe.

Hassan sat steadfastly down upon a stone and shouted, — shouted to all his gods for aid. I pulled my hair out by the roots, heedless of sharp little teeth which vigorously 'opposed the sacrifice. But our foes vanished as suddenly as they had appeared; like a leathery whirlwind they hurtled through the caverns, startling our Arab at the entrance to such a degree, that he recalled a prayer; — which was a great feat and a glorious for the Fellah bats upon the Nile.

After this interruption we resumed our progress, and clambered over the rocks. On the opposite side was a doorway, squared by human hands. It was raised some feet above the level of the chamber, and, as we judged from certain holes in the lintel, had once been fitted with a door. This was the first signs of handiwork we had found.

After passing through this opening the peculiar mummy smell became much stronger, and the heat, if possible, increased. We advanced a few yards in a crouching posture, then betook ourselves to hands and knees, and finally to the snake-like motion again. Our nerves were by this time so excited, that the distance seemed endless. If bats could exist in that atmosphere, and at so great a distance from the outer air, why not other creatures? — why not snakes? In no part of the subterranean passage could one of us have got before the other; and supposing I, the last, had been suddenly seized with sickness, and unable to move, the others in front must have — must have — why, in sooth I dare not guess at this distance of time what would have become of them! And these thoughts were in the mind of each of us; more especially, I think, in mine, because the others' fate thus depended on me. I do not mean to say that there is extraordinary danger in exploring these pits, but most certainly there is most fearful risk, if the distinction be understood. There was no probability of meeting a snake, but, had one appeared, the foremost man of us at least was doomed, must have fallen a victim without the chance of a struggle, must have been utterly helpless and unresisting. Similarly, it was not probable that I, being strong and reasonably healthy, should be taken with a fit; but if such an event had happened, the others might have perished one by one, unable alike to remove my body or to pass over it.

After a while, however, we found ourselves able to get upon hands and knees, and, in a few moments more, I made a discovery. Feeling something clammy and soft beneath my hand, I sprang backwards, with such haste as nearly to smash my skull against the roof, and thrust the candle forward to reconnoitre. Then I saw that the floor over which we crept was of kneaded human limbs, and the substance upon which my hand had rested was the long auburn hair of a woman. By my knee lay the tiny leg of a child, torn off at the thigh. Heads and limbs — some still partly wrapped in the cerecloth — literally composed that awful pavement, mingled with strips of mummy cloth, fragments of sarcophagi, tangles, whole scalps of woman's hair. Here, the gilded face of some priest or noble shone out from the dusky mass under the light of our candles; there, propped against the wall, stood the naked body of a woman, with the chest hideously smashed in. Such a fearful scene of sacrilege and violence was it, that even Hassan, little used to reverence dead infidels, indignantly disclaimed, in the name of his countrymen, any share in its perpetration. "It's English travellers, sir, who did it!" he said. And I believe he spoke the truth. Yet can it be true? I am telling no fictitious story, nor exercising my fancy in the description of a scene revolting to the heart. Some one, Mussulman or Christian, has treated these poor heathen corpses at Maâbdeh in a manner shameful, not to his creed alone and to his nation, but to manhood's self. The very savages of Labuan, it is said, spare the children's bodies when they seek materials for their ghastly and mysterious orgies; but neither age, nor womanhood, nor the holiness of infancy, have those ghouls revered who held their sabbath at Maâbdeh. I am no fanatic, for sentiment and rough living have destroyed in me much of that superstition which enwraps the dead. Had there been a purpose to be served in thus hideously dismembering these poor bodies, I would not needlessly have raised the voice of indignation; but there is none, and never can have been! Good faith, are we still so cruelly orthodox in England, that the bodies of men, holier it may be than ourselves, shall not be respected because their souls are dogmatized to hell? I ask who did this thing? Surely the man who had the hideous courage to hack off women's limbs, to toss them to and fro, to tear out their hair, and beat in their breasts, cannot lack that far inferior boldness which would own the act when challenged. Let him step forth and explain his reasons. It was not a task, a penance, which one would wantonly perform; a sense of duty could alone strengthen the bravest to go through with it. Doubtless the gentleman had a motive, and a high one. Let us hear, and, if possible, respect it, though it may fail to convince us; or, if this plea be not made out, in Heaven's name, for the credit of our country, its manhood, and that creed of which it makes profession, let us declare, aloud and boldly, that a madman, ay, a lycanthropist, escaped from custody, and wrought this deed in the wildest fury of dementia. Let us declare that, and take oath upon it if necessary, rather than admit that one of us was capable of so dastardly, so damnable a sacrilege on the dead!

From this scene of horrors, we proceeded without further interruption to the tombs of the sacred crocodiles. It was a curious sight enough, when at length we reached the end. The animals lie upon the cavern-floor, head to tail, tail to head, as closely as they could be packed, one above another, with palm leaves strewn between each layer. How far the range of tombs extends into the mountain none can say; two chambers only are now open for examination. It did not appear to me that the caverns were in any sense human handiwork; but it seems most probable that the traveller now enters by the back way. It is obviously impossible that the crocodiles could have been brought to their burial-place by the way we came, because they are, many of them, so gigantic, that no exertion can force back their shoulders through the passage that we discovered. It seems likely, then, that another entrance exists, or once existed, of more convenient character, and that the approach which is now the only one known was either unformed or unused at the date when the sacred animals were gradually stored here. The manner of their arrangement is simple enough. Row was piled on row, until the whole grotto was full from floor to roof, after which the sextons retired to the next chamber, and stored that also with dead deities in a similar manner.

Thus we were not able to make even a guess at the length or extent of the sepulchre, nor can any one ever do so until the caverns are cleared. One of the most noticeable facts connected with these interments is the abundance of small crocodiles, some but just hatched, many yet in the egg, which, rolled in a strip of mummy cloth, and tied together in bundles of twenty, fill the interstices. They are literally in thousands. From a very rough and imperfect calculation, we estimated that five hundred of these baby-gods were packed around each full-grown reptile; and, in the two chambers to which one may gain access by crawling through the mummies, I should judge there could not be less than half a million of them; perhaps — for the end of the second grotto is not to be seen — there may be ten times that number. As I have already observed, no means whatever exist for obtaining an idea how far these caverns stretch, each filled up, like a barrel of herrings, to the top. What amazing mortality, then, must that have been among the eggs and young which could supply so vast a quantity of mummies! Is it not reasonable to suspect that the old Egyptians, who paid such fearful reverence to their scaly deities when toothed and tailed, clawed and armored, never lost the pious opportunity of prematurely restoring their younger members to Olympus? Here is an Egyptian joke! Pas possible, you say. On the contrary, I know no race more addicted to broad fun than this.

A wonderful discovery, — is it not? — but no new idea to the observant wanderer on the Nile. The world, in its happy days of ignorance, was apt to think the Egyptian character not witty itself, but that it unwillingly lent itself even as a source of wit to others; a view which the fearsome books of its interpreters have fully corroborated. But there are various kinds of national humor. There is the French, the perfect type, which breaks a bone or pats a cheek; the English, which mostly runs on from coarse words into coarser actions; the American, which grasps all creation as its armory, and draws supplies freely from the antediluvian world. These are divers types, and the Egyptian differs again. It was a strong, lasting, venerable sort of wit, and found its fitting vehicle in bricks and stone. You do not suppose, you cannot suppose, my dear sir, that the architect of the Pyramids, and the sculptor of the Sphinx, did not know they were perpetrating a jest that would outlive the ages: a gem of practical humor to survive alike the comic history of Berosus and the double acrostic of Belgravin? Why else did the one select those particular measurements which have overwhelmed Mr. Piozzi Smith? or suddenly change his angle of elevation, and thus dumbfounder a trans-Atlantic namesake of that professor? What means the Sphinx's granite mouth, which, in the still moonlight of the desert, bears down upon the world with such dire and weirdly humorous features? Talk to me of beauty — pooh! There is that throughout the length of Egypt which is more serviceable to man, — there is fun! Study the portraits of Cleopatra and Cesarion upon the fane of Dendera!

I have seen dull souls stand aghast before these effigies, unable to believe their senses, but not daring to conceive the secret. Do you not see? The Egyptian artist thus avenged the outrage to his country's decency; thus, in two delightful sculptures, did he mock the license of the Greek, and the brute force of mighty Cæsar. Are they not supremely droll also, those sculptures in the twilight of Esné's temple? I have laughed to tears in admiration of them. The very gods themselves were not secure from the untamable verve of these funny fellows. The Pantheon of Egypt was the earliest of pantomimes, and the most original. Whence do you think that second-rate man drew his ideas who first designed the burlesque masks of Drury Lane? Surely from Esné; and how far he falls beneath the model! It was a notion brilliant enough to set a bird's head, an elephant's, or a crocodile's, upon the shoulders of a man; but the genius of Egypt was not content with such low comedy. Observe the postures of his gods! remark the action of their hands! examine at your ease the objects which they hold so gingerly, and consider for an instant the domestic furniture on which they sit! Have we not joking of the highest class in every fragment of Egyptian sculpture? There are the hieroglyphs also, so funny that even Herodotus could see their humor; the papyri, Joe Millers in manuscript. Consider this new interpretation of Egyptian mysteries at your leisure, and you will find much comfort for the soul therein. And when you think you have got the theory complete, set it down in octavo, and dedicate it to the late Mr. Simonides. After which, send your work to the Athenæum for review, publicly forgive your enemies, and make your will.

To return to the crocodiles. After examining all of the cavern yet accessible, and securing a few specimens of its contents, we hastened from the spot, for a more ghastly spectacle was never seen than these grottoes, thus lit up by our candles. The mingling of human limbs with reptile mummies seemed very horrible. There was in one corner a foot and a leg, black and cramped as with the death pang, which protruded from the mass, erect, weirdly. It fascinated me, — I approached and grasped the limb, wishing to cover it decently, — I pulled, and all that dim and kneaded heap of members seemed to seethe and work as though rising to direful life again. I abandoned the attempt with something of a thrill, and shortly after we retired, dragging our trophies by ropes and waistbelts. Through the narrow and noisome passages we crept again wearily, our nerves, or mine at least, not a little unstrung by the heat, the foul air, and the mystery of the caverns. We rested for a few moments in the second chamber, and then made our way to the free outer air.

I will not pause to tell how bright the daylight seemed, or how welcome was even that burning atmosphere, cool when compared with the subterranean furnace. Neither will I venture to describe how the sky gradually changed its tone to a dull yellow, while the horizon assumed a tinge of fiery purple, as we proceeded homewards; nor drain my force of superlatives in telling of that storm of sand and living fire, which the Arabs call a Khamsin; the which overtook us in the mountains, and pursued us all the way to Cairo. Nor do I care to dwell upon a very commonplace quarrel with the Sheikh of Maabdeh, who for some inscrutable reason, insisted upon hanging our donkey boys right away; but I have often chuckled since remembering how he winced when I put a revolver to his forehead. These things were not in my design when I commenced this paper.

I simply desired to show that there are interesting sights upon the Nile which visitors do not generally see. Perhaps, if my friends seem to care about this short narrative of one among my unusual explorations, I may at a future time overhaul my Nile Journal again. One remark it is fitting I should make, in case any traveller should be tempted to follow in my steps. There is very little danger, if reasonable caution be used, in visiting the crocodile caves of Maabdeh. Never mind what your dragoman says; the main peril lies with the party itself. Put your weakest man in front, and the stoutest behind; one might draw a body out by the heels, but it would be impossible to push a child along those passages. Also, beware of your lights! One spark falling on that mass of dry tinder, might kindle such a blaze as would overwhelm your party in a second. Here is the most serious peril: beware of it.

One word as to the pits themselves. No historian, so far as I am aware, makes any allusion to them; their date is entirely unknown. It may be that the sacred crocodiles, from earliest times, were buried here, for the entire mountain is, perhaps, hollow. That the caves now open are of nature's mining, I am convinced, but that fact does not prove that great works may not be found beyond. As I have said, one enters now by a back way, through the length of which there is no trace of human handiwork, excepting in a doorway close upon the mummies' resting-place. It is possible that antiquities of the highest interest might be found, were the true entrance discovered, but if that event should ever take place, it will, I suppose, as in other cases, be due to accident. Of those human mummies now mingled with the reptiles, one must conclude them to be those of attendants on the sacred crocodiles. They seem to have been second-class people, or if their mouldering fingers and black arms were adorned with burial ornaments, sacrilegious hands have long since stripped them. But, whether noble or slave, no person could be so logically aristocratic nowadays, as to plead the condition of these poor Egyptians when alive, in excuse for the barbarous treatment to which their corpses have been subjected after death.

COMFORTERS OF THE MODERN JOB.

WE are always taught to believe that adversity, taken, as the doctors say, in moderation, is on the whole a useful stimulant, and valuable if merely as a change; and it is difficult for any who have observed the evils of a long-continued course of prosperity, of whatever kind, to doubt the truth of the dogma; of course, we limit its application, as we do that of most doctrines of the kind, to our neighbors; but as Mr. Brown thinks of Mr. Jones that a slight check in his career would "do him all the good in the world," while the latter says it would "do Mr. Brown no harm," their common friend, without ill-feeling towards either, may fairly pray for a small draught of this moral quinine for both.

But he must not stop here; if he wish thoroughly to discharge his duty to his fellow-creature, he must complete the remedy for which he has prayed; he must call upon Messrs. Brown and Jones, and condole with them on the chastisement with which Providence has seen fit to afflict them; for not until he and such as he have done this will the beneficial cup of misery be filled to the brim.

There are several ways in which this charitable deed may be performed; but, with that instinct which seems to guide any duty which becomes a pleasure, Eliphaz will be pretty sure to choose the tone best fitted to heighten the effect which he views with such unselfish delight.

First, there is the severe "serve you right" tone; but this must be carefully used, as none but inferiors or very meek people accept it so gratefully as might be expected. Indeed, though exceedingly useful in its way, it is a dangerous manner to adopt, and requires great caution; an ill-advised selection of the subject to be operated upon has been known to result in a decided snub, or even — such is the ingratitude of mankind — in an enforced and rapid exit from the afflicted house. Provided, however, that it is safe to make use of this application at all, little skill is needed; it consists simply of a diluted version of the words "brought on her ^{his} self."

Far more subtle than this method of consolation is that of the friend who "had always been afraid of it from the little he saw." This, you see, in the very act of implying superior wisdom, forms an exceedingly good corrective to your own blind want of foresight and care. You were a fond mother perhaps, trying to reclaim by kindness a vagabond son, and had fancied that the blow which you had succeeded so long in warding off would be at least as unexpected to others as it was to you. But no; Eliphaz saw it long ago; possibly he "always told you so." You do not remember his doing anything of the kind; in fact, he always seemed to you to agree that the prodigal was going on much better. Suggest this, and you only add another drop to the tonic; how could he risk the loss of a dear friend by hinting at what he guessed? So that you, by your own selfish pride, only assisted the mischief, after all.

Then comes the friend who tells you that it "might have been worse," as if this self-evident fact ever diminished the first agonies of a great grief by a single pang. This is the man who steps up to you when a hansom has just knocked you down and broken your leg, and bids you be "thankful you weren't killed." He is great at misfortunes which cannot in any sense be said to be your own fault; because the arrow might have wounded you somewhere else, he almost thinks you ought to be thankful to the archer for hitting you at all. This is a most invaluable dose of consolation, for it will annoy your average mortal as much as anything, to hear that the woe which he has been bewailing so deeply is considered quite a commonplace one, after all, and that the morbid satisfaction which he had hitherto derived from pitying himself was founded merely upon his own inability to appreciate degrees of suffering. It has also another advantage; it will almost invariably appear to be just, though disagreeable, since nearly all troubles seem worse than they are until we actually begin our fight with them. So that, although we may be obstinately unphilosophic enough to refuse any satisfaction in the matter, regarded from any point of view whatsoever, we cannot deny the apparent truth of our friend's unpleasant observations. We are seldom calm enough to point out that, if we once enter the wide field of possibilities, we might have escaped altogether. Granted, that all our money might have been lost by the breaking of that bank instead of half, still, if we had chanced to invest it elsewhere, all might have been safe.

Unless we can contrive to put a stop to this objectionable mode of treatment at the outset, the versatility of our tormentor will be practically unlimited. Be our misfortune what it may, he will always be ready, under pretence of affording us comfort by the contrast, to show us some unhappy fellow-mortal whom he fancies worse off than ourselves, — in all probability, merely from ignorance of the whole circumstances of each case. The strange anomaly in the line adopted by this comforter is, that although, in common with the rest of his brethren, professedly guided by religious principles, he yet begs us to take heart by observing the afflictions of others, — the true spirit of the pagan philosopher. Here again, however, the flaw probably escapes in the indignation of the moment, and as we must take physic, we gulp it down silently with the rest.

But most refined of all is the operator who bids you "look upon the bright side." It seems such a fine idea to persist in shutting your eyes to the black cloud that is breaking over the heads of you and all you love best in the world, and in squinting round the corner for its imaginary silver lining, that one feels a sort of foolish respect for the audacity of one's optimist friend. He is the man with the very new hat and pleasant smile, who pays you a visit in Whitecross Street to tell you "it will all blow over soon, old boy; you must get you a clerkship somewhere" [you used to fill up half a dozen every year yourself]; "and I see your wife's off home to the country already, so she'll be all right." In midor calamities, he it is who dilates, after that bank smash, on the pittance you have left; or, after the street accident, on the goodness of your prospective wooden leg.

If by any tone the well-meaning friend can insure the full chastening effects of adversity, this is certainly the one to adopt. None of its details seem to escape him; and by inquiry or suggestion, he reproduces to the minutest touches the whole picture that we would so willingly forget. He gauges with the accuracy of an expert the difference between "now" and "then," and all under the plausible pretext of looking at the "bright side." By all these means, employed according to his estimate of your calamity, can this comforter of the modern Job insure the trial of patience which is so valuable a use of adversity; but if he be a married man, he has a yet stronger one at his command. Let him stay at home, and delegate to his wife the mission for whose fulfilment he feels himself responsible. To every dart with which he could supply her she can add a sting.

She needs not to guide her conversation by any artfully selected tone, nor bind herself to any fixed plan of action. So much greater is the tact of a woman, that while a man, by an unintended word of kindness, will often undo the good of all the manner which he has so studiously affected, a woman will be unconsciously perfect in her part, and will attain, by her intuitive attention to the smallest details, the full effect at which she aims.

Observe the perfect way in which she comes into the room for that first call upon your poor dear wife after your unfortunate descent in the world. Her obtrusive want of observation seems to say: "I won't pain the Blanks by appearing to notice the shabbiness of this miserable little hole; in fact, it might be kinder to praise any of the most glaring contrasts to their former condition." So she goes to the window, and remarks on the prettiness of the unhappy yard, which replaces your beautiful flower-garden, and thinks "it must be so nice to have it all under your own eye." Then, too, what a relief to have only one servant; really they are such nuisances that she often wishes she had no more herself. She inquires with the greatest concern whether you don't find how extravagantly your housekeeper must have carried on your ménage, and says how fortunate it is that your dear Isabella has such domestic tastes. And so she can run on for half an hour, taking the most amicable and lively interest in your affairs and plans, and jarring at every turn on the most tender of your recollections and regrets. If she would only talk and behave as she would have done in days gone by; if she would but forget for a moment that she need ask about details, however kindly, that she never thought of before; if she would not now and then stop short in the middle of a sentence, as if fearing to hurt your feelings by going on; if her sympathy were only less obtrusive in its delicacy! Her assumption of concealed pity irritates you far more than the selfish incivility of the dandy friend who cuts you in the street, just as whispers and footsteps on tiptoe are more annoying to the invalid than louder but more natural sounds. And when she has come and gone, you may give a sigh of relief, for you have swallowed the last drop in the cup of your bitterness, and your Nemesis is at length tired of avenging your former happiness. Most of our miseries would be tolerable, were it not for the comfort administered to us by our friends.

THE MUTINY AT VELLORE.

It seems to be now generally admitted, although for a time strenuously denied, that the greased cartridges had much to do with the great Indian revolt of the Sepoys, in 1857, which led to so much massacre and seriously endangered our Eastern empire. An order, relative to shaving, equally interfering with native notions of caste, and quite as ill-judged, produced an earlier mutiny, on a more confined scale, at Vellore, which exploded, most unexpectedly, on the night of the 9th of July, 1806, and was specially signalized by the murder, amongst many others, of an officer of rank and merit who commanded in the fortress, Colonel Fancourt. Nothing foreshadowed the movement, which burst like a thunder-clap from a summer cloud.

This was long considered a very memorable episode in our Indian annals, until it dwindled into insignificance when compared with the comprehensive and sweeping attempt, so recently and arduously suppressed.

In Gleig's "History of British India" we find this paragraph: "There occurred under Sir George Barlow's administration, a mutiny amongst the native troops in the Carnatic, of which, though sufficiently alarming at the moment, it were out of place to give here any detailed account. Enough is done when we state that an injudicious order respecting some points of dress appearing at a moment when missionary exertions chanced to be unusually great, the sons of Tippoo and their adherents took advantage of the circumstance to excite, to a furious degree, the religious prejudices of the Sepoys. They rose in rebellion at Vellore, put to death many European officers and a considerable portion of the 69th Regiment, and were not quieted at last till Colonel Gillespie, at the head of a body of dragoons, had sabred a large number of them. For a time serious apprehensions were entertained lest the disposition should prove general; but this, on inquiry, was found not to be the case. The obnoxious orders were repealed, and the troops returned everywhere to their allegiance."

The following narrative of the earlier revolt, in 1806, contains particulars never made public, and was written at the time by Mrs. Fancourt, widow of the Colonel who was massacred in the outbreak. The MS., in her own handwriting, was given by her to a near and dear relative and friend of the present writer as an authentic document, without any restrictions as to its future use. Many readers may take an interest in the recital, which would lose its value if altered in the slightest degree. We therefore give it as originally written.

ACCOUNT OF THE MUTINY AT VELLORE ON THE NIGHT OF THE 9TH OF JULY, 1806.

"Colonel Fancourt and I retired to rest on Wednesday evening a little after nine o'clock. About two, on Thursday morning we were both awakened at the same instant by a loud firing. We both got out of bed, and Colonel Fancourt went to the window, which was open, and called aloud and repeatedly to know the cause of the disturbance. He received no reply, except by the rapid continuance of the firing from a vast number of Sepoys assembled at the main-guard. Colonel Fancourt then went down stairs, and in a few minutes returned to his writing-room, and requested me to bring him a light. I instantly did so, and placed it on the table. He then sat down to write, and I shut the window from which he had spoken to the Sepoys, fearing some shots might be directed at him as he sat, for they were then firing in all directions from the main-guard. I looked at my husband and saw him turn as pale as ashes. I said "Good God! what can be the matter, my dear St. John?" To which he replied, "Go into your own room, Amelia." I did so, for I saw his mind was so agitated I did not think it right to repeat my question at that moment.

I heard him, two minutes after, quit the writing-room and go out of the house.

"Between two and three o'clock I believe the firing at the main-guard ceased and the drums beat, which I afterwards heard was owing to my husband's exertions to quiet the Sepoys. There was no more firing for some time. After my husband left the house I think he returned again, though, as I imagine, but for a moment. I certainly heard the door of the writing-room tried, very soon after the firing at the main-guard ceased; but having, after he left me, bolted the door, if it was he, he could not enter, and went away again without saying anything. When I heard the door attempted, I called out, "St. John, is it you?" to which I received no answer, and whoever it was he quitted the house immediately.

"I then bolted all the doors in my own room, and brought my children into it. I fell on my knees and fervently prayed that Colonel Fancourt's endeavors to restore peace in the garrison might be crowned with success and his life spared through the mercy of God. I dressed, and twice cautiously opened the hall-door and felt my way to the lower end to look where there was most firing. I perceived it was chiefly directed at the European barracks.

"The last time I ventured from my room, between the hours of four and five, as I stood at the lower end of the hall, which was quite open to the veranda, a figure approached me. It was so dark I could only see the red coat by the light of the firing at the barracks. I was dreadfully frightened, expecting to be murdered; and having left the children in the bedroom, I dreaded that their last hour was come also. I had, however, courage to ask, 'Who is there?' The answer I received was, 'Madam, I am an officer.' I then said, 'But who are you?' The gentleman answered, 'I am an officer of the main-guard.' I inquired what was the matter. He said it was a mutiny; that every European on the guard had been murdered except himself, and that we should be murdered also. I made no reply, but walked away to the room where my babes and female servants were. The officer went out at the opposite door of the hall where we had spoken together, and never got down stairs alive, for he was butchered most cruelly in Colonel Fancourt's dressing-room. I have since heard that his name was Lieut. O'Reilly, 1st Battalion 1st Regiment of Native Infantry.

"When I had this conversation with the above-mentioned officer, I began to think it unsafe to quit my own room again. As soon as daylight appeared, I went into Colonel Fancourt's writing-room and looked through the Venetian blinds on the parade. I saw some soldiers of the 69th Regiment lying dead. Four Sepoys were at that moment on the watch at the door of Colonel Marriott's quarters and several issuing from the gates of the palace. The latter were not firing, — indeed, I think they were unarmed, — and were making a great noise. At this time there was firing on the ramparts, and apparently in all parts of the fort; at least, I heard firing in many different places, though at the main-guard and the barracks all seemed quiet. The Sepoys were then employed in ransacking the houses, intent on murder or plunder.

"At this moment I gave up all for lost. I opened my dressing-table drawer, and took out my husband's miniature, which I tied on, and hid under my habit shirt, determined not to lose that but in death. I had secured his watch some time before, to ascertain the hour. I had hardly secreted this much valued remembrance, before I heard a loud noise in the hall adjoining my bedroom. I moved softly, and looking through the door discovered two Sepoys knocking a chest of drawers to pieces. I was struck with horror, concluding their next visit would be to my apartment.

"My children and their female servants were at this time lying on the mat, just before the door, which opened into the back veranda, and which at the time of the commencement of the mutiny seemed the safest place, as shots being fired at the windows, we were obliged to move as far as possible from them. I whispered my ayah that the Sepoys were in the hall, and told her to move from the door. She took my children under the bed, and begged me to go there also. I had not time for reply, for the door we had just left, was at that instant burst open. I got under the bed, and was no sooner there than several shots were fired into the room; but although the door was opened, no one entered. I took up a bullet which fell close to me under the bed.

"The children were screaming with terror at the firing, and I expected that our last moment had come; but willing to make one effort to save my babes, I crept from my hiding-place into a small adjoining room, off the back of the staircase. I opened the window, from which I saw two horsekeepers. I returned instantly to my bedroom, and desired the ayah to take my little babe in her arms. I took Charles St. John in my own, and opening the door of the back staircase, ran down as quickly as I could. When we got to the bottom, we found several Sepoys on guard at the back of the house. I showed them my babes, and told my ayah to inform them they might take all we had if they would spare our lives.

One of them desired us to sit down in the stable with the horses. Another looked very surly, but did not prevent our going there. Whilst we stayed in the stable, I told the ayah I had my husband's watch, and requested she would hide it for me. She dug up some earth with her fingers, threw it over the watch, and put some chatties on it. We had not been seated many minutes before we were ordered away by a kind Sepoy. He told me to go into the fowl-house, which had only a bamboo front, and we were, in consequence, exposed to view, until the same Sepoy brought us a mat, which we made use of by placing it before the door to hide ourselves; and afterwards the same man gave my little boy half a loaf of bread to appease his hunger.

"There, I suppose, we sat about three hours, in the greatest agony of mind, endeavoring to quiet my dear little Charles, whom I found it very difficult to pacify, so terrified was he by the constant firing, and cried sadly to get out, and go to his papa. Several times, from my concealment, I saw the Sepoys taking out immense loads of our goods on their backs, tied up in table-cloths and sheets. They all went by the way of the ramparts, which made me fear that they still had possession of the works. I know not how I supported myself through all the horrors of that night and morning. What I dreaded most was to hear of my husband's murder, and I really believe I should have braved death, and searched for him on the parade, had not the situation of my babes withheld me from the rash attempt. My dread of having them murdered during my absence, or of leaving them wretched orphans, made me remain in the place of refuge.

"I hoped for the arrival of the 19th Dragoons from Arcot. The few lines Colonel Fancourt wrote in his room I thought most probably were intended to be sent express to Colonel Gillespie, who was, on that morning coming to spend a few days with us. But whether Colonel Fancourt had the means of sending his despatch or not, I was quite ignorant. Still, however, I thought the news might reach Colonel Gillespie on the road, by some chance or other, and hearing a tremendous firing at the gate strengthened my hopes that the regiment had arrived.

"Our house appeared, at this time, quite deserted by the Sepoys; but suddenly several of them rushed into the compound, and called out, as the ayah said, for me, determined to find and murder me. She requested me to go into the farthest corner of the fowl-house, which I did, taking my Charles with me, and covering him with my gown. I had much difficulty in keeping him quiet. He screamed at every instant. I expected we should all be massacred; but the firing at the gate became now so strong that the Sepoys were obliged to fly to it, and once more vacated the house, by which unexpected incident we escaped impending death. I was so thirsty as several times to drink dirty water out of a dirty chatty, and give the same to my dear Charles also.

"At last I heard distinctly the horses of the 19th Dragoons upon the drawbridge, and huzzas loudly repeated. Then I hoped everything, and a moment after they entered the fort. An officer rode in and called for me by name, but I could neither answer nor move. Again, I heard my name repeated, and saw an officer in a red jacket who I thought looked like my husband. I made an effort and sprang forward to meet him. It was Mr. Maclean. I called for my husband. He told me he was alive. Colonel Gillespie and Mrs. Maclean then joined us, and both gave me the same assurance. They took me up stairs and forced me to drink some wine and water. When the agitation of my mind had a little calmed down, they told me that Colonel Fancourt was wounded, though not dangerously, and that he must be kept quiet. About an hour after I was told by the surgeon of the 19th that my husband was in danger, but that worse wounds had been cured; his were flesh wounds, and the balls had not lodged. Hope still made me think he would recover. I would not even ask to see him, thinking the interview might agitate him too much. Alas! I found too late there were no hopes of him from the first, for he breathed his last about five o'clock on the same afternoon. Thank God, he died without much suffering. That his death was happy I am fully satisfied, for he lived religiously, and met his fate like a brave soldier, in the faithful discharge of his duty."

Here the narrative ends.

When Colonel Gillespie forced his entrance into Vellore, his dragoons put 800 Sepoys to the sword before the mutiny was totally suppressed. This gallant officer obtained great credit for his prompt energy on this occasion, and became one of the most rising men in India. He fell in the Nepaulese war as Major-General Sir Robert Rollo Gillespie, being shot through the heart while leading three companies of English soldiers to the assault of the fortified position of Kalunga, in October, 1814. Of the four companies of the 69th Regiment which formed the weak European garrison of Vellore, 164 were killed, and nearly all the officers.

ON A BICYCLE.

ARISTOCRATIC wielders of the pen have seized hold of an accident or two, and the reckless riding of a few enthusiasts, to make them handles for a wholesale condemnation of the velocipede. This piece of mechanism may certainly be an intrusion, but for all that it seems to have its good qualities; and as to the objections that have been made to its use, — well, upon racking one's brains a little it is possible to recall objections having been made to steam in days gone by. Tramways have been driven off our roads, but they are trying to creep back; perambulators have been crushed endlessly, and they certainly are unpleasant when the fore-wheel is thrust between your legs and you feel about to be transformed into a baby murderer; but perambulators increase in number, fast as do their occupants, and the green four-wheeler that fathers of families used to draw about on Sundays is now a thing of the past. And doubtless, if some opponent of the good old conservative notions of England were to introduce a comfortable street cab, to take the place of the hideous jangling vehicles of the present day, he would be cried down, — perhaps ruined.

For my part, being a very mild, inquisitive individual, I have felt rather disposed to welcome the new means of locomotion, and mentally exclaimed, "How delightful to spin along upon land more independently than the Rob Roy canoe on water! How glorious to be free of tolls (?), ostlers, taxes, and trouble! To ride where one listeth, and then, — "double up your perambulator."

The name was enough to tempt one to invest, so I bought a "bicycle," and anxiously smuggled it into the little coach-house, ready for an opportunity of trying its paces.

Being such a revolutionary method of going over the ground one naturally felt a delicacy about appearing in public until able to perform with grace and effect. Here was a difficulty: privacy was required, but not to be obtained. I had learned skating upon a ditch, riding in a school, dancing in so many private lessons; but velocipeding how was it to be attained? A garden seventy feet by thirty, with narrow gravel paths at right angles, was certainly not adapted; and, besides, inquisitive people could have looked over the walls. One could not do it in a room, — what was to be done?

I had that horrible vehicle in bed with me for nights. There was a complete-reverse of circumstances; it sat upon me, nightmare fashion, instead of me riding it; I dreamed of it, and saw myself ignominiously dragged off to the station-house for bowling my hoops upon the pavement. I saw myself brought to ruin by people thrusting walking-sticks in my spokes. I was laughed at; shouted after; hunted by a mob of boys, who would, catch me, paddle hard as I would; and time after time I sat up in bed in a violent state of perspiration, avowing that I would either burn or sell the thing which threatened to be the bane of my existence.

Weeks passed, and the bicycle had not even been looked at without a shudder, when one bright, frosty night, about eleven, when taking my customary look out before retiring, the thought occurred to me, "Why not try in the dark?"

Why indeed? Five minutes after I was stealing down to the coach-house, and trying to smuggle the thing out, but the doors would creak horribly, and the wheels grated upon the gravel. I knew that another sound would bring people right and left, to their windows anticipating doctors or fire-engines; so, hugging my enemy in my arms, I bore it to the railings lifted it over, tearing my coat in the act, and then followed it into the road.

We are to have gas our way, but at present it is under consideration; and upon this dark, cold night, as I stood beside my vehicle, looking in all directions cautiously as a burglar, suddenly a light was thrown full upon me, and from behind it a gruff voice inquired, —

"What's your little game?"

Game indeed! it was no sport, but a piece of serious earnest; and it was only with difficulty that I induced police-constable John Dorhead to believe that this was not an infernal machine, and that he might turn off his bull's-eye and leave me to my own devices.

The ground was dry and hard, — O, how hard! — and lifting the incubus once more, I made the best of my way beyond the last house. Pausing for breath, I set the thing down, straddled across it, settled myself in my seat, and then, — well, then I went forward, very slowly, walking upon the tips of my toes and taking the thing along with me. I knew I ought to give myself a good start, thrust my feet upon the treadles, and then go along rapidly. I say I knew all this, but that was all. If I lifted one leg from the ground, I inclined that side; if I lifted the other, the inclination was but the reverse; and as to taking both feet up, I freely confess it, I dared not.

However, I got on slowly, with the thing between my legs, telling myself that I was progressing fast; and I chuckled as I congratulated myself upon the fact of my being unobserved. At last, as time was getting on, I grew more daring, and made a rush, performing a wild curve which sent me into the ditch on the left, while the next attempt sent me into the hedge on the right.

"Perseverance conquers in the end," I muttered, as I prepared for another try; and so I went on until, conceiving that I had done pretty well for one night, and that even if I had acquired no skill I had done something towards overcoming my timidity, I turned back and walked, or rather waddled, the instrument till I reached the top of the hill, where I paused to consider.

Should I? Should n't I? There was nothing to do but to sit firmly and to steer carefully and it would go down hill of itself. The maker told me that the faster I went, the safer. If I meant to learn, I must be a little bold. I'd a good mind to let it go, and I walked it down a few yards. Why, even if I did fall, I could not hurt myself much; it was not like being upon a restive horse, and being dragged by the stirrups, and, — was n't it, though! I only lifted my legs for an instant to touch the treadles when the wretch of a thing was off down the incline. Mazeppa's ride was nothing to it; the bicycle cycled, the wind rushed past my ears, and I believe I shouted, "Stop it!" feeling for the moment that I was off at express speed; then there was a crash, a sudden halt, and O, how hard and firm was that new road!

"I thought you'd get up to something afore you'd done," said a gruff voice, and once more I was illuminated at the expense of the ratepayers.

I only groaned as I asked the constable to assist me in with my wheels of misfortune. I did not scruple about making a noise now, all I wanted was to get the thing locked up, and to go and bathe that large lump swelling upon my noble forehead; but I believe the fellow was grinning when I gave him a shilling.

I don't know whether mind or body was the sorer the next morning, but I was very ill at ease, and "said I to myself, here's a lesson for me," while I ran over in my own mind the list of my enemies, being at last fully determined to send my compliments to the gentleman who cut up my last book, and with my compliments the gift of the bicycle.

Humbly and sincerely I trust that he may not break his neck.

FOREIGN NOTES.

ENGLAND is still growling over the cost of the war with Abyssinia.

DURING the month of July Paris keeps its thirteenth favorite theatres closed.

GEORGE SAND's complete works are about to be issued in a ninety-volume edition. Ninety volumes!

M. ROCHEFORT's father has written to the Rapport, to say that his son, who was in receipt of a large income derived from the sale of La Lanterne, had left him in distress.

THE finest work in sculpture in the French Exhibition this year is said to be the Statue "Désespoir" by Perrault: the finest painting that of the "Assommoir" by Bonnat. Both artists have won the médaille d'honneur.

M. FRANZ BEAUVALLET, son of M. Léon Beauvallet, author of "Sur Terre et sur Mer," and grandson of M. Pierre-François Beauvallet, of the Conservatoire, has made a hit with his first dramatic essay, "Le Don Quichotte des Maris," recently produced at the Déjazet, Paris.

THE Chemical Society of London, wishing to do honor to the memory of their distinguished fellow, the late Professor Faraday, has instituted a gold medal, to be awarded from time to time to any foreign chemist who may have distinguished himself in promoting the progress of the science.

MR. THORNYCROFT's colossal statue of Queen Victoria is at last finished. It represents Her Majesty in half-military costume, such as she used to wear when visiting the camp at Chobham with the Prince Consort. It is fourteen feet high, and will be placed in front of St. George's Hall, Liverpool.

TWO hopeful Frenchmen, Messieurs Tissandier and de Fouvillé, are about to undertake the daring enterprise of reaching the north pole in a balloon. The machine in which the bold adventurers are about to embark on their perilous journey, and which is appropriately named "Le Pôle Nord," is now being completed in the Champ de Mars, which the Government have placed at their disposal for the purpose. This monster balloon, beside which even the famous Géant would seem a mere toy, will contain over 10,000 cubic metres of gas, and is composed entirely of a cloth manufactured from caoutchouc, which will allow of great expansion in the rarefied strata of the atmosphere. The seams uniting the different pieces form a total length of three English miles. The car, a marvel, it is said, of strength and lightness, is constructed to carry ten passengers, 4,000 pounds of ballast, and provisions for a month.

A FRENCH journal is responsible for the following: In a certain small provincial town one of the residents, M. A. B., found that his house was rendered both damp and dark by the contiguity of a large tree which was inconveniently near to his windows. He would gladly have had it cut down, but the tree belonged to the commune, and was not to be meddled with. Being a man of resources, he sent for insertion to one of the Paris papers the following paragraph: "There is still in existence one of the trees of liberty of the date of 1793. It may be seen at X., close to the house of M. A. B., and the passers-by reverently uncover their heads to this venerable witness of our grandest struggles and our most illustrious victory." Three days afterwards an order came from the préfecture in Paris for the Mayor of X. to cause the said tree to be cut down, — which was accordingly done forthwith.

THE Athenæum mentions an ingenious plan devised for indicating localities and distances in London. "The Thames, from the most eastern point to Westminster Bridge, and a line thence to Hyde Park Corner and Knightsbridge, are considered as an equator, from which it is proposed to measure distances of a quarter of a mile each towards the north and south, and denote them by increasing numbers, similar distances from west to east being denoted by alphabetical letters. Both numbers and letters are to be put up in every street and on every lamp-post, so that a person may readily ascertain in what direction he is going, and how far he has gone. Thus, by observing that he has passed from A 3 to A 4, he may know that he has gone a quarter of a mile towards the north or south of the equatorial line. Similarly, his advance from A 4 to B 4 would show he had gone a quarter of a mile from west to east. Addresses might thus be given with greater precision and distinctness than at present, and many disputes about cab-fares be obviated."

LAZO SKUNDRICH, one of the most celebrated and formidable of the brigand chiefs, who was for eighteen years the terror of the "Military Frontier," is now in the hands of the Austrian authorities. He gave himself up to the troops in 1866, after stipulating that "neither himself nor his companions should be sentenced either to death or imprisonment for life." He was then employed on the principle of "set a thief to catch a thief," as leader of the Austrian troops in their campaign against the brigands; and he proved so successful in his new career that in a short time the country was almost entirely cleared of the robber bands. He was then tried in a civil court for his former offences, and was sentenced, together with his band, to eighteen years' hard labor. As soon, however as it became known that he was in prison, the brigands again began to show themselves, and their depredations have now become so formidable that the Government has decided to liberate Skundrich and employ him as before, in the pursuit of his former comrades.

THE Pall Mall Gazette observes that none of the biographers of General Jomini, whose death was announced some weeks since, seem to have been aware that on one important occasion he was the adviser of Napoleon III., as he had been of his uncle. Just before the last Italian war the Emperor summoned him to Paris and laid before him the plan of the coming campaign. "Mon Dieu," said the General, "ils sont tous bons, les plans de campagne, sur le papier. La difficulté, c'est de les modifier sur le terrain, d'être prêt à tout, de faire face à tout, de prévoir tout, et de tout combiner d'avance, même l'impossible, d'arriver toujours à propos, et de n'être jamais pris au dépourvu." The first Napoleon, we well know, had this wonderful gift, and Jomini, even after his rupture with him, acknowledged that his genius lay chiefly in the fact that, even when suddenly aroused from the heaviest sleep, he was at once able to seize the exact state of affairs. The battle of Magenta showed clearly enough that this gift at least had not descended to his nephew. M. Sainte-Beuve is now engaged on a notice of General Jomini's life and works, which is looked forward to with much interest, as likely to contain the critic's last words upon many of the acts and actors of contemporary history.

A DECREE just issued by the commandant of the garrison at Kolberg, in Pomerania, amusingly illustrates one of the inconveniences to which royalty in Prussia is exposed. It appears that during the late tour of the Crown Prince in Pomerania, the people of Kolberg came into the streets with flowers to greet him on his entrance into their town, and that several of them, anxious to give a practical proof of their loyal enthusiasm, showered bouquets in his face. The consequence was, says the commandant, that his Royal Highness entered the hall of the palace "with his eyes full of tears," caused by the pain of the scratches he had received; "notwithstanding which," he adds, "our Hohenzollern was so extraordinarily good-natured that he overlooked this monstrous treatment, and continued to behave with that winning friendliness which is so characteristic of him." The commandant then proceeds to exhort the inhabitants in future to be more careful and considerate when presenting flowers to royal personages. "When the son of the sovereign walks in the street, the people should either with the deepest humility offer him a flower in their hands, or scatter flowers before his feet, but they should not recklessly cast them in the air so as to cause wounds, like the projectiles of an enemy."

AN English writer says: "There is something animal about decisiveness. If the mind be a fine and discursive mind, inclined to thought, and stored with knowledge, it must be hard for it to be swiftly decisive. One of the main qualifications for decisiveness is to be able to shut your eyes to all manner of minor considerations, and sometimes even of major considerations. To do this, requires courage, which is an animal virtue, to be much enlarged by practice. Let us take a numerical illustration, showing the rough-and-ready way in which decisions are arrived at by the neglect of minor considerations. Let there be eight considerations of the following values; No. one, value 17; No. two, value 9; and then six others, the values of which are not ascertained, but it is reasonably concluded that no one of them is higher than 4.

"A decisive man sees that if he decides in a particular way, he will have on his side No. one, equal to 17. He sees that No. two will be against him. He has not time (it is perhaps on the field of battle) to ascertain to which side the other six will incline. He assumes, however, that they will be evenly balanced; he knows that the highest value of any of them is only 4; and he takes at once the decision which will be supported by consideration No. one, value 17. Of course no man thinks so pedantically, as, for the purpose of illustration, I have supposed him to do in the foregoing instance. But it may serve to illustrate the mode of thinking adopted by decisive men, and to show how they are often right. Had there been time for looking carefully at each of the eight unascertained considerations, it might have turned out that the smaller considerations would have entirely altered the decision. The man, not practised in decisiveness, cannot bear, even at a moment of peril, to overlook this possibility."

IF Mr. Buckle's theory of averages holds good with regard to accidents, it certainly is not applicable to crimes in France, where, if they are ruled by any law at all, it is by a law of increase. In spite of the much vaunted Code Napoleon, and of punishments, as a rule, more severe than those inflicted in England, the police statistics of Paris for the last few years, after due correction for the growth of the population, show a steady and most alarming increase of crime. The greatest augmentation is observed between the years 1865, when the number of persons sentenced by the criminal tribunals was 25,500, and 1868, in which year the surprising total of 35,700 convictions was recorded; the activity of the dangerous classes having apparently developed itself principally in the direction of burglary and robbery accompanied with violence. Increased vigilance, leading to a larger number of convictions, may account partially, but only partially, for this disagreeable phenomenon. No attempt has ever been made to estimate even approximately the numbers of the Parisian thieves, but their haunts are tolerably well known. Driven by Baron Haussmann's improvements from most of their old dens in the heart of the city, they congregate principally in low estaminets in the neighborhood of the barriers; but even in the streets adjoining the brilliant boulevards, more than one "tapis franc" still exists, the habitués of which would give a good idea of the company at the famous "Lapin Blanc" described by Eugène Sue. The Revue des deux Mondes, in a highly interesting article, gives some curious details concerning this peculiar society. The different classes of thieves do not associate with each other or even frequent the same houses. Those who assassinate with a view to robbery are the aristocracy of the profession, and pride themselves on their superior daring; they call themselves the "grosse cavalerie," and look down on the smaller fry with the same contempt which Turpin or Duval might have felt for a mere pickpocket or area sneak. The same language, however, is, with trifling differences, common to them all, most words in their argot being of a mediæval, but some even of a classical origin. Thus the executioner commonly styled "Charlot" is also called "Tollard," from "tollere," which was sometimes used in Latin in the sense of "to execute." The Revue des deux Mondes attributes the enormous increase of the thieving population in France to the want of emigration, except from the provinces to the capital. Paris does duty for America and Australia, receiving all the discontented and penniless provincials who come to seek fortune there; many of whom are there developed into accomplished criminals.

THE ALCHEMISTS.

"The upright art of Alchymie liketh me well." — LOTHER.

THE odd, lingering, half-alive vitality of old superstitions was curiously instanced some seventy years ago, when an advertisement appeared in the German Reichsanzeiger, purporting to be issued by the "Hermetic Society," and calling for communications from the votaries of alchemy scattered among the public. This was in 1796, the period when the Directory governed in France, and General Buonaparte was conquering North Italy; a time when old beliefs on many important subjects had recently met with sufficiently rough handling.

Answers to the advertisement came in from all quarters. Persons in every grade of professional and commercial life, tailors and shoemakers, physicians, privy councillors, schoolmasters, watchmakers, apothecaries, organists, professed themselves practical students of the occult science, and desirous of further enlightenment in their as yet unsuccessful quest after the great elixir. The idea that an influential "Hermetic Society" was in existence, infused new hope into these isolated searchers. But on how baseless a fabric their hope was built eventually appeared, when the archives of the society were submitted to inspection, and it was found to have consisted of two members only, two Westphalian doctors of obscure fame. On the letters they had received in consequence of their advertisement, were found indorsed the words "answered evasively."

These facts are told us in a lecture recently delivered at Leipsic by Professor Erdmann, and published in the Gartenlaube. From his statements, and from other sources, we propose to put together a few notes relative to the exploded science, — the eccentric torchbearer to chemical discovery, — whose annals contribute such notable pages to the moral romance of the Middle Ages.

We do not profess to give its history in formal sequence. We do not discuss the traditions of its origin among the sages of Egypt, nor ponder over the ambiguous inscription on the Emerald Table of Hermes Trismegistus, — the "Apocalypse of Alchemy," as Dr. Erdmann calls it. That Moses was giving proof of his skill as an "adept" when he dissolved the golden calf and made the rebellious Israelites imbibe it in a liquid state, that the long-lived antediluvian patriarchs had in fact got hold of the Elixir Vitæ, that Noah was commanded to hang up the true and genuine philosopher's stone in the Ark, to give light to all living creatures therein, are opinions we will merely glance at, as some of the most ambitious among the many fictions by which alchemy sought to ennoble its pedigree, when, from an obscure and ill-accredited pursuit, it had come to be admitted into the front ranks of notoriety, to be professed by sages of eminence and patronized by powerful monarchs. It was in the thirteenth century that it stepped into this position, brought to it mainly through the intercourse of the Arabs with Europe. The heyday of its dignity may be said to have continued from the thirteenth to the sixteenth century. After the Revival of Learning it declined in estimation; but it still maintained a very considerable sway over those portions of society where mental activity had not been impelled into the new channels. Of its prevalence in Germany, especially during the seventeenth century, Professor Erdmann relates many curious instances. To these we shall presently recur. The absolute death of Alchemy, or the "Spagiriæ Art," as it used sometimes to be called, cannot be assigned to an earlier date than the publication of Lavoisier's "Modern System of Chemistry," eighty years ago. And here again, when we speak of its "absolute death," it must be observed that, even in our own times, chemists of first-rate rank have accorded a certain degree of recognition to its fundamental hypothesis. Sir Humphry Davy is not alone in avowing his opinion that the transmutations of metals need not be considered an impossibility. Metals, it is argued, are composite bodies, brought into their actual condition by the hidden operations of Nature. Why may not man, who has wrested so many secrets from her already, find out this art of metal-making also, and by some imitative process form similar combinations under the same relative conditions? But to what purpose? If the art resulted in a monopoly by some dexterous patentee, gold-making would before long come to be made penal; if every one might without hindrance carry his own California in his own crucible, gold would soon cease to be the standard of value.

But has the transmutation ever been effected? Here the testimony of enlightened modern inquiry is emphatically No, in spite of the half-affirmations we meet with here and there; as, for instance, in a "History of Alchymy" alluded to by Professor Erdmann, published as late as 1832, wherein the author expresses his belief that at least five "Adepts" or masters of the art of transmutation have, in the course of ages, made good their claims to the title.

Before we proceed further, let us note what were the definite objects which the alchemists proposed to themselves in their researches, and which these adepts professed to have accomplished. The doctrines on which their science rested were three:—

1. That gold could be produced from metals which themselves contained no gold, by the application to them of an artificial preparation. This preparation went by the names of the Philosopher's Stone, the Great Elixir, the Great Magisterium, and the Red Tincture. It was applied to metals when they had been fused into a liquid state; and the act of application was called Projection.

2. That silver could be similarly produced out of metals containing no silver, by the application of another preparation called the Stone of the Second Order, the Little Elixir, the Little Magisterium, and the White Tincture. This, naturally, was in much less request than the other, and is much less talked about in the records of Alchemy.

3. The same preparation which thus ennobles metals and produces gold is, at the same time, when in a potable state, or even in some forms as a solid, a medicine possessing marvellous qualities for preserving life and renewing youthful vigor. How far the philosopher's stone and the elixir of life were considered identical is, however, left in some doubt by the ambiguity of Spagiric writers. By some the latter has been described as having the properties of sea-water; by others as an invigorating paste; by others as liquid gold; by others, Raymond Lulli, for instance, as something very like honest port and sherry. This elixir of life was sought by the earlier alchemists much more eagerly than was the stone in its transmuting properties, but it faded into discredit sooner: the avarice of mankind proved stronger than their love of existence; or, perhaps we should say, the great disprover Death was more convincing in his arguments than the obstinacy of metallic ores. Gold might be "exhibited" by astute contrivances where honest means of fabricating it had failed; no deceit could "exhibit" life in the individual whose hour of fate had really come.

To hit upon the right composition of the greater magisterium, whether as a medicine or a transmuter of metals, was, then, the primary aim and end of alchemy throughout. To decompose all metals into their primitive constituents, so as to ascertain the relative value of each, and to learn how to recombine them in certain specific proportions, was a necessary part of the process, and hence resulted the inestimable service rendered by alchemy to true science,—the establishment of the principles of chemical analysis. As to the nature and properties of the wonder-working stone, nothing can be more vague, contradictory, and hyperbolic than the reports of professed adepts on the subject. Either they sought to disguise their conscious ignorance by allegorical language, or they pretended to make a mystery of some simple and inefficacious process; or thinking they really had, or were in the way of gaining, the secret, they tried to mystify those who might perchance have followed up their indications too cleverly. This allegorical jargon may be instanced by a quotation from the verses dedicatory of George Ripley, Canon of Bridlington, the English alchemist, addressed to King Edward IV. He sums up his lore as follows:—

"This natural process, by help of craft then consummate, Dissolveth the Elixir in its unctuous humiditie,
Then in balneo of Mary together let them circulate,
Like new honey or oil, till they perfectly thicked be:
Then will that medicine heal all manner infirmity,
And turn all metals to Sonne and Moon most perfectly;

Then shall ye have both great Elixir and aureum potabile,
By the grace and will of God, to whom be laud eternally."

Mark the pious sentiment with which Ripley concludes. It is a notable circumstance that from the thirteenth to the fifteenth century the pursuit of alchemy was closely connected with the religious sentiment, or, at all events, professed such connection. Its prominent advocates then, and, indeed, to a later date, were wont to speak of themselves as devout investigators of the truths of God discoverable in the marvels of Nature,—discoverable only by the pure and patient. They claimed for their pursuit the same religious dignity which Christians of the "broad" school in modern theology are bold to claim for scientific study, on the ground that the God of Revelation is also the God of Nature, and speaks to man by the one mode as well as by the other. Their expressions are often noble and elevated. Hear Johannes Strangunere, in his dying injunctions to his son, in 1492: "Upon the salvation of thy soul do not forget the poor; and in any case look well to thyself, that thou do not disclose the secrets of this science to any covetous worldly man." In Faber's Propugnaculum Alchymie, published in 1644, we have the religious theory of the science thus stated: "The stone of the philosophers is, by all the authors who have treated of it, esteemed to be the greatest gift of God on earth. . . . As therefore it is so great and mighty a gift of God, the most necessary thing in order that man should attain to a knowledge of its excellence and worth, is wisdom which is bestowed by God on very few." And Michael Sandivogius, a Polish adept early in the seventeenth century, reputed author of "A New Light of Alchymie taken out of the Fountain of Nature and Manual Experience," as the English translation has it, writes thus: "Thou, therefore, that desirest to attain to this art, in the first place put thy whole trust in God thy Creator, and urge him by thy prayers, and assuredly believe that he will not forsake thee; for if God shall know that thy heart is sincere, and thy whole trust is put in him, he will, by one means or another, show thee a way and assist thee in it, that thou shalt obtain thy desire." There is piety, too, in the reason given by this same Sandivogius why the adepts, who have learnt how to circumvent death, chose not to perpetuate their existence on earth: "Now I do not wonder," he says, when describing the glorious effects of the elixir, "as before I did, why philosophers, when they have attained to this medicine, have not cared to have their days prolonged, because every philosopher hath the life to come so clearly before his eyes as thy face is seen in a glass." Ben Jonson's impostor acted the character well:—

"He, honest wretch,
A notable superstitious good soul,
Has worn his knees bare and his slippers bald,
With prayer and fasting for it. . . . Here he comes,—
Not a profane word afore him,—'t is poison!"

In the early Middle Ages it is notorious that not only many good and pious men, but many of the highest intellects, pursued the delusive science, and had the popular repute of being "Spagiric sages," or adepts in its mysteries. Roger Bacon, Albertus Magnus, St. Thomas Aquinas, are the heroes of many fantastic legends. And, indeed, for a long period it was chiefly by clerics, and by monkish clerics, that it was cultivated. In the dreamy solitudes of the cloister, where man's restless imagination so often revenged itself for the restrictions laid on active life, many a tonsured inmate bent over crucible and bellows, "nursing his eternal hope,"* and praying devoutly for illumination from on high.

But enthusiasm and imposture are ever close at hand; and what is more strange, the border-land between them is perilously ill defined. A liar has been known to lie himself into belief of his own inventions; a fanatic, in his overweening desire for the realization of his dreams, will wilfully forget that evidence needs fact for its basis. The wild stories that spring up like a tangle of weeds round the fame of every alchemical philosopher of the Middle Ages leave one in amazement both at the credulity and the untruthfulness of our far-off ancestors; and yet might not a glance nearer home suffice to humble those who have lived in the days of table-rapping and spiritualistic séances? The biographies of the earlier alchemists have been largely recorded by the French writers, Naudé and Lenglet du Fresnoy. We will mention a few of them, but our chief business is with later and less hackneyed instances. Among the most famous were Artepheus, of the twelfth century, who wrote a treatise on the preservation of life, on the credit of his own experience, being professedly, at the time of writing, in the thousand-and-twenty-fifth year of his age; and who used quietly to settle every disputed question of ancient history by the irrefragable plea of personal testimony. Arnold de Villeneuve, in the thirteenth century, commonly called Villanovanus, was the reputed author of a recipe for the prolongation of life some hundred years or so, by means of carefully prepared plasters and nostrums. Pietro d'Apono, his contemporary, worked unheard-of wonders with his seven familiar spirits, and used to conjure gold back into his Fortunatus's wallet the moment he had made a disbursement. Greater than any of these was Raymond Lulli, of Majorca, the "enlightened doctor," and author of the philosophical Ars Lulli, who set up a laboratory at Westminster and filled the coffers of one of our Edwards to the tune of six millions of rose nobles; though indeed some rationalizing authorities ventured to say it was by inducing the King to lay a tax upon wool, and not by transmuting metals, that he worked that miracle. Nicholas Flamel, a poor Parisian scribe, extracted the secret from a mysterious MS. after twenty years of painful study. Were not the fourteen hospitals, three chapels, and seven churches that he built, restored, or endowed, indisputable evidence of the validity of his claims to the possession of the gold-making stone? What if the incredulous, even in his own time, whispered that he was a miser and a usurer, that he extorted his pelf from Spanish Jews, and was a general money-lender to the dissipated youth of Paris? Avaunt, such ignoble calumnies!

If the hermetic science bore on the whole a "holy and harmless" character among the inquiring intellects of the thirteenth century, already, in the fourteenth, the quest after the secret of inexhaustible riches had induced a spirit of rivalry and deception which caused serious inconveniences to society. It is to be remarked that the early alchemists invariably went by the name of "philosophers"; the term "gold-makers" was applied in later times and in a derogatory sense. Many Popes and other potentates sought to make the practice of "multiplication," as it was sometimes termed, penal. But in vain: "multipliers" multiplied.

Coins and medals were minted from what at all events passed for fabricated gold, to the great detriment of commercial interests. Henry IV. of England issued a stringent prohibition of the practice. The God-fearing Henry VI. eagerly encouraged it, repealing his grandfather's statute, and exhorting all classes of his subjects to search for the secret in the spirit of loyalty, for the replenishment of his coffers; his characteristic piety coming out in the special charge to the clergy, as being undoubtedly possessed of the power of transmuting substances in one way, and therefore more likely perhaps to succeed in the other. Edward IV. patronized the art. So did poor Charles VI. of France, in his flighty, impulsive way. One of the occupants of the Holy See had the credit of being an alchemist, Pope John XXII., whose bulls issued against the pretenders to the art were perhaps intended to warn off rivals. The eighteen millions of treasure which he was said to have left behind him was the current argument adduced to prove him an adept; the evidence of the fact perhaps as little trustworthy as the inference.

Weird fancies have always found a congenial atmosphere within the breast of the Teuton; and it was most conspicuously by German emperors and princes that the Spagiric art—so called in fact from a Teutonic word, spähen, to search—was cultivated or patronized. During the fifteenth century it came to be professed by a number of adventurers, "wandering alchemists" as they were styled, who strolled from court to court, sometimes gaining great political influence over their patrons, as, for instance, Hans von Dörnberg did over the Landgrave of Hesse; sometimes experiencing the tragic fate of those who sink from great men's favor by a too daring swimming on bladders. The first personage of pre-eminent degree who kept a regular "court alchemist" was Barbara, wife of the Emperor Sigismund. She had been instructed, so the story goes, by a wandering sage how to make silver out of copper and arsenic, and to increase the substance of gold by the addition of copper and silver. This metal, on which, at all events, imperial power could pass the fiat of currency, she benevolently sold to the poor as genuine metal. The Malgrave John of Brandenburg was so great a proficient in the labors of the crucible, that he was surnamed "the Alchemist," and his residence at the Plassenburg, near Culmbach, was a headquarter of the profession. His fame, however, was outdone in the following century by that of the Emperor Rudolph II., whose sobriquets were "the Prince of Alchemy" and "the German Hermes Trismegistus." His superstitious dreams, which cost the empire dear at a time when intellect and energy were required to steer her through her troubles, gave an impetus to "gold-cookery" throughout his dominions such as it never received before or after. Adepts fought out their envious rivalries at his court.

His poet laureate sung of the alchemical processes as of the conflict of allegorical powers in an heroic strife. Here Dee and Kelly, the English mountebanks, dropped down for a while on their erratic course. Here Van Helmont was eagerly invited. Here Sandivogius was treated sumptuously, and honored with the title of Councillor of State. Equally zealous with Rudolph, as a student of the art and patron of its professors, was Augustus, Elector of Saxony, who had a laboratory at Dresden, popularly called the Gold House; while his wife, the Electress Anna, practised at Annaburg, and his son and successor, Christian, grew up under their eyes a sharer in the family taste. It was this Christian to whose reign belongs the story of Setonius Scotus (Seaton the Scot), alias the "Cosmopolite," which affords a striking illustration of the precarious conditions of an alchemist's life and fortunes in those days. Setonius professed to have mastered the mystery of gold-making; and the proof he gave of his art, in the presence of the Elector Christian, on one occasion, so greatly impressed that prince's mind, that he caused the luckless adept to be forthwith carried off and imprisoned in a high tower at Dresden, where no one else could get at him to learn his secret, and where a fair field might be left for the Elector's own efforts. He visited his prisoner himself and tried persuasion. Setonius was dumb. Then he employed torture. The poor "Cosmopolite" was racked till within an ace of death. Still no confession; and as it would not do to kill the goose with the golden eggs outright, Seaton was left to linger in the tower, alternately soothed and tormented. One day, by special favor, a Polish visitor was allowed to have access to him. This was Michael Sandivogius, to whom more than once we have already made allusion; he was then a student only, not an adept, in alchemy; he listened eagerly to Seaton's promises of golden reward should he help him to effect his escape. A plan was laid, and successfully executed; the fugitives reached Cracow, but there the strength of Seaton, harassed by long torture and privation, broke down. The cathedral church of Cracow received his remains in 1604.

The experience of poor Alexander Seaton was that of many others of his class. The conduct of princes towards the alchemists was, in fact, much like the old fable of the sun and wind. It was a question whether fair means or foul means, favors or tortures, would be most likely to wring the secret out of a man who boasted of carrying it in his breast. More was demanded of the luckless "multipliers" than they were able to perform. "Fill my coffers," was the cry of some needy duke or landgrave; "give me money to pay my troops, to feast my retainers." Well was it if he did not let his fancy launch forth into the gorgeous visions of Sir Epicure Mammon:—

"My meat shall all come in in Indian shells, Dishes of agate set in gold, and studded
With emeralds, sapphires, hyacinths, and rubies:
Bolled in the spirit of Sol, and dissolved pearl,
Apicius' diet, 'gainst the epilepsy;
And I will eat these broths with spoons of amber Headed with diamond and carbuncle."

The adventurer, if he had any credit to trade upon, might say, "Give me time to mature my experiments,—a little more, and the secret is won." He might thus linger on, well tended and trusted for a while; or should his credit fail, he might be dismissed in disgrace, to go to another petty court, and get "boarded and lodged" for another term of promise and imposture. On the other hand, if desperately pressed, and confident in his own ingenuity, he might proceed to experiment. Then, if he broke down, he might perchance be hung as an impostor,—hung in a tinsel-spangled garment, beneath a mocking superscription, like that placed over an unhappy victim at Culmbach, who had boasted of having acquired the much-coveted subsidiary art of fixing quicksilver:—

"I deemed of fixing mercury I had acquired the knack;
But things have gone by contraries, and I am fixed, alas!"

"Ich war, swar wie Mercur wird fix gemacht, bedacht; Doeh hat sich's umgekehrt, und ich bin fix gemacht!"

The curious tale of Böttger, or Bötticher, the originator of the Dresden porcelain manufacture, belongs to a comparatively late period in the annals of alchemy. It is worth relating as one of the remarkable instances where the search after the philosopher's stone led by side-doors to real and valuable discoveries. Bötticher was an apothecary's apprentice at Berlin, in the time of Frederick I. King of Prussia (1701–1713). He boasted of having received a bit of the genuine stone from a Greek named Lascaris, and of having done marvellous things with it in the way of transmutation. The King expressed his desire to judge personally of his pretensions. Bötticher was by no means inclined to stand the trial, and crossed the borders to Wittenberg. His sovereign Lord demanded his extradition by the Saxon Government. It was refused: and the garrison of Wittenberg was strengthened for fear of a surprise; while, for greater security, the valuable emigrant was transferred to Dresden. Here he somehow satisfied the Prince von Fürstenberg who was governing in the Saxon King's absence, that he really could make gold. The King, Augustus II., wrote to him in the most deferential terms, made him a nobleman, and, with all marks of respect, stowed him away in his strong tower of Königstein, where he was assiduously watched, in the hope of winning his secret from him in some unguarded moment. However, not to anger him, and thus defeat the royal hopes, he was allowed to return to Dresden, in a sort of honorable captivity, while freedom and additional rewards were promised him should he give up the required recipe. He actually signed a contract to that effect, and was accordingly guarded, if possible, more carefully, and treated more sumptuously, than ever. He was looked upon as a precious jewel of the crown; and when a hostile invasion soon threatened, he was transferred, with the other treasures of royalty, once more to the Königstein. Meanwhile, three years passed, and his contract was not fulfilled. The King waxed impatient. Bötticher had gone on experimenting, in the desperate hope of being able to make good his pretensions; but gold would not come at his bidding. He might, perchance, have been hung with ignominy, like so many of his predecessors; but, luckily for him, a really important discovery had emerged out of some of his manipulations.

He now ventured to confess to the King that he never had made gold, nor knew how to do so, but offered his Majesty the results of his porcelain invention instead. Augustus swallowed his mortification, and forgave him, placing him at the head of the Dresden porcelain-works, so famous in after years; but to the day of his death, which occurred in 1719, the recalcitrant alchemist was carefully watched, lest, perchance, some more valuable secret might escape him. The casual discoveries made by alchemists would fill many volumes of science and industrial history. Thus Roger Bacon stumbled by a chance on the composition of gunpowder; Geber, on the properties of acids; Van Helmont, on the nature of gas, "geist," or "spirit," so named by him; and Dr. Glauber, of Amsterdam, in the seventeenth century, eliminated in this haphazard way the uses of the "salts" which bear his name.

Paracelsus and Van Helmont are the greatest names connected with alchemy in the sixteenth century. The pompous charlatanry of Paracelsus gave impulse to its subsequent development under the forms of Rosicrucianism, whose secret societies and freemasonry occupied the fancy of mankind so much in the seventeenth century. In Germany, the natural tendency of men to mysticism was greatly assisted by the barbarizing effects of the Thirty Years' War. As in literature, so in science: culture was absolutely repressed, and made retrograde by the singular desolations of the gloomy period from 1618 to 1648. This was conspicuously shown in the department of jurisprudence. Dr. Erdmann has collected some curious cases of law decisions resting on the theories of alchemy as evidence. It seems not to have been till late in the seventeenth century, however, that an Austrian jurist, Von Rain, went so far as to assert that disbelief in the existence of the stone actually brought a man within the penalties of lèse-majesté, on the ground that so many emperors had undoubtedly performed transmutations by its agency.

As early as 1580, the Leipsic tribunals pronounced judgment against an unhappy wretch called Beuther, body-chemist of that Augustus, Elector of Saxony, of whom we have already had occasion to speak. Beuther was reputed to possess certain valuable MSS. treating of "special transmutations," i. e. the transmutation of some one particular metal, which, having promised on oath to impart to certain other persons, he had afterwards declined to give up, besides having been culpably negligent in his official capacity. He was adjudged to be undoubtedly in possession of THE SECRET, and sentenced accordingly to be tortured for its extraction; then, for his official negligence, to be scourged with rods; for his perjury to his comrades, to lose three of his fingers; finally, for the good of the land, to be shut up securely in prison, lest he might be tempted to tell his secret to foreign potentates.

As late as the year 1725 there was a curious case of litigation before the same court at Leipsic. A certain Countess von Erbach had given shelter in her castle to a reputed robber, who was flying from justice. This robber turned out to be an adept in alchemy, and a robber only out of, as it would seem, most superfluous amateurship. In the excess of his gratitude to his benefactress, he turned all her silver plate into gold. But here the Countess's husband stepped in, and claimed half of the treasure, on the plea that the increase of value had been effected on his territory, and under the matrimonial conditions as to property. The Leipsic lawyers decided against him, saying that, as the plate had been recognized as belonging solely to the Countess prior to the transmutation, so it must be her exclusive property afterwards, under whatever changes it might have passed.

It was a not uncommon point of law whether alchemical gold, which was not capable of being distinguished from original gold, was to be held of equivalent value or not; the doubt being, in the true mystic phraseology, whether it could possess the same hidden or innate powers. Special treatises were written on the subject of the coins supposed to have been struck from alchemical metal. As late as 1797, a large medal was shown at Vienna, purporting to be minted from the gold made out of quicksilver by the Emperor Ferdinand III., through virtue of a grain of red powder given him by one Richthausen, at Prague. Nothing is more characteristic of the strange history of this science than the important part played in it by "Unknowns,"—weird, mysterious visitors, who are stated to have appeared here and there as unexpectedly as Maturin's incomparable bogie, "Mel-moth the Wanderer," and to have vanished as unaccountably,—men who, if the theory of the science were true, might have wielded more than the power of the united Rothschild family, and emulated the splendors of Monte Cristo, yet who came and went poor and haggard, and left no trace behind. Such was the "Unknown" who appeared to the philosophic Dr. Helvetius, body-physician to a Prince of Orange, in the seventeenth century, and converted him from incredulity to the most enthusiastic belief. This Unknown came into the Doctor's study one day, in the shape of a respectable burgher of North Holland, and drew from his pocket a small ivory box, containing three heavy pieces of metal, brimstone-colored and brittle, from which Helvetius scraped a small portion with his thumbnail. The stranger declined performing any feat of transmutation himself, saying he was "not allowed" to do so. Helvetius experimented in vain with the parings he had scraped off; but on a second visit, the mysterious burgher proved more compliant, and, after helping Helvetius to a successful operation, he left him in possession of certain directions by means of which he contrived to change six ounces of lead into very pure gold when alone. The Hague rang with the fame of his exploit; and the operation was successfully repeated in presence of the Prince of Orange. Moreover, the gold was examined by the authorities of the Mint, and pronounced genuine. At last the magic powder was exhausted, and, as the Unknown never visited him again, Dr. Helvetius was compelled to bring his experiments to an end. But he published in 1667 a learned work, called the Golden Calf, maintaining the truth of the doctrines he had once derided; and the sceptical philosopher Spinoza averred, after strict inquiry into the truth of the events narrated, that the evidence of that case of transmutation was sufficient to make a convert of himself.

Another picturesque tale current among the records of Continental alchemy is that of Professor Martini of Helmstadt, who died in 1621, and was a supercilious foe of the art in the early part of his career, strenuously contesting in his lectures the arguments adduced in its behalf. The "Unknown" in this case was a foreign nobleman, who had just arrived at Helmstadt, and took his place one day in the lecture-hall. After listening for a while to Martini's self-satisfied expositions, he courteously interrupted the lecturer, offering to refute his opinions experimentally. A pan of coals, a crucible, and some lead, were brought in at his desire. A short manipulation ensued; and lo! the lead had acquired the form and substance of fine gold, which the nobleman handed over to the astounded professor with the modest words, "Solve mihi hunc syllogismum!"

Dr. Erdmann cites Van Helmont's testimony to the existence of the philosopher's stone as one of the most difficult to treat with contempt, on account of the unquestionable integrity and scientific sagacity of the inquirer. Van Helmont loved truth with sincere devotion. A Brabant nobleman by birth, he renounced his rank and possessions to turn physician, to study nature, and do good works. His discoveries in medicine are of lasting value. He never professed to give alchemy more than a second place in his interest; yet he avers that in 1618 he himself changed eight ounces of quicksilver into pure gold by means of a substance given him from time to time by an unknown visitor. He never learnt the secret of making the stone himself, but he describes it as a heavy powder of the color of saffron, glittering like rather coarse-grained glass.

Leibnitz and Spinoza! strange names to bring into connection with this science of the superstitious. Yet Bacon of Verulam did not disbelieve in alchemy, though to him we are first indebted for the excellent application of the old fable of the dying man's will and the field to be dug over in search of the treasure which never existed save in the fertilizing process of culture. Robert Boyle is also cited as having faith in its pretensions. The last professed adept in England was one James Price, who, in 1782, announced himself the possessor of a tincture which could change from thirty to sixty times its weight into gold.

Semler, the well-known theological Professor at Halle in the last century was a votary of alchemy. The story of his performances before the incredulous chemist, Klaproth, may be given as illustrative of the trickery of which experimenters were oftentimes the dupes, and by means of which at least as often, though not in this case, they established their pretensions. In the year 1786 Dr. Semler and one Baron von Hirschen occupied themselves with preparing a Universal Medicine, called by them "Luft Salz," atmospheric salts. Three treatises on "Hermetic Medicine" were composed in relation to it by Semler, and he went beyond the original pretensions of the medicine, asserting that gold could be made by means of it in well-warmed glasses, without the intervention of crucible or coals. He got into a lively discussion with the leading chemists of the day, and at last submitted to Klaproth, for his own use, a mass of metal which he said contained the seeds of gold. To Klaproth's ill-success in making these "seeds" germinate, Semler could only reply that he found a residuum of gold in his glasses every five or six days. On close examination it was discovered that a trick had been played upon him. Some subordinates to whom he had intrusted the task of warming his glasses had contrived to insert a small quantity of gold leaf. It was worth their while, as the sanguine philosopher kept them well fed and lodged. At last, however, they tried the substitution of baser material, pinchbeck, and this led to their detection.

Father Kircher openly challenged the belief in alchemy in his Subterranean World, published about 1670. He did not scruple to call the alchemists knaves and impostors, and their science a delusion. Great was the storm he drew down upon himself thereby. Dr. Glauber of the "salts" was one of his antagonists. A still more elaborate refutation was that made by M. Geoffroy before the Royal Academy of Sciences at Paris, in 1722, wherein he was at the pains to show the various modes of trickery by which alchemical pretensions were sustained: false-bottomed crucibles, hollow wands filled with gold, perforated lead, soldered nails, &c. By degrees the credit of the science hopelessly declined, although daring impostors shot like meteors ever and anon athwart the sober pathway of modern life. Thus Louis XIII. of France made a Franciscan monk named Châtaine his grand almoner because he had held before him the prospect of a hundred years' reign by means of the grand elixir. Thus Jean de Lisle expiated by an early death in the Bastille his bold attempts to persuade the Ministers of Louis XIV. that he possessed the gold-making stone; and thus the adventures of the Count de St. Germain, and of Cagliostro, rested mainly on their claims to the possession of the talisman either of long life or of unbounded wealth.

As we said at the outset of our article, the publication of Lavoisier's system was the real death-blow to the study of alchemy, by pointing out the veritable objects and achievements of chemical induction, and the road by which further progress was to be accomplished.

The hopeless gyrations of the baffled science, ever circling back to its first beginning, and making no advance in its gains and experiences, did, at last, after many busy ages, cease to attract intelligent minds. While we review its promises and its destinies, how profound a human pathos seems to attach to those stately words of Paracelsus, which, doubtless, comforted the heart of many a patient plodder over air-drawn inferences: "Refuse not the waters of Shiloah because they go softly; for they that wade in deep waters cannot go fast."

Isaac Disraeli, in more than one of his delightful miscellanies, quotes the prophecy of Dr. Girtanner, of Leipsic, not far from our own times, who presaged that in the course of the nineteenth century the mystery of gold-making would surely be discovered, and the commonest utensils of cookery would come to be made of the precious metal, whereby all evils of metal-poisoning through the use of corroded vessels would be averted. The nineteenth century is far advanced on its downward slope, and it cannot be said that as yet any symptoms appear of the realization of such visions. The stone is still to seek, if it be worth the seeking; the alkahest, the universal dissolver remains a myth; the crucible yields no treasure; but in one way the "eternal hope" has had an answer; for, within the last thirty years, the shining prize has learnt to yield itself up at man's call, with a fulness far surpassing the harvests of Spagiric fable, when sought by spade and mattock in its native ores.

LITERARY VIRTUE.

WE stay in a room till it is like an oven. Yet it is only unpleasantly warm to the lazybones who for the last hour and a half has been sitting, novel in hand, over the fire. The person who complains of being stifed is the chance visitor who pops into the burning furnace just after having come in from a walk. Of course we express surprise, throw open door or window, and feel a trifle ashamed of ourselves. But we are glad to have been told a whole-some truth.

We drag on a humdrum sort of existence, week after week, month after month, year after year, settle down into divers habits more or less reprehensible, and flatter ourselves all the while that, if not perfect, we are at least steady church-goers, and respectable fathers of families. One day we are pulled up short, we are thrown forward on our faces, we meet with a sort of moral railway accident, and find to our dismay and astonishment that we have become, as it were, encrusted with barnacles, that we have got into a way of doing all sorts of naughty things sheerly from the cumulative force of habit; that while we ourselves are no better than we need be, the world in general, whatever it may think of itself, is almost beyond the pale of redemption. For ten minutes or so, we are terribly shocked, our toast remains on the plate untouched, we forget our second cup of tea, and set out to our day's work with a heavy heart. But by and by we begin "to feel ourselves" again, perhaps a trifle livelier and brisker than we were before, and we fancy, somehow or another, that the shock we have lately experienced was the very thing we wanted; in course of time, too, we so far resemble a man who has found out the benefit of a shower-bath, though the first taste of the remedy was by no means agreeable, as really to look forward with rather pleasurable anticipations to a repetition of the dose. There is such a thing as an acquired taste. A moral rebuff braces up the soul; sweets without bitters cloy; harmony without discords is apt to prove monotonous; our morning paper without its column and a half of literary virtue is cold meat without pickles, salad without the dressing.

It has long been a matter of anxious speculation to us, who can be the author of the tremendous phillipics by which we are so powerfully, and, on the whole, not unpleasantly, thrilled over our bacon and eggs. We never for an instant supposed that any ordinary mortal could provide such stern and splendidly virtuous declamation. We have pictured to ourselves a holy and venerable being, a man of fasting and prayer, of cowl and sandal, piercing eyes and long, gray beard, who, spending his days in acts of self-denial, and in mortification of the flesh, his nights in vigil and the profoundest meditation, held himself disdainfully aloof from his species, only from time to time descending into this commonplace world of ours just to see how things were going, and to lash offenders with an unsparing hand, who derived a scanty subsistence from the herbs that clustered around his lowly grasp, and who, proof equally against the fleshpots and the gold and raiment of the Egyptians, was utterly incapable of striking a good bargain, still less of arranging to supply, on advantageous terms, sham scorn and artistically elaborated indignation, on demand at so much per column. Perhaps we have had reason of late to alter our opinion, — perhaps not. Certainly the other day, when passing down Fleet Street, we saw a middle-aged man in a greasy hat and badly brushed coat, but that he was — no, we cling to our original conviction, let acquaintances who move in literary circles and seem fond of practical jokes, say what they please.

Being an abstraction, a "we" of a virtuous turn of mind, with a lively faith in the villany of our neighbors, and being not wholly reluctant to see society's shoulders bared and submitted to a round three dozen, feeling, moreover, that a little penance even nearer home is, if submitted to with a good grace, at least, a refreshing stimulant, we have put private considerations aside altogether, we have waded, regardless of personal suffering, through a very torrent of scalding reproaches, and are now enabled through the courtesy of the editor of the St. James's Magazine to present mankind in general with the result of our observations.

In the first place, a mere hint is enough to call forth the strictness, ay, the thunder of our prophet. A paragraph to fill up a column, a not very startling item of news from the police-court, a squabble between a couple of navvies, a row at the Alhambra, a runaway horse in Rotten Row, a turbulent vestry meeting, and "black as the whirlwinds of the north" out bursts the hurricane sometimes to abate not for several days. The principal fact to be noted is that it never does much damage, neither does it often result in perceptible good. A fair amount of dust is swept into corners, but in the corners it remains. You are perfectly bewildered by the hubbub, but once let it pass and the world will look pretty much as it did before. To be sure, the first fury of the hurricane is disquieting to the inexperienced, but, in course of time, you will regard its periodical occurrence with indifference if not amusement. You will have found out that there is nothing to be afraid of, and it is a good joke to see the alarm of one's friends caught in the storm. It may be our turn next, but a boy at school always enjoys seeing another boy whipped.

It is a second noteworthy fact that in a newspaper or a weekly review the literary virtue is always considerably overdone. It is really too good, and after a while, extraordinary merit of a certain kind is apt to rouse suspicion. The wrath and the pathos are both so dramatic in their intensity that you cannot help fancying the writer has his tongue in his cheek. Like Major de Boots in the play, you are overcome by your emotions, but by tears one moment, and laughter the next. By and by, however, you find out the fun of the thing and grin responsively, though the female members of your family, who are not yet up to the joke, still take all that is written in good earnest.

Your Cato of the penny press is a great hand at nudges and hints. He tells his story, as it were, by innuendo. He does not say anything in so many words, but he does better, — he suggests, and suggestions are often worth more than the sober truth in the background. You have a rough sketch given you; you may fill it up for yourself, and in the way you like best. The plan has its advantages, especially to persons of a lively imagination. You know something naughty has been done, but you are not sure what. Well, you must sit down and work out the puzzle; you must exercise your wits; the thing wanted is your notion of naughtiness. Come, now, have a try, don't be ashamed.

Ah, very creditable for a first attempt; and now we are bound in fairness to tell you that the actual occurrence was nothing so very remarkable; so, clearly, you are the gainer. Your faculty of imagination has been called into play, and the person you have to thank for giving it exercise is the ingenious scamp who was far too goody to say outright what he meant, but who walked his subject round and round, and dropped a word here, and threw in a wink there, and mouthed and looked mysterious as if the game in the bush were not to be made light of, and ended by suggesting a good many nasty ideas on a topic that, after all, had better have been passed over in silence. Unless you are a very green hand indeed, you can see that all the noble wrath, the manly tears, the scathing sarcasm, the coy reticence, are part and parcel of an elaborate sham, are mere stage tricks, or, to change the image, a cleverly contrived frame, an artistic background, to throw the principal theme of the picture the more prominently forward.

Real pity is unostentatious, real sympathy is not expressed in terms affectedly simple and theatrically gushing at the same time; indignation hurled at the system, usually, if sincere, is united with a deep regret for the individual; horror at existing evils cannot, as does the "property" sentiments of the literary hack, walk hand in hand with a propensity to play the buffoon, to make the poor, flouted, heart-broken victim of folly and of man's vice the theme of a sarcastic bit of description, of an unfeeling sneer. But literary virtue is a mask that frowns on one side and grins hideously on the other; the goodness called forth by a reference to your banker wells up with a sort of after-dinner profusion, and is about as sincere and convincing as the maudlin rants of a drunkard.

One word more. The Censor at a given rate per column is less the surgeon, cruel only to be kind, than the hangman with the cat-o'-nine-tails.

In literature of the highly virtuous class, it is to be remarked that we hear a good deal of fraudulent bankers, vicious young noblemen, intolerant clergymen, and grinding capitalists; but we have not yet encountered the hack writer who lets out his conscience on hire, and the publisher who does not mind shaving the wind, and who would not stick at a base act if there were a chance of making it pay. May we trust that such beings have no existence? and yet in that case how shall we account for the flourishing condition of certain professedly, but only professedly, high-minded periodicals that have gained an unenviable reputation for malicious humor and scurrility?

To a writer who really wants a text for a sermon pitched in a high key, stern, pathetic, scathing, and prurient at the same time, there are no topics like "Our Music Halls" and "the condition of our streets after dark." Can we wonder, then, that both these subjects are periodically brought up for consideration,—for a consideration, by the by, that makes certain papers for a day or two at a stretch unfit for admission into decent families.

Lashvice is in his glory when he has to review a fast novel or a new burlesque; he can get some sport, too, out of a gallery of French paintings. He has read the book through most carefully, and is shocked beyond measure. The public must be put on its guard. How can this be done better than by giving many and full quotations? Here is something really abominable, something wholly unfit for publication; very well, then, read it out distinctly. Here is a work mischievous to a degree, full of the poison of asps, not to be perused without a blush; very well, then, publish the name of it, cry aloud upon the housetop that it is to be obtained for such a price at such a place, pick out the most recherché morsels, and lay them before the reader, and assuredly the cause of virtue will benefit much by your advocacy. But perhaps the critic wants to damage the sale of the book; very well, then, he has only to add a few extra quotations, as assuredly he will do, and, after reading his article, no one will be under any necessity to refer to the original volume.

But even if the work be comparatively, or quite innocent, a clever manipulator will succeed in turning it to profitable account. If the author have not said anything wrong, no one can very well prove that he may not have insinuated evil. Let him, then, be dealt with accordingly. You cannot lay your finger on any particular passage as objectionable, but the general tone of the book,—ah, it is that which stirs your wrath. Of course you must explain your meaning, you must show why you have arrived at a very unwelcome conclusion; you must exhibit the groundwork of your faith, and if you do all this as you ought to, you will be able to amuse your subscribers, in a low way, considerably. A nudge of the elbow, a wink, and a smirk, often beat words out of the field. Insinuations are what is wanted; to say just what you mean, and no more, would neither be sufficiently prudish nor likely to answer your purpose. Yes, the author has not committed himself, but a loosely worded sentence, a delicate situation, one or two hasty expressions, have served you as a text of a discourse unequalled for sly nastiness. Pull a long face, Mr. Hypocrite, throw in a text or two of Scripture, give point to your scandal by sanctimonious phrases, and the pit will be delighted; after the farce is over it will call upon you to repeat the performance.

An author sometimes from very purity and innocence of heart trenches on dangerous ground, then you have a fine chance, you can point out what he really does mean; you can open the eyes of the public, and dabble in implied naughtiness to your heart's content; you can be Tartuffe and Satyr in one; you can serve up the most piquant little dish in the world at the expense of a writer who has neither said nor insinuated anything in the least degree vicious, and you can send your admirers away with the reflection that, after all, for combined prudery and nastiness, there is nothing like a virtuous leader, or an indignant critique, in their pet Morning Harpy.

But the latest burlesque. Ah, that is game worth the powder. We have seen it ourselves, have we not, friend? and without its striking us as anything very atrocious. But then we are unregenerate beings; we could afford to be merely amused. We had a good laugh, saw some pretty faces, and showy, glittering dresses; we admired the scenery, actually applauded one or two of the liveliest and funniest songs, and left the theatre feeling that we had not laid out our money in vain. But it is in anything but an equally flippant and uncensorious spirit that our Cato of the press goes to the play. Perhaps a long course of sweets has disagreed with him; anyhow, he is in a terribly bad humor, flourishes his bladder of peas right and left, falls foul of friends and foes alike, sees everything through the distorted medium of his own vicious fancy, and takes paper and pen in hand to assure the public that the "coarseness of many of the jokes, the scantiness of the dresses, the unabashed impudence of the miserable painted dolls who degrade the name of actress," &c.; but really we have given a sufficient taste of his quality. He can see unrestrained profligacy where ordinary mortals can only perceive innocent if rather boisterous fun; he can see the wanton smile where ordinary folk can only remark the stereotyped grin of the ballet-dancer; he can see deliberate wickedness, elaborate indecency, where the world in general notices nothing but a dance rather merrier and less tedious than stage dances were some twenty years ago. But your Lashvice is a rare man for looking through a millstone; sin is the article required, and, real or imaginary, he must have it; for the good of his trade, he cannot be disappointed of his hangman's fees, he must keep his hand in, and if there be no prisoners to flog, he must castigate the whipping-post. He is a great authority on Nautch girls, a class of beings with whom polite society in general has not much acquaintance. But whenever a new burlesque appears, he invariably discovers as the result of a long and varied experience that the conduct of the leading actresses is quite on a par with that of the poor creatures to whom we have alluded. French operetta and English extravaganza, if productive of no other satisfactory result, at least help to supply some of the largest daily papers in the world with themes for sham moral articles. Let the viciousness of the stage then flourish till time be merged in eternity, till even the cheap newspaper press be wanted no more.

A grand form of literary virtue is to pretend an excess of zeal for the commonwealth, and to startle the public with scandalous allusions to the private life of those who, by the very elevation of their position, are debarred from retaliating or giving the lie to their cowardly accuser. A column of prose or a column of verse relying upon calumny for its attraction, is wedded to a tawdry engraving that appeals to the least manly feelings of an ignorant and credulous mob. To regulate the conduct of the highest personage in the land is a task that seems of late to have been arrogated by so-called comic journals without sense of shame, and which are ready to sacrifice the last shred of decency to keep their heads above water a few months longer.

Not many weeks ago a paper that gives itself great airs on the score of superior virtue took occasion to thrill its readers with a sternly wrathful, a most suggestive, a thoroughly spicy "leader," in re a certain correspondence of a disgusting kind that had lately figured in the columns of a not very famous ladies' magazine. The proprietor of the latter publication, being a man wise in his generation, took the hint. For a week or two afterwards, Cato the Censor constituted himself an advertising medium for the very work that he had been at such pains to condemn, and from which, decidedly, a rich treat was to be apprehended by all who have a penchant for luscious filth, and who can smack their lips over carrion.

There is a very objectionable form of literary virtue that takes the guise of spotless, infantile innocence. It is without guile; it is as blind as a bat. It gives every man, whatever his known character, credit for the best intentions. It is so very, very good, so suspiciously obtuse, that it cannot see evil, though, like Apollyon, it stride across the footway and glare in the traveller's face. It throws a couleur de rose over everything questionable; it is not plain-spoken, like Sir Roger de Coverley on his famous visit to Vauxhall; but when describing a place of vicious repute, it lays particular stress on the nightingales, and conveniently ignores more sophisticated features of the establishment. It looks on the surface, and on the surface only; it is no part of its policy to keep behind the scenes; immediate and not remote consequences are the ones with which it concerns itself, and when a public rendezvous has incurred a storm of disapprobation, it goes there in the quality of a self-elected special commissioner, and finds everything just as it should be. One advantage of this sort of virtue is that it enables a shrewd editor to make his paper attractive by means of quite harmless articles with sensational headings. Who can resist buying a weekly journal of literature and review of the fine arts, when such titles as "Sunday Evenings at Cremorne," "The Nymphs of the Alhambra," are printed on the bills of contents?

Literary goodness of the above baby-faced kind

is very amusing in connection with some new work that has roused the bile of straight-laced critics, — say a volume of poetry by a gentleman whose treatment of the amatory passion is far more analytical than edifying. The work has been spoken of as unsuited to family reading, and as having been suggested by long and diligent study of the Holywell Street Press. Does sweet unblushing because verdant innocence join in the hue and cry? By no means. She has read the work through from beginning to end, and has not been shocked in the least. On the contrary she has been very much amused. She tells you that she is quite astounded at the decision of the critics, that without doubt, private malice, or absurd fastidiousness, or gross ignorance, or a malignant prejudice against young and rising, though perhaps somewhat skittish genius is at the bottom of the verdict. She hints, with just a momentary drawing aside of the mask, with a flash, and no more, of the cloven foot, that any versifier who fancies himself a clever fellow has a perfect right, if he thinks proper, to exercise it, of emptying his drains into the river of decent literature; but then she goes on to prove that the author in question, though he would have been fully justified in shocking the prejudices, to say the least, of all respectable readers, has yet considerably forborne from doing so, that the verses represented as naughty are quite harmless, and that Apollo the racy has been treated with great unfairness, and has good cause to complain of the obtuseness of his critics. Then come quotations, not very shocking, though a trifle obscure. Now is this so bad? asks Delilah; and you are constrained to answer No. But the wily apologist knows her game; she has not really quoted the unquotable; what she represents as specimens of the very bad indeed really are no more than specimens of the author in his milder mood.

We shall not do more than allude to the literary virtue that deals in scandalous and lying publications relative to mysteries of convent life, and the secrets of the confessional, professedly with the purpose of putting pure-minded Protestant girls on their guard.

Neither shall we linger over that form of goodness which condemns literature in the mass as sinful, and is especially hard on novels, merely because it publishes largely on its own account, and by elbowing competitors out of the market, can secure a highly remunerative sale for twaddle among select congregations.

There is the vile and ridiculous cant of certain so-called religious miscellanies, as a specimen of which we may quote a story that we read not long ago, intended to illustrate the pernicious effects consequent upon a taste for fiction. A young man of exemplary habits developed into a notorious evil-doer and an habitual drunkard. When questioned by a gullible individual as to the causes of his falling away, he replied with an air of remorse that his sins were all owing to his having in early life yielded to a temptation to read a novel written by whom would the reader guess? Paul de Kock, Eugene Sue, Dumas the younger? O, dear, no; but by the virtuous and exemplary Sir Walter Scott!

A singular form of literary virtue is displayed in the perverted notions of right and wrong, of duty and honor, of love and purity, entertained by the heroes and heroines of certain young ladies' novels. But this topic, tempting though it be, is one to which we have neither time nor space in which to do justice at present. It is to be remarked in conclusion that the virtue of newspapers is very like the virtue of the stage, in these two respects at all events, that it is highly effective, and that it pays. It is not the virtue of every-day life, but something much better, a glorious soap-bubble that dissolves when you attempt to grasp it. It makes you cry, it stirs your enthusiasm, it results in tremendous applause, in vigorous rapping on the floor with walking-stick and umbrella. The only thing to be said against it is that it is a trifle too good. It passes muster at the time, but on sober reflection you are sure you have been humbugged. Philanthropy run up by contract has always a slight smell of the shop. You know the actors did not mean what they said; you know the writer, though a highly respectable individual, and a most painstaking artist, deals out the finer emotions of his soul by the imperial pint. You are not lastingly impressed, you are not moved to adopt a new course of life, though at first you may have been a trifle staggered. You see by and by that the gushing, all-embracing amiability that caused five minutes to pass so pleasantly, was mere gooseberry champagne furnished as per agreement, or, not to wander too far away from matters purely literary, a fine piece of stage rant elaborated with an eye to pit and gallery. You have been taken in, and yet you are not angry. It was a capital play, the illusion was perfect, that is all. No fraud was intended. At the outset you thought the writer a very good fellow, now you are the more inclined to commend him for his cleverness.

The advantage to a paper of literary virtue—always kept on tap—is obvious. It imparts to the publication an air of philanthropy, of strict rectitude of purpose, of good fellowship, of a determination to stand no nonsense, of having a heart in the right place. It wins for it the sympathies of mother-familias; it helps to soothe the ruffled vanity of those whose not very thrilling communications have been rejected. To the writer himself literary virtue is so far of benefit that it is convertible into cash, that it is a salable commodity, and that it helps to pay his butcher's bill; further than this, with a certain class it procures him a cheap and convenient reputation for the highest moral excellence.

Literary virtue is something like Dead Sea fruit, very pretty to look at but liable if subjected to a crucial test to crumble into ashes. It is useful to authors and publishers who wish to keep competitors out of the market, it is the best electroplate to be had for the price, it makes a glitter and is by no means expensive, it is destructive of the sale of naughty books because no one cares to buy such works so long as he can read an indignant and thoroughly searching critique. Finally, it has all the attractive features of a solemn burlesque, and no doubt was invented principally with a view to supply us with material for the learned and in every respect praiseworthy article that we have just completed.

TOM BUTLER.

V.—THE FUNERAL.

It would be hard upon me to give in detail the incidents of this most delightful of days. I could have gone on thus for a week, now in the back seat, now walking, now running, now inside. I only regretted the absence of Vixen the First, who would have run under the carriage the whole way, her red jaws open, and enjoying all far more than I did. The anecdotes and good things I heard were indescribable. But at last, about ten o'clock, when it had grown dusk, and Mr. John's lamps were blazing, throwing out a fierce glare on both sides, like two wicked eyes, the trees began to grow thick, and the plantations to cluster, and the road to grow more like a green lane. Mr. John set about looking round, and breaking into exclamations, "Modye, Modye! well, well!" which I assumed was regret, as certain memorials brought back the memory of the late owner. Here were cottages, and people standing at the doors, and here was a narrow five-barred gate open, through which we turned,—the back avenue. We now went along smoothly, plunged into a yet darker avenue cut in a plantation, which wound round and round about, through whose trees we saw sparkling the lights of the house. "Modye, Modye! well, well!" again came from my companion. And now we came up, with a sweep and crunching of gravel, to a great solid house, burly, strong, and massive, and full of many windows. The door was wide open, and a young man that seemed to me all black was coming out.

"Very, very kind of you, Uncle Jack, to come—very!"

The brave Tom was not in the least embarrassed to account for his sympathizing presence; in fact, did it so well that the black gentleman said it was very good of him, and that he felt it exceedingly. I was a little hurt to find that no one seemed to think it good of me to come so far; and, though the captain whispered him, and evidently spoke about me, he merely said,—

"To be sure, to be sure; quite right."

There was a great hall, with hats on the table, and it seemed to me full of "grand" things; a billiard-table, antlers, pictures, and innumerable doors, which led everywhere. "I'll show you your rooms, and then we can have dinner when you like," he said; a speech which still seemed to leave me out. Then we went up a large staircase, they talking in a low voice; "Poor Jenny bears up wonderful," I heard him say, "wonderfully on the whole. But to-morrow morning will be the pull." What pull could he mean? "Ay, ay!" said the captain. "I am an old horse myself, and can't expect to draw forever." Then he asked "how was Bill," and Bill himself came in, a jolly young man with a very large red beard, his hands in his pockets; and a very limp old servant-man, whose head shook mysteriously, and who, I must say, was the only one who seemed to be really in grief. He was called "Old Dan."

Dinner was in the large dining-room, which, I recollect, had a large folding-screen near the door, all over the most diverting caricatures. The meal began in a rather ghostly manner, though the guests sat down with alacrity, and the brave Tom, who had now got quite on the footing of a private relation, declared he could "eat oats like a horse." After the first course, the conversation grew almost cheerful, without any unpleasant reference to the deceased. As I said, "Old Dan" was the only one who seemed to feel the situation, and the man in the beard apologized for his neglect, saying "that these old fellows really revelled in funerals." I noticed that they spoke with infinite zest and satisfaction "of the way Lord Loveland had behaved," "such a friendly, considerate note," and who was going to post ten miles in the morning to attend the ceremony. That "stuck-up fellow, Sir John," had just behaved as he always did, neither better nor worse : could not leave town, and all that. Many's the bottle he'd had at this house. Not a word of sending his carriage even. The captain said he always thought he had "the soul of a snipe;" and the brave Tom, who seemed to be now raised into an authority, said it seemed to him "damned low." The man with the beard said that was it; he began low and he'd end low. Then in the same enjoyable way, they talked over "Dobbyn," who had "done everything nicely, capitally, and quietly." No fuss, you know. She, poor thing (and they motioned up to the ceiling), was for having Fulkess, of London, down, and doing it in the swell, reckless style, bring down his own men, and all that. ("Folly, folly," said the captain.) Ridiculous. Why, Dobbyn, here, has done it just as well, and for half the money. "I can make my own terms with him." Then they spoke of other arrangements. How well the dean had behaved; he had written in the handsomest way (here his letter was duly read out) to-day; "that their little differences were all buried in the grave, and that he would be glad to pay his last tribute of respect by officiating." "To tell you the truth," said our host, rubbing his hands, "nothing could have fallen out more nicely, for, really, to have that low beast of a Busby grunting out the service would have spoiled everything. It was very, very nice of the dean; it will give quite an air you know."

"I declare it was," said the captain, "delicate and handsome; and it will read well in the papers, — a tip-top fellow like that."

"Indeed," said the other, secretly rubbing his hands under the table, "everything has fallen out in the nicest way."

That night I lay in a vast chamber in a vast bed, with old red chintz curtains, grown quite limp and soft. At one corner I had to raise my voice to address the captain, who was to occupy another vast four-post structure at the other side. He was quite in spirits, for he owned this was one of the best houses for old whiskey in the country. I see him now bent over his portmanteau, laying out his brushes and razors for the morning, and talking pleasantly as he did so. "I wonder how it's going with the poor old boy up stairs?"

Later, when he was getting into bed, he said: "Egad, I'll lose my way here, if I don't take care. Any way, these are roomier quarters than the poor old Buck has got into now. An' God forgive me. Sure, I ought to be in grief, but by and by they'll be coming to measure Uncle Jack. Good night, my boy."

On the next morning I was up early. I heard the rooks, chief mourners, very noisy outside, and stole down. It was a very fine, fresh morning, and I was in delight with the nobleness and grandeur of the place. The solid, vast old trees, the rich demesne, the noble openings, the grand old trunks, the sweet air, the general sense of dignity and magnificence, — all this was new and overpowering to me. No one was abroad save these early rooks, who might have known there was a funeral on foot. Then I got round by the back, towards where the gardens lay, with a high brick wall encircling them. The delight of that early walk I did not soon forget.

By the time I returned it was past eight o'clock, and I saw carriages winding up the avenue already; a crowd of peasants and beggars, for whom the day was a sort of festival, were beginning to be grouped about the door. Inside, it seemed to me, people were always going up and down stairs; but what most excited my curiosity and interest was a florid man, very eager and busy, who was at work in the hall fitting long pieces of crape "on all the gentlemen's hats." The old retainers and Mr. John were equally busy and excited in collecting such of these articles as were absent from rooms up stairs. I noticed the nice anxiety of the florid man that no one should be left out or forgotten, and his evident trouble about two missing ones, which could not "be got, high or low," but now I trace this feeling to a mere natural professional anxiety. He had a box, too, of very clumsily-shaped black gloves, which looked as if they would fit no one, and, no doubt, did not. But for Mr. John the transformation was amazing. He was everywhere; but he had undertaken with delight the office, with assistance, of course, of fitting on every coachman and footman an almost massive white linen scarf and hat-band, of which grotesque gear a perfect pile lay on the hall table. The general alacrity and air of business was surprising. Every moment a carriage drove up, and, after due setting down of the owner, the ceremony of investiture of driver and footman was proceeded with. The guest, I noticed, always entered with a well-meant effort at solemnity on his face, which was quite thrown away on the audience. Every such arrival Mr. Dobbyn surveyed narrowly, or rather his hat, doubtful whether he was down on his list for crape or gloves. The dean's shovel he seized on actually before it was off that dignitary's head.

The host seemed to be always coming down stairs in a reckless way. Would then go off laterally, and after an interval mysteriously come down stairs again. There was a vast breakfast going on in the large dining-room, and every one, after their hats had been taken from them, was motioned in by one of Mr. Dobbyn's men. The solemn faces immediately cleared, and I must say such a hearty meal, such tremendous "cutting and coming again," the captain's phrase, such going to the side table, such hewing there, such crackling sounds of the division of bones and joints, I have never heard since. In the midst of which scene we saw the host flitting in now and again, and surveying us all uneasily. The family doctor and the local clergy and others taking this for a sign of grief, would get rid of their mouthful as hastily as they could, and offer sympathy with a severe wring of the hand, and a "My dear friend," which I heard the host answer in the same mechanical way, with a "Ah, yes!" Then his eye wandered round again: "Is Lord Loveland in here?"

At last there was a great slow crunching on the gravel. We all looked up, and we all knew by an instinct that this was the fatal vehicle, which comes to the door of most of us, and gives us a ride in state at least once. From the window we could not see it, but we could note all faces turned in one direction. At the same moment my Lord must have driven up and the sounds of wheels became mingled; for the host was entering eagerly, with a sort of ship's figure-head, whom he held by the hand, to whom he was saying in a low voice, "Really, my Lord, so kind, I shall never forget it." Every one, I saw, the country doctors, the clergy, had a sort of instinct to rise up and bow in homage; at least every one moved on their chairs uneasily, as if that was the first prompting. His Lordship would take nothing. O dear no, he said, except indeed a little he describes it as a heavy powder of the color of saffron, glittering like rather coarse-grained glass.

Leibnitz and Spinoza! strange names to bring into connection with this science of the superstitious. Yet Bacon of Verulam did not disbelieve in alchemy, though to him we are first indebted for the excellent application of the old fable of the dying man's will and the field to be dug over in search of the treasure which never existed save in the fertilizing process of culture. Robert Boyle is also cited as having faith in its pretensions. The last professed adept in England was one James Price, who, in 1782, announced himself the possessor of a tincture which could change from thirty to sixty times its weight into gold.

Semler, the well-known theological Professor at Halle in the last century was a votary of alchemy. The story of his performances before the incredulous chemist, Klaproth, may be given as illustrative of the trickery of which experimenters were oftentimes the dupes, and by means of which at least as often, though not in this case, they established their pretensions. In the year 1786 Dr. Semler and one Baron von Hirschen occupied themselves with preparing a Universal Medicine, called by them "Luft Salz," atmospheric salts. Three treatises on "Hermetic Medicine" were composed in relation to it by Semler, and he went beyond the original pretensions of the medicine, asserting that gold could be made by means of it in well-warmed glasses, without the intervention of crucible or coals. He got into a lively discussion with the leading chemists of the day, and at last submitted to Klaproth, for his own use, a mass of metal which he said contained the seeds of gold. To Klaproth's ill-success in making these "seeds" germinate, Semler could only reply that he found a residuum of gold in his glasses every five or six days. On close examination it was discovered that a trick had been played upon him. Some subordinates to whom he had intrusted the task of warming his glasses had contrived to insert a small quantity of gold leaf. It was worth their while, as the sanguine philosopher kept them well fed and lodged. At last, however, they tried the substitution of baser material, pinchbeck, and this led to their detection.

Father Kircher openly challenged the belief in alchemy in his Subterranean World, published about 1670. He did not scruple to call the alchemists knaves and impostors, and their science a delusion. Great was the storm he drew down upon himself thereby. Dr. Glauber of the "salts" was one of his antagonists. A still more elaborate refutation was that made by M. Geoffroy before the Royal Academy of Sciences at Paris, in 1722, wherein he was at the pains to show the various modes of trickery by which alchemical pretensions were sustained: false-bottomed crucibles, hollow wands filled with gold, perforated lead, soldered nails, &c. By degrees the credit of the science hopelessly declined, although daring impostors shot like meteors ever and anon athwart the sober pathway of modern life. Thus Louis XIII. of France made a Franciscan monk named Châtaine his grand almoner because he had held before him the prospect of a hundred years' reign by means of the grand elixir. Thus Jean de Lisle expiated by an early death in the Bastille his bold attempts to persuade the Ministers of Louis XIV. that he possessed the gold-making stone; and thus the adventures of the Count de St. Germain, and of Cagliostro, rested mainly on their claims to the possession of the talisman either of long life or of unbounded wealth.

As we said at the outset of our article, the publication of Lavoisier's system was the real death-blow to the study of alchemy, by pointing out the veritable objects and achievements of chemical induction, and the road by which further progress was to be accomplished.

The hopeless gyrations of the baffled science, ever circling back to its first beginning, and making no advance in its gains and experiences, did, at last, after many busy ages, cease to attract intelligent minds. While we review its promises and its destinies, how profound a human pathos seems to attach to those stately words of Paracelsus, which, doubtless, comforted the heart of many a patient plodder over air-drawn inferences: "Refuse not the waters of Shiloah because they go softly; for they that would be in deep waters cannot go fast."

Isaac Disraeli, in more than one of his delightful miscellanies, quotes the prophecy of Dr. Girtanner, of Leipsic, not far from our own times, who pre-saged that in the course of the nineteenth century the mystery of gold-making would surely be discovered, and the commonest utensils of cookery would come to be made of the precious metal, whereby all evils of metal-poisoning through the use of corroded vessels would be averted. The nineteenth century is far advanced on its downward slope, and it cannot be said that as yet any symptoms appear of the realization of such visions. The stone is still to seek, if it be worth the seeking; the alkahest, the universal dissolver remains a myth; the crucible yields no treasure; but in one way the "eternal hope" has had an answer; for, within the last thirty years, the shining prize has learnt to yield itself up at man's call, with a fulness far surpassing the harvests of Spagiric fable, when sought by spade and mattock in its native ores.

LITERARY VIRTUE.

WE stay in a room till it is like an oven. Yet it is only unpleasantly warm to the lazybones who for the last hour and a half has been sitting, novel in hand, over the fire. The person who complains of being stifed is the chance visitor who pops into the burning furnace just after having come in from a walk. Of course we express surprise, throw open door or window, and feel a trifle ashamed of ourselves. But we are glad to have been told a wholesome truth.

We drag on a humdrum sort of existence, week after week, month after month, year after year, settle down into divers habits more or less reprehensible, and flatter ourselves all the while that, if not perfect, we are at least steady church-goers, and respectable fathers of families. One day we are pulled up short, we are thrown forward on our faces, we meet with a sort of moral railway accident, and find to our dismay and astonishment that we have become, as it were, encrusted with barnacles, that we have got into a way of doing all sorts of naughty things sheerly from the cumulative force of habit; that while we ourselves are no better than we need be, the world in general, whatever it may think of itself, is almost beyond the pale of redemption. For ten minutes or so, we are terribly shocked, our toast remains on the plate untouched, we forget our second cup of tea, and set out to our day's work with a heavy heart. But by and by we begin "to feel ourselves" again, perhaps a trifle livelier and brisker than we were before, and we fancy, somehow or another, that the shock we have lately experienced was the very thing we wanted; in course of time, too, we so far resemble a man who has found out the benefit of a shower-bath, though the first taste of the remedy was by no means agreeable, as really to look forward with rather pleasurable anticipations to a repetition of the dose. There is such a thing as an acquired taste. A moral rebuff braces up the soul; sweets without bitters cloy; harmony without discords is apt to prove monotonous; our morning paper without its column and a half of literary virtue is cold meat without pickles, salad without the dressing.

It has long been a matter of anxious speculation to us, who can be the author of the tremendous phillipics by which we are so powerfully, and, on the whole, not unpleasantly, thrilled over our bacon and eggs. We never for an instant supposed that any ordinary mortal could provide such stern and splendidly virtuous declamation. We have pictured to ourselves a holy and venerable being, a man of fasting and prayer, of cowl and sandal, piercing eyes and long, gray beard, who, spending his days in acts of self-denial, and in mortification of the flesh, his nights in vigil and the profoundest meditation, held himself disdainfully aloof from his species, only from time to time descending into this commonplace world of ours just to see how things were going, and to lash offenders with an unsparing hand, who derived a scanty subsistence from the herbs that clustered around his lowly grasp, and who, proof equally against the fleshpots and the gold and raiment of the Egyptians, was utterly incapable of striking a good bargain, still less of arranging to supply, on advantageous terms, sham scorn and artistically elaborated indignation, on demand at so much per column. Perhaps we have had reason of late to alter our opinion, — perhaps not. Certainly the other day, when passing down Fleet Street, we saw a middle-aged man in a greasy hat and badly brushed coat, but that he was — no, we cling to our original conviction, let acquaintances who move in literary circles and seem fond of practical jokes, say what they please.

Being an abstraction, a "we" of a virtuous turn of mind, with a lively faith in the villany of our neighbors, and being not wholly reluctant to see society's shoulders bared and submitted to a round three dozen, feeling, moreover, that a little penance even nearer home is, if submitted to with a good grace, at least, a refreshing stimulant, we have put private considerations aside altogether, we have waded, regardless of personal suffering, through a very torrent of scalding reproaches, and are now enabled through the courtesy of the editor of the St. James's Magazine to present mankind in general with the result of our observations.

In the first place, a mere hint is enough to call forth the strictness, ay, the thunder of our prophet. A paragraph to fill up a column, a not very startling item of news from the police-court, a squabble between a couple of navvies, a row at the Alhambra, a runaway horse in Rotten Row, a turbulent vestry meeting, and "black as the whirlwinds of the north" out bursts the hurricane sometimes to abate not for several days. The principal fact to be noted is that it never does much damage, neither does it often result in perceptible good. A fair amount of dust is swept into corners, but in the corners it remains. You are perfectly bewildered by the hubbub, but once let it pass and the world will look pretty much as it did before. To be sure, the first fury of the hurricane is disquieting to the inexperienced, but, in course of time, you will regard its periodical occurrence with indifference if not amusement. You will have found out that there is nothing to be afraid of, and it is a good joke to see the alarm of one's friends caught in the storm. It may be our turn next, but a boy at school always enjoys seeing another boy whipped.

It is a second noteworthy fact that in a newspaper or a weekly review the literary virtue is always considerably overdone. It is really too good, and after a while, extraordinary merit of a certain kind is apt to rouse suspicion. The wrath and the pathos are both so dramatic in their intensity that you cannot help fancying the writer has his tongue in his cheek. Like Major de Boots in the play, you are overcome by your emotions, but by tears one moment, and laughter the next. By and by, however, you find out the fun of the thing and grin responsively, though the female members of your family, who are not yet up to the joke, still take all that is written in good earnest.

Your Cato of the penny press is a great hand at nudges and hints. He tells his story, as it were, by innuendo. He does not say anything in so many words, but he does better, — he suggests, and suggestions are often worth more than the sober truth in the background. You have a rough sketch given you; you may fill it up for yourself, and in the way you like best. The plan has its advantages, especially to persons of a lively imagination. You know something naughty has been done, but you are not sure what. Well, you must sit down and work out the puzzle; you must exercise your wits; the thing wanted is your notion of naughtiness. Come, now, have a try, don't be ashamed.

Ah, very creditable for a first attempt; and now we are bound in fairness to tell you that the actual occurrence was nothing so very remarkable; so, clearly, you are the gainer. Your faculty of imagination has been called into play, and the person you have to thank for giving it exercise is the ingenious scamp who was far too goody to say outright what he meant, but who walked his subject round and round, and dropped a word here, and threw in a wink there, and mouthed and looked mysterious as if the game in the bush were not to be made light of, and ended by suggesting a good many nasty ideas on a topic that, after all, had better have been passed over in silence. Unless you are a very green hand indeed, you can see that all the noble wrath, the manly tears, the scathing sarcasm, the coy reticence, are part and parcel of an elaborate sham, are mere stage tricks, or, to change the image, a cleverly contrived frame, an artistic background, to throw the principal theme of the picture the more prominently forward.

Real pity is unostentatious, real sympathy is not expressed in terms affectedly simple and theatrically gushing at the same time; indignation hurled at the system, usually, if sincere, is united with a deep regret for the individual; horror at existing evils cannot, as does the "property" sentiments of the literary hack, walk hand in hand with a propensity to play the buffoon, to make the poor, flouted, heart-broken victim of folly and of man's vice the theme of a sarcastic bit of description, of an unfeeling sneer. But literary virtue is a mask that frowns on one side and grins hideously on the other; the goodness called forth by a reference to your banker wells up with a sort of after-dinner profusion, and is about as sincere and convincing as the mandlin rants of a drunkard.

One word more. The Censor at a given rate per column is less the surgeon, cruel only to be kind, than the hangman with the cat-o'-nine-tails.

In literature of the highly virtuous class, it is to be remarked that we hear a good deal of fraudulent bankers, vicious young noblemen, intolerant clergymen, and grinding capitalists; but we have not yet encountered the hack writer who lets out his conscience on hire, and the publisher who does not mind shaving the wind, and who would not stick at a base act if there were a chance of making it pay. May we trust that such beings have no existence? and yet in that case how shall we account for the flourishing condition of certain professedly, but only professedly, high-minded periodicals that have gained an unenviable reputation for malicious humor and scurrility?

To a writer who really wants a text for a sermon pitched in a high key, stern, pathetic, scathing, and prurient at the same time, there are no topics like "Our Music Halls" and "the condition of our streets after dark." Can we wonder, then, that both these subjects are periodically brought up for consideration,—for a consideration, by the by, that makes certain papers for a day or two at a stretch unfit for admission into decent families.

Lashvice is in his glory when he has to review a fast novel or a new burlesque; he can get some sport, too, out of a gallery of French paintings. He has read the book through most carefully, and is shocked beyond measure. The public must be put on its guard. How can this be done better than by giving many and full quotations? Here is something really abominable, something wholly unfit for publication; very well, then, read it out distinctly. Here is a work mischievous to a degree, full of the poison of asps, not to be perused without a blush; very well, then, publish the name of it, cry aloud upon the housetop that it is to be obtained for such a price at such a place, pick out the most recherché morsels, and lay them before the reader, and assuredly the cause of virtue will benefit much by your advocacy. But perhaps the critic wants to damage the sale of the book; very well, then, he has only to add a few extra quotations, as assuredly he will do, and, after reading his article, no one will be under any necessity to refer to the original volume.

But even if the work be comparatively, or quite innocent, a clever manipulator will succeed in turning it to profitable account. If the author have not said anything wrong, no one can very well prove that he may not have insinuated evil. Let him, then, be dealt with accordingly. You cannot lay your finger on any particular passage as objectionable, but the general tone of the book,—ah, it is that which stirs your wrath. Of course you must explain your meaning, you must show why you have arrived at a very unwelcome conclusion; you must exhibit the groundwork of your faith, and if you do all this as you ought to, you will be able to amuse your subscribers, in a low way, considerably. A nudge of the elbow, a wink, and a smirk, often beat words out of the field. Insinuations are what is wanted; to say just what you mean, and no more, would neither be sufficiently prudish nor likely to answer your purpose. Yes, the author has not committed himself, but a loosely worded sentence, a delicate situation, one or two hasty expressions, have served you as a text of a discourse unequalled for sly nastiness. Pull a long face, Mr. Hypocrite, throw in a text or two of Scripture, give point to your scandal by sanctimonious phrases, and the pit will be delighted; after the farce is over it will call upon you to repeat the performance.

An author sometimes from very purity and innocence of heart trenches on dangerous ground, then you have a fine chance, you can point out what he really does mean; you can open the eyes of the public, and dabble in implied naughtiness to your heart's content; you can be Tartuffe and Satyr in one; you can serve up the most piquant little dish in the world at the expense of a writer who has neither said nor insinuated anything in the least degree vicious, and you can send your admirers away with the reflection that, after all, for combined prudery and nastiness, there is nothing like a virtuous leader, or an indignant critique, in their pet Morning Harpy.

But the latest burlesque. Ah, that is game worth the powder. We have seen it ourselves, have we not, friend? and without its striking us as anything very atrocious. But then we are unregenerate beings; we could afford to be merely amused. We had a good laugh, saw some pretty faces, and showy, glittering dresses; we admired the scenery, actually applauded one or two of the liveliest and funniest songs, and left the theatre feeling that we had not laid out our money in vain. But it is in anything but an equally flippant and uncensorious spirit that our Cato of the press goes to the play. Perhaps a long course of sweets has disagreed with him; anyhow, he is in a terribly bad humor, flourishes his bladder of peas right and left, falls foul of friends and foes alike, sees everything through the distorted medium of his own vicious fancy, and takes paper and pen in hand to assure the public that the "coarseness of many of the jokes, the scantiness of the dresses, the unabashed impudence of the miserable painted dolls who degrade the name of actress," &c.; but really we have given a sufficient taste of his quality. He can see unrestrained profligacy where ordinary mortals can only perceive innocent if rather boisterous fun; he can see the wanton smile where ordinary folk can only remark the stereotyped grin of the ballet-dancer; he can see deliberate wickedness, elaborate indecency, where the world in general notice nothing but a dance rather merrier and less tedious than stage dances were some twenty years ago. But your Lashvice is a rare man for looking through a millstone; sin is the article required, and, real or imaginary, he must have it; for the good of his trade, he cannot be disappointed of his hangman's fees, he must keep his hand in, and if there be no prisoners to flog, he must castigate the whipping-post. He is a great authority on Nautch girls, a class of beings with whom polite society in general has not much acquaintance. But whenever a new burlesque appears, he invariably discovers as the result of a long and varied experience that the conduct of the leading actresses is quite on a par with that of the poor creatures to whom we have alluded. French operetta and English extravaganza, if productive of no other satisfactory result, at least help to supply some of the largest daily papers in the world with themes for sham moral articles. Let the viciousness of the stage then flourish till time be merged in eternity, till even the cheap newspaper press be wanted no more.

A grand form of literary virtue is to pretend an excess of zeal for the commonwealth, and to startle the public with scandalous allusions to the private life of those who, by the very elevation of their position, are debarred from retaliating or giving the lie to their cowardly accuser. A column of prose or a column of verse relying upon calumny for its attraction, is wedded to a tawdry engraving that appeals to the least manly feelings of an ignorant and credulous mob. To regulate the conduct of the highest personage in the land is a task that seems of late to have been arrogated by so-called comic journals without sense of shame, and which are ready to sacrifice the last shred of decency to keep their heads above water a few months longer.

Not many weeks ago a paper that gives itself great airs on the score of superior virtue took occasion to thrill its readers with a sternly wrathful, a most suggestive, a thoroughly spicy "leader," in re a certain correspondence of a disgusting kind that had lately figured in the columns of a not very famous ladies' magazine. The proprietor of the latter publication, being a man wise in his generation, took the hint. For a week or two afterwards, Cato the Censor constituted himself an advertising medium for the very work that he had been at such pains to condemn, and from which, decidedly, a rich treat was to be apprehended by all who have a penchant for luscious filth, and who can smack their lips over carrion.

There is a very objectionable form of literary virtue that takes the guise of spotless, infantile innocence. It is without guile; it is as blind as a bat. It gives every man, whatever his known character, credit for the best intentions. It is so very, very good, so suspiciously obtuse, that it cannot see evil, though, like Apollyon, it stride across the footway and glare in the traveller's face. It throws a coulour de rose over everything questionable; it is not plain-spoken, like Sir Roger de Coverley on his famous visit to Vauxhall; but when describing a place of vicious repute, it lays particular stress on the nightingales, and conveniently ignores more sophisticated features of the establishment. It looks on the surface, and on the surface only; it is no part of its policy to keep behind the scenes; immediate and not remote consequences are the ones with which it concerns itself, and when a public rendezvous has incurred a storm of disapprobation, it goes there in the quality of a self-elected special commissioner, and finds everything just as it should be. One advantage of this sort of virtue is that it enables a shrewd editor to make his paper attractive by means of quite harmless articles with sensational headings. Who can resist buying a weekly journal of literature and review of the fine arts, when such titles as "Sunday Evenings at Cremorne," "The Nymphs of the Alhambra," are printed on the bills of contents?

Literary goodness of the above baby-faced kind

is very amusing in connection with some new work that has roused the bile of straight-laced critics, — say a volume of poetry by a gentleman whose treatment of the amatory passion is far more analytical than edifying. The work has been spoken of as unsuited to family reading, and as having been suggested by long and diligent study of the Holywell Street Press. Does sweet unblushing because verdant innocence join in the hue and cry? By no means. She has read the work through from beginning to end, and has not been shocked in the least. On the contrary she has been very much amused. She tells you that she is quite astounded at the decision of the critics, that without doubt, private malice, or absurd fastidiousness, or gross ignorance, or a malignant prejudice against young and rising, though perhaps somewhat skittish genius is at the bottom of the verdict. She hints, with just a momentary drawing aside of the mask, with a flash, and no more, of the cloven foot, that any versifier who fancies himself a clever fellow has a perfect right, if he thinks proper, to exercise it, of emptying his drains into the river of decent literature; but then she goes on to prove that the author in question, though he would have been fully justified in shocking the prejudices, to say the least, of all respectable readers, has yet considerably forborne from doing so, that the verses represented as naughty are quite harmless, and that Apollo the racy has been treated with great unfairness, and has good cause to complain of the obtuseness of his critics. Then come quotations, not very shocking, though a trifle obscure. Now is this so bad? asks Delilah; and you are constrained to answer No. But the wily apologist knows her game; she has not really quoted the unquotable; what she represents as specimens of the very bad indeed really are no more than specimens of the author in his milder mood.

We shall not do more than allude to the literary virtue that deals in scandalous and lying publications relative to mysteries of convent life, and the secrets of the confessional, professedly with the purpose of putting pure-minded Protestant girls on their guard.

Neither shall we linger over that form of goodness which condemns literature in the mass as sinful, and is especially hard on novels, merely because it publishes largely on its own account, and by elbowing competitors out of the market, can secure a highly remunerative sale for twaddle among select congregations.

There is the vile and ridiculous cant of certain so-called religious miscellanies, as a specimen of which we may quote a story that we read not long ago, intended to illustrate the pernicious effects consequent upon a taste for fiction. A young man of exemplary habits developed into a notorious evil-doer and an habitual drunkard. When questioned by a gullible individual as to the causes of his falling away, he replied with an air of remorse that his sins were all owing to his having in early life yielded to a temptation to read a novel written by whom would the reader guess? Paul de Kock, Eugene Sue, Dumas the younger? O, dear, no; but by the virtuous and exemplary Sir Walter Scott!

A singular form of literary virtue is displayed in the perverted notions of right and wrong, of duty and honor, of love and purity, entertained by the heroes and heroines of certain young ladies' novels. But this topic, tempting though it be, is one to which we have neither time nor space in which to do justice at present. It is to be remarked in

ROBERT'S CAPITAL HIT.

I.

My mother-in-law and I were sitting in her best parlor, — not that it was much to boast of, but she thought a great deal about it, and covered it up with anti-macassars to that extent, that nothing short of collecting them in a bundle, and burning them out of hand, would ever have got them effectually off my mind. We were not sitting in the best parlor for our own comfort, or because the windows opened upon a little garden, which, though dreadfully prim and formal, could not help being fragrant in that beautiful month of May, and which would have had the afternoon sun shining on it just now, in a perfectly delightful manner, but that my mother-in-law, in the interests of her drab and yellow Brussels carpet, had hastened to pull down the dark yellow holland blinds. We were not even sitting in the best parlor because we were expecting visitors. I should not have objected to that, for all our visitors entertained the best parlor superstition also; and we should have been "despicable," like Harvey Birch, if they had ever got a glimpse of our ordinary occupations, or seen any more lively literature about than Johnson's "Lives," Baxter's "Saints' Rest," Hannah More passim, and the county history. We were sitting in the best parlor for its good, not our pleasure or dignity, — "to air the room," as my mother-in-law said. "Fires are occasionally necessary, of course," she would say; "but they don't do altogether. People should always sit in their best parlor once a month or so, to take the chill off." Whence she derived this notion, I do not know; but she entertained it, and stuck to it, and in the best parlor on this particular day we were sitting, "to take the chill off."

My mother-in-law was a good-looking woman for her age, which was fifty-five. She was tall, strongly built, and terribly healthy. She had a great deal of very heavy gray hair, which she wore in deep bands, like watch-pockets, upon her forehead; and she never deviated from one kind of cap, severe in form, and laden with lutestring ribbon of a harsh dull shade of purple.

She was always well dressed, in a certain tasteless fashion which she considered the only mode proper to women at her age, not to be departed from without a compromise of propriety, not to say morality: and a more self-sufficient woman than my mother-in-law never existed. Women more ignorant, no doubt, there have been, and are; but I hope not many who prize and pet general ignorance as she did, and are so arrogantly vain of their possession of certain specialities of knowledge. I do not want to make her out at all more disagreeable than she was, or to deny her the good qualities which she possessed; nor am I "down on her" for that generally conclusive and satisfactory reason that she was my mother-in-law. I speak quite fairly; and, indeed, I need not complain, for she liked me quite as well as she liked Robert. Robert was (and is) my husband, Robert Heron, of the firm of Shaw and Heron, solicitors, said by their friends to be "rising" young men, but who certainly had not done anything remarkable as yet, in an upward direction.

"Though I say it who ought not," is a customary deprecatory phrase when one member of a family praises another; but I never could see the meaning of it. Who is so likely to know the good that is in any individual as those nearest to him, and who see most of his life? Who, then, has the best right to announce the results of that contiguity and supervision? Society permits people's relatives to abuse them, does it not? It is not in the least shocked at that, is it? Very well, then, I am not going to be bullied and put down by society for praising my husband; and I maintain, on the contrary, that no one has so much right as I to declare that Robert was (and is) the best of men, and a very fine-looking one also. I do not see much change in him now. His beautiful blue eyes are not so bright, perhaps; but they are just as deep and as soft, and they have just the same look for me in them; and I don't think his being slightly bald is any defect at all. Every one admits that baldness is intellectual. I distinctly remember a hairdresser, a really clever man, who knew at a glance that I never used pomatum, telling me it was caused by the activity of the brain.

This was most true in Robert's case, I am sure. However, he really had almost too much hair at the time I am telling about, — beautiful, dark brown, curly; and as it was not the fashion then to crop the hair until the skull showed through in patches, and all the bumps asserted themselves unpleasantly, but it was worn rather long, I assure you he had quite a captivatingly sentimental look; and as he had rather low spirits naturally, many people suspected him of being poetical, — I mean, of actually writing verses. But this was a mistake. He never did. Of course, he could have written beautiful poetry, — if you could only know the things he has said to me in that very identical best parlor! — if he had liked, but he never did. I am wandering away from my mother-in-law all this time. I know I am apt to get tiresome when I begin to talk about Robert; but I will endeavor to avoid it. I will merely say that he was very good, and very handsome, and very clever; and that if any woman of my acquaintance says she has a better husband, I can afford to let her say it, for I don't believe her.

Robert and my mother-in-law did not get on together very well. Strange to say, he was not her favorite son; and John, who was always quite uninteresting to me, was. But John was a prosperous man, and remarkably like her in his ways and ideas; while Robert had not the knack of getting on rapidly, and did not in the least resemble her. He was considered to be a striking likeness of his father, the late Mr. Heron, whom I believe to have been a thoroughly good and estimable man, but whose memory was not warmly cherished by his widow and her eldest son. He had not left them as much money as they expected. He had been rather unfortunate for some time before his death, and that was held to be a perfectly sufficient reason for that event being regarded with resignation. John was married to a woman with a large fortune (for people in our position), with an imperial nose, a mouth like a shark's, big feet, and such a temper! Robert used to say he would not have married Mary Anne Barton for a million of money. John, however, had done it much cheaper than that, and I really do not think he ever knew how disagreeable she was. He was afraid of her; and it was just as well. There are many men for whom it is very good that they should be afraid of their wives. John was one of them. But it was very singular that our joint mother-in-law was also afraid of "Mrs. John" (nobody ever called her Mary Anne), and was accustomed to speak of her as "fine" as to her physique, and "superior" as to her intellect. I did not mind. If Mrs. John was a "fine" woman, give me insignificance; if she was "superior," give me mediocrity. Robert was quite of my opinion, and Mrs. John knew it. She had a mighty contempt for me; first, because I am small and pale, while she is of stately stature, and has the kind of complexion which people describe as "a great deal of color"; secondly, because I am of a contented disposition, and do not form any visions about Shaw and Heron attaining "the top of the tree"; thirdly, because I am afraid of all servants; and, lastly, because I did not bring Robert more hundreds than she brought John thousands of pounds. All very sound reasons for despising me, and I should not think of disputing them; but Mrs. John imparted them to my mother-in-law, who adopted them, and that was not pleasant.

My mother-in-law lived at Clapham, and looked like it. I don't mean like the dwellers at the Clapham of the present, with its enormous railway "junction," with ever so many hundreds of trains a day running through it, — no two authorities agree about the number, — its unlimited resources of bewilderment for the unaccustomed traveller, its handsome shops, and its alarmingly Catholic features and institutions. I allude to the Clapham of the past, when the highly respectable chocolate-colored omnibuses, which fared soberly to and from the Plough Inn, were the sole mode of conveyance for the vulgar; when the grave houses in their solemn gardens looked out upon the severe solitude of the common, and heavily laden wagons stopped on the other side, that the big lumpy horses might drink at ungainly wooden troughs, curiously inspected the while by cheerful vagrant dogs who had never heard of Mayne or muzzles. I speak of a time when you might as well have looked for a mosque as for a music-hall at Clapham, and when, judging by appearances, the higher branches of commerce in that suburb were confined to Berlin wool and baskets; when Wilberforce was remembered as a local tradition, and there were green fields out Stockwell-way. It is not very long ago either, a much shorter time than any one would believe, who has not seen the wonderful changes which a few years have worked in London; but the Clapham people of that date had looks and ways peculiar to themselves, a grim respectability, a weekly-bill-paying-with-inflexible-regularity, and comfortable-investment-in-government-securities expression in their faces, raiment, and residences, which was exceedingly depressing to the outside world of strugglers, contemptible people, who did not always know the exact amount of their resources, and were sometimes uncomfortably uncertain about how they were to be "realized." Of the former class, though not "in the very first line" of it, was my mother-in-law. She was not by any means a rich woman, even for a period which rated wealth by a much more moderate standard than that of the present; but she was "well to do," and she looked it. Security, not of the barrel-of-flour and cruse-of-oil order, but of that more satisfactory to the modern mind, which expresses itself by dividends, a happy absence of sympathy with anything so weak and stupid as anxiety and poverty, and the calm consciousness of being a good manager, were the characteristics which my mother-in-law's appearance impressed upon the observer.

I did not like Clapham, and I cannot assign a better reason for disliking it than that my mother-in-law lived there, and I had to live with her. If any of my readers think I could not have a better, I pity them. They, too, have suffered. The necessity for this family arrangement was a sore subject with us all, and especially with Robert, for it could by no means be denied that it had originated through his means. We had begun comfortably enough, much more so, our older and wiser friends told us, than was good for two young people, who had been so imprudent as to think so much of love and so little of money. It would vex me even now, when things are so different with us that I can smile at the recollection of Clapham, and its prim best-parlor gentility, to tell you about our own pretty little house at Hampstead, and all the small devices I had for its adornment, and how very happy we were in it for two whole years, though my mother-in-law always thought it extravagantly kept, and Mrs. John used to sniff at the furniture, and look uncomfortably too large for the rooms.

Mind, I am not prepared to admit that it was a fault, but it certainly was a peculiarity of Robert's that he liked speculation. "A little bit of a venture," as he would call it, with a jocose persuasiveness which took all dangerous meaning out of the word, to my ears. Tales of the celerity with which fortunes had been made, every new method of making them quickly, had interest and attraction for him. I knew this arose from the vividness and versatility of his intelligence, but his mother called it a taste for gambling.

"It's a more decent way of gratifying it, my dear Martha," she said once, when Robert had been just a little unlucky, "than going to those horrible places which I have been told are defiantly called 'hells' by the impious persons who frequent them; but it's quite as dangerous in the long run, as you will find out some day, when he has brought you to ruin with his coal mines and copper mines, and such-like nonsense."

Well, he did not exactly bring me to ruin, but he brought me to something not very far from being as unpleasant, — namely, to giving up our own house, and going to live with his mother. This was the only form in which she would help him; to have done so in any other, she would have held to be "encouraging" him. It was not very easy to bear, I must say; but then to endure it with fortitude was the only way in which I could assist Robert out of the difficulty he had got into, and that was not much for me to do. He had to bear all the brunt of life; it would have ill become me to have objected to my share of the smaller worry, especially as it was my money which he had lost in that unlucky "little bit of a venture," — happily, not quite all, but the greater part of it, — a circumstance which I carefully concealed from my mother-in-law, but which Mrs. John divined by dint of that "superiority" of her intellect, which, so far as I have observed it, mainly exhibits itself in finding out things which people particularly wish to conceal. This divination led to much laudation of the superior wisdom of herself and her friends in the arrangement of her money matters, and exultation in the "settling" of her fortune so securely on herself, that, as she plainly put it, "if John were to turn into as great a fool as Robert to-morrow, she could not come to any harm." And, indeed, I believe the settlements in question were so drawn up, that the deadliest suspicion and animosity might have been supposed, by observers, to have existed between the contracting parties. I was thankful that they said these things to me only, and I used to try and get over them before Robert came home from the City, and generally succeeded in keeping the small annoyances of the day pretty well out of his sight. He found out, however, soon after we went to Clapham, that I was looking rather pale and thin, and would have involved me in a great deal of trouble by making a fuss about it, only that I begged him to remember what a dislike his mother had to delicate people, and how, whenever anybody was suspected of being nervous, she always recommended the administration of something which that unlucky individual especially disliked. So I prevailed on him to take no notice of my paleness and thinness, and promised to grow very fat and rosy in the autumn, when we hoped to be able to escape from Clapham, and get away on a little tour, but only of strictly Cockney dimensions, all by ourselves.

It was not a pleasant life, and there were such anxieties and efforts in it, that I look back to them now with a feeling of wonder at having lived through them so well, on the whole. But I had a little philosophy about me, and though I was not strong-minded or dogmatic in other respects, I had one fixed belief, to which I adhered practically. I held then, when I had a great many troubles, and I hold now, when I have comparatively few, that a woman who has married the man whom she loves and respects with all her heart and conscience, and has never seen the least shadow on the brightness of their mutual love, is not to be pitied for any trouble or struggle which she may be called upon to bear. Every one must have his or her share of the heritage of sorrow; but the woman who is thoroughly, cloudlessly happy as a wife, and does not fully recognize and realize her supreme good fortune, even though it wear the form of unrelieved poverty, must be very ungrateful, and very foolish. I never entertained this belief more strongly than during our Clapham experiences, and, indeed, I found pretty constant occasion to recall my faith, and confirm myself in it.

One trial which recurred not very frequently, but often enough to be irritating, was visiting Mrs. John. She lived at Kingston-on-Thames, and, I am ashamed to say, I never could be brought to appreciate the beauty of the place. All the "villas" had an offensively rich look to me: not that I was envious, but I always think when one is either normally poor, or in incidental difficulties, there is something depressing in the contemplation of comfortably secure, safely growing wealth. Robert could not understand my sentiments on this point, and found in those very "villas" many proofs of the wisdom of "ventures" little and great. This one had come by his villa and all it represented by mines, the other by railways, a third by steamers, a fourth was a well-known contractor, who did the most sporting things, and a fifth was the sharpest man going, and had done wonders on the Stock Exchange, through his happy facility of foreseeing "what they were up to" in continental countries. But I did not like Kingston a bit the more for all that; and not one of the small efforts I had to make continually, cost me so much as the visiting Mrs. John's fine, cold, distressingly new house, where money and patent floorcloth seemed to be always palpably present, and where I never was permitted to forget that Robert had been "so very imprudent," about that Grand Junction Canal business."

My mother-in-law and I invariably went on these formidable excursions in a heavy, lop-sided brougham, which presented a mysterious appearance of having once been a carriage of another and a clumsier form, and having been inartistically compressed and otherwise altered. It had very narrow windows, and slanting cushions, and doors which it was exceedingly difficult to open, and next to impossible to shut. It was drawn by a heavy, ugly, lop-sided horse, with a bare patch on one of his sides; and the driver was the most ill-tempered man I ever saw in my life, even on a coach-box.

This vehicle was an object of extreme aversion to me, chiefly, however, because John paid for the use which we made of it, and no doubt made a very cheap bargain with Mr. Thompson, the livery-stable-keeper. How I used to enjoy my omnibus drives with Robert, when I went into the City to do a little shopping, and when he would become quite animated in describing the kind of carriage he fully intended to keep for me, when one or two little things he had in view should have "turned up trumps!" Robert mixed his metaphors sometimes, it must be confessed, and I did not like to hear him use any expression connected with gambling. It almost sounded as if my mother-in-law might possibly be right. Next to the visits to Mrs. John, I placed our best-parlor days in the category of small inflictions. Whether it was the varnish, the anti-macassars, the influence of art, as exemplified in six awful pictures pervaded by a cerulean tinge and misrepresenting the bay and city of Naples, or the dreary literature which described a kind of cart-wheel pattern on the shiny, inlaid round table, that inspired my mother-in-law to be preternaturally unpleasant on such occasions, or whether it was her self-enforced abstinence from reading the newspaper and mending her stockings (neither occupation being considered suitable to the dignity of the best parlor), I cannot say. The fact was so; and when she aired her best parlor, I aired my best resolutions.

It was afternoon, and I had got on very well so far. I had brought no unbound books, and none but "company" work into the best parlor. I had sat contentedly bolt upright upon an uncomfortable chair, so as to avoid crushing the clean anti-macassar; I had abstained from the use of a footstool adorned gorgeously with a blue worsted parrot, for a similar reason. I had in every respect been as conciliatory as possible; but the time had appeared unusually long, and the moment at which I might put on my bonnet and go to the Plough Inn to meet Robert, — a pleasure I enjoyed every day and in all weathers, — seemed unattainably far off.

I think there is a great deal of varied eloquence in sniffs. The derisive, the contemptuous, the incredulous, the condemnatory, the deprecatory, and the warning sniff, must be familiar, and, I should suppose, aggravating to every one. I never knew such a proficient in the practice of the sniff, in all its varieties, as my mother-in-law; and she had contrived, on this occasion, to run through the whole sniff gamut, until really I felt so nervous and so cross I hardly knew how to bear it. The postman's knock was quite a relief; though my mother-in-law was not a pleasant person about letters, requiring to see at least the outside of every one which came to the house, and putting on an expression, more or less meek, according to her mood, of being aggrieved when she was not made acquainted with their contents. Two letters were brought in, headed to her, and duly inspected by her, and then she pushed one over to me. It was from my sister, who was very chatty and confidential with me about everything, especially about a love-affair of the most imprudent and unpromising kind, being an engagement between herself and a lieutenant of marines, with nothing but his pay at present, and no reasonable expectations for the future.

Nevertheless, I was much interested in this charming idyllic affair, and believed that a little poverty would do Gerty no more harm than it had done me; but I was not at all desirous of introducing the subject to the notice of my mother-in-law. She did not like my family; she included them all under the opprobrious denomination "worldlings"; and some people being kind enough to think Gerty and myself rather pretty, she objected to that opinion, declaring, that we were not her "style." A glance at Gerty's letter showed me it was a long one, so I looked over the first page, and then put it away in my pocket; a proceeding observed and resented by my mother-in-law, who performed a sniff of a novel and wholly exasperating kind, and took up the second letter with a contemptuous smile. "For Robert, I see," she observed; "and very like a prospectus. No doubt it is one. Some mine in the moon, a railway at the bottom of the sea, in which he will do well to invest his large amount of floating capital. Be sure you give it to him, my dear; it would be a pity to deprive him of an opportunity for indulging his taste and improving his circumstances."

My mother-in-law was epigrammatical at times, but only under the influence of spite.

Much nettled by this speech, I broke open the letter in question, a proceeding which produced another sniff of the same kind as before. "Any letters addressed to Robert here, I have his leave to open," I said.

"O, indeed."

The horrid thing was a prospectus; or, perhaps, I should rather say it was a scheme for the formation of a company to work a gold mine in Brazil, situated in the richest district of the gold-bearing country, and which could be purchased, owing to peculiar circumstances, on surprisingly advantageous terms. This communication was not printed or lithographed, but written, in a very plain clerk-like hand, and was headed "Private and Confidential." But I did not think anything of that; lots of things had come to Robert with a similar injunction, which could have no other meaning than that they were to be as public and as little confidential as possible. I gave the open sheet of paper into my mother-in-law's hand, and she eyed it curiously.

"So it is a prospectus," she said; "I thought so. Robert must be pretty well known to have a taste for ruining himself and other people, or they would not be giving him notice of the villainies that are on hand in that place." She always spoke of the City as if it were one vast recognized den of thieves.

"He has not been very fortunate himself," I ventured to observe; "but I don't think Robert has ever injured any other person by his speculations."

"I don't know, I'm sure; but I don't hold with speculation, — I never did. I can't understand why people should n't be content with their own proper business and their lawful gains. Gold mines indeed! Can't they let the places be, in those distant countries, as God Almighty made them? There's been more robbing and murdering since those 'diggings' and mines came up than there ever was in my time before them, I can tell you."

This was a view of the subject with which I could not contend, so I said nothing.

My mother-in-law continued, "And as to getting any good out of speculations without doing other people harm, I don't believe a word of it. All the profits which go into one set of pockets must come out of another set, you know; there's no getting over that, you know; and for my part, I don't consider it honest."

I felt uncomfortable, though I confess I had generally little respect for my mother-in-law's opinions, and less for her reasons; but I had said something not unlike this to Robert on one occasion myself, and he had taken, somewhat ineffectually, a good deal of trouble to make me understand that there are speculations, and speculations; some to which the argument, that one could gain only by another's loss, applies but too clearly, and others by which all concerned may make legitimate profit, as, for instance, in this very case of a gold mine. I did try to plead the difference, but in vain; I produced no effect upon my mother-in-law beyond inducing her to declare, more emphatically than before, that she "did not hold with speculations," and that they were "all villany together." She concluded by prophesying that Robert would never stop until he had brought himself and me to the workhouse, and that then he would be satisfied. Which seemed improbable.

It was not Robert's time yet; but I was so tired, this best-parlor day had been so more than usually trying, that I pretended to mistake the hour, and set off to meet my husband. After a long desultory stroll, I saw the familiar chocolate-colored omnibus nearing the Plough, and stood still at the corner as usual, while Robert descended from the sober vehicle, and joined me. Robert has a very sweet and sensible expression of countenance, but it is not gay, — no, certainly not gay, — mildly cheerful, perhaps, which I like (how I detest a simper or a grin, the usual expression of people "blessed with high spirits!"); but to-day, he had a decided smile in his eyes and on his lips, as he tucked my arm under his, and walked away with me.

"Martha, my darling!" said he, "I have a bit of good news for you."

"Have you, Robert?" said I. "What is it about?"

"It is about a gold mine," replied my husband.

MY FIRST MONEY.

It was a sixpence! New, clean, and shiny, bearing upon it the image and superscription of our queen: Victoria, D. G., Britanniarum, &c., just like other sixpences, but so white, so glossy, and so well-struck, that no other sixpence on earth could have borne comparison with it.

This was not a fact open to question. I had already classed it among the articles of my belief, when taking the "sixpence" delicately between my fingers I laid it tenderly upon my bed, and then knelt down on the floor in order to have a better view of it. This was my first adoration of Mammon, my first worship of the golden — or, to speak by the card, the silver — calf. I was five years old; the sixpence was four years and a half my junior. Four years and a half! This was a great deal, the advantage of age was manifestly on my side, and this, I suspect, had not a little to do with the semi-patronizing glances which, notwithstanding my immense veneration for this idolized sixpence, I occasionally ventured to throw upon it. For I should not, I feel, have gazed thus at an elder sixpence. An octogenarian coin, for instance, would have impressed me with a certain degree of awe. It might have been round the world in the breeches-pocket of Captain Cook, it might have witnessed Trafalgar from the waistcoat of Lord Nelson, it might have passed through the hard fingers of the Iron Duke. A sixpence of that sort could not have been viewed with flippancy. No, it was better to have a young and inexperienced sixpence, a sixpence with all its troubles before it, like a youthful bear. It and I were more on a footing of equality; there was no need for me to stand upon ceremony with it, and I could freely give vent to my sentiments in its presence without transgressing the laws of propriety. There was no fear of its looking sourly at me, as much as to say, "You little simpleton, it is lamentable for a coin like me to fall into such ill-bred hands as yours. Nor Burke, nor Sheridan, nor Charles James Fox, all of whom I knew most intimately, ever grinned at me as you do; and the young William Pitt (to whom I was introduced by his illustrious father, the Earl of Chatham) never laughed at me."

That was the great advantage of a young sixpence, it being so fresh to the ways of society. There was no danger of its having learned its manners from the Prince Regent, or modelled its demeanor upon that of Lord Castlereagh. It could afford to be indulgent if I chuckled too loud, and could make allowances, if, in the jubilant pride of possession, I rubbed my hands too ecstasically. Besides, considering the matter from a more material point of view, a young sixpence was larger, brighter, heavier, than an old one; there seemed to be more of it; there were no disgraceful patches of black about it, such as spoke of a sojourn in a dust-bin, in the till of a rag-shop, or in the purse of an economical sweep. The features of the queen upon it were not disfigured by scars, crosses, or knife-marks to prove that its former possessors suspected the honesty of their familiars, and were obliged for prudence' sake to mark their coins. It had no unseemly holes bored in it, and no Hebrew had sweated it to the thinness of a bit of tin. It had everything in its favor, — beauty, youth, distinction, and novelty. For you must remember it was my first sixpence, the first coin upon which I had ever gazed as my own, the first money of which I had ever had the free disposal. True, a few specimens of the currency had occasionally passed through my hands, in the shape of fugitive halfpence; but as my mother had always requested me to put these into the poor-box, I could scarcely be said to have had the full enjoyment of them. Hence this money was indeed my first, and, O Plutus! the gold mines of Peru, made over to me by bond, duly signed and sealed, would have delighted me less than this sixpence.

It was my father who had given it me, and under memorable circumstances. He had been a long while involved in one of those suits in Chancery, which are the triumphs of our legislation. Seven-and-twenty years had it lasted, but at the end of that time, by a happy dispensation of Providence, he had been so fortunate as to gain his cause. Lawyers, solicitors, and barristers had, however, been to work so merrily that, all costs and expenses paid, there was left of the estate which formed the bone of contention the exact sum of five pounds ten shillings and twopence. Three letters and a consultation from our family solicitor, informing us of this edifying result, swallowed up the five pounds of this total, and the conscientious member of Lincoln's Inn then scrupulously forwarded to us the remaining ten shillings and twopence, merely deducting therefrom six and eight-pence, price of the envelope in which the residue was enclosed.

My father hereupon ranged seven sixpences on our breakfast-table. "My boy," he said, "see what comes of going to law in Great Britain! Your mother has told you that I have won my suit in chancery?"

"Yes, papa."

"Well, then, look! That is all I get of it"; and he pointed grimly at the sixpences.

I opened wide my eyes.

"All that you get of the whole suit!" I echoed, with a puzzled air, firmly convinced that a suit in chancery was composed as other suits are, of a coat, waistcoat, and trousers. "Why, papa, those are only the buttons!"

This deplorable joke had earned me my sixpence. My father had thrown it over to me, laughing, and, like a dog who is pelted with a bone, I had rushed hastily off with it for fear they should think of taking it back again.

SIX . . . PENCE!

For a time anything like cool reflection was impossible. I was too giddy, too startled, to think. How think indeed, when one has sixpence! My sixpence was as a moon of which the rays dazzled me; my head swam, my fingers tingled, my eyes saw whirling through the air in a fantastic gallop several millions of sixpences, all white, all lately issued from the mint, all bearing upon them, like my sixpence, Victoria, D. G., Britanniarum, &c., with her Majesty's head and the royal arms.

At last, however (and happily, too, for I was a small boy, and unused to these emotions), the intensity of my sensations subsided. I grew more philosophical, and after a time was enabled to bring upon the subject that was absorbing me a becoming amount of self-possession. You know, of course, what it was, this subject that was absorbing me? It was the expenditure of my sixpence. Like a Chancellor of the Exchequer with the surplus of a year's budget, I was wondering what I should do with it.

Momentous question! But it needed a refreshing breeze of out-door air to enable me to solve it with coolness. I accordingly rose from my bedside, where I knelt like a Persian worshipping the sun, and having laid my elbows and my sixpence upon the sill of the open window, "multa corde volutans," began deeply to meditate.

Now, it may, perhaps, be accepted as a symptom of my great precocity of spirit that I had not been merged above ten minutes in reflection before I had made up my mind upon one capital point, to wit, that there were only three things upon which my sixpence could worthily be expended, — a donkey, a gold hunting watch, or a pewter squirt.

The only question to decide was upon which of these three my choice should pitch; and here was the rub. I had an artistical admiration for squirts, — pewter squirts especially, — which I classed amongst the sublimest contrivances due to the ingenuity of man. Their use as mediums for the conveyance of ink or soapy water upon the passers-by in the street had always struck me as peculiarly practical, and I think, on the whole, my sixpence would have gone to the purchase of one of these astonishing instruments had not a reflection suddenly fallen upon me, and drenched my enthusiasm as under a bucket of cold water. I could not remember ever having seen a grown-up man make use of a squirt! My father, for instance, had, to my certain knowledge, never spent his morning in squirting ink upon the public through the drawing-room window; and I could not recollect ever having heard my uncles advocate this species of pastime. This was important. Yesterday I had been a boy, and could do boyish things; to-day the case was altered; my sixpence had laid upon me the duties of manhood; it was necessary to be cautious and dignified. . . . I discarded the squirt, and two things then remained, — the donkey and the gold watch. Once more I began to ponder.

The purchase of a donkey, I reasoned, offered unquestionable inducements. There were, first of all, the advantages of locomotion; in the second place, there was the satisfaction of personal vanity, for it was not to be doubted that upon my first appearance in public upon the back of an ass I should become the cynosure of neighboring eyes, and at once take rank amongst the parish celebrities.

This consideration nearly carried my vote by storm; but then, on the other hand, a donkey, I could not but admit, was a less handy possession than a gold hunting watch. The latter would go into one's pocket, whereas the former would not. Indeed, it was more than probable that the donkey would need a certain amount of space to move about in, and if so, what was to be done, for we had no stables? Second thoughts bring counsel. I was a sharp boy, and I remembered the staircase. If the difficulty of bringing the donkey up to the third floor could be once overcome, I should be happy to allow him to sleep in my bedroom; there would be ample space for him in the corner close by the wash-hand-stand; and he would be a sociable companion when it rained. There was no fear of his catching a cold or a cough, as he might do if left down-stairs in the yard. Yes; but how about his food? The postchaise of my thoughts, which was at that moment going twenty miles an hour, here stuck of a sudden in a deep rut. I had never thought of the food. I was like the Irishman who had a clock. I had forgotten the works. I could not think of asking my father to board the donkey. The thing would be indelicate after he had generously given me sixpence; and yet from whatever point of view I considered the matter, the donkey, I was compelled to own, must eat. . . . I became miserable. I think I cried. I saw my donkey depart at a gallop, and scamper away into darkness, carrying away with him upon his back my hopes, my illusions, and my dreams of glory.

But after a few seconds my donkey returned as he had departed, at full gallop. The idea had struck me that his maintenance could be effected by an equitable distribution of my daily meals with him. This was the straw to the drowning man. Having decided that my coming donkey should be nourished upon roast mutton and batter pudding, I was about to rush out to effect my purchase when, attracted by a noise below, I thrust my head out of the window and saw a small boy, aged ten, throwing cherries in the air and trying to catch them in his mouth.

At this sight I forgot, for the minute, the donkey, the roast mutton, and the batter pudding, and considered the cherries. It was a hot day, and I was thirsty. The cherries rose and fell, but always into the small boy's mouth, and never into mine. Like Tantalus with the flow and ebb of waters, I began to find the thing monotonous. If one or two cherries would only have fallen on the ground now and then, the interest would have been enlivened; but no; one, two, three, four, all came down like plummets without deviating an inch from the right course, and each laugh of the small boy (for he was merry) gave me a violent inclination to see his head punched. I don't know what spirit of evil prompted me, but some such spirit inspired me with a baleful desire to substitute for one of the falling cherries a pebble, a piece of coal, or a bit of soap. My eyes sparkled. The youth had thrown a plump bigaroon rather higher than usual, and stood with his hands extended, his head thrown back, his eyes shut, and his mouth gaping until it should return. The temptation was too strong. I felt frantically around me to find a projectile, and in sweeping my hand over the window-sill caught at something which, without pausing to look, I threw with all my might and main at the small boy. The thing struck him in the eye, and then bounded on the pavement. A shout of triumph escaped me; but at the same instant I burst into a cold sweat and staggered. The boy had stooped to pick up the thing that had hit him, and was holding it in his fingers. "Thank you!" he shouted, joyously, and disappeared in the distance.

I had thrown him my sixpence!

OPENING OF THE ALBERT N'YANZA.

It is understood that, influenced no doubt to some extent by the visit of the Prince of Wales, and anxious to do something which shall confirm him in the good opinion of Western nations, the Viceroy of Egypt has invited Sir Samuel Baker to take command of an expedition directed to the suppression of the slave-trade on the Upper Nile, to explore fully and in detail the vast interior reservoir known as the Albert N'yanza, and to bring the hitherto untraversed districts lying around the mysterious head waters of the great river of Egypt within the sphere not only of the viceroy's authority, but also of mercantile operations.

The results of such an expedition are so full of promise to our knowledge of the face of the globe we dwell upon, in its least known and most inaccessible regions, and to the cause of a down-trodden and slave-driven people, that it is impossible not to be stirred up to our innermost heart at the bare idea of such a truly glorious and noble enterprise. It may be termed by some to be a war of annexation, and it may be said that Egypto-Turks, of a faith which tolerates slavery in certain forms, are not precisely the people to occupy Central Africa; but nothing could be worse than the state of the countries which it is proposed to open to civilization; there was no other power that could or would do it, and the boon conveyed to the people themselves is of such vast magnitude as not only to exonerate the means that may have to be used, but to stamp them with the unquestionable seal of a truly philanthropic and humanitarian morality. No man, too, more fitted than Sir Samuel Baker to take the lead of such an expedition, and no man more likely to carry it out with the least fighting and quarrelling that is possible. True courage is always magnanimous, and Sir Samuel Baker has shown by the patient perseverance and self-devotion of himself and wife in carrying out a great purpose, that he possesses what is rarer and loftier than mere physical courage, — the attributes of the highest intellectual and moral courage, — that kind of courage which is sure to blend mercy with strength, and to be at all times conciliating whilst carrying out its objects.

It will be remembered that Sir Samuel Baker was led, when exploring the regions of the Upper Nile, to the discovery of the Albert N'yanza, from information he received at Gondokoro from Captain Speke. That lamented traveller had, upon the occasion of his exploration of the Victoria N'yanza, heard of the existence of another lake to the west or northwest, which he at the time supposed to be much smaller than his Victoria N'yanza, and which was also supposed to receive the waters of the outlet of the upper lake, — the Somerset or Victoria Nile, as it has been called. After overcoming many wearisome obstacles (and who can read his narrative without a thrill of admiration for the constant cheerfulness with which the hero and heroine bore the terrible hardships they were called to face, the daily danger and hourly anxieties of their lonely life in Equatorial Africa, and the sickness and other disheartening trials which they were called upon to endure?) Sir Samuel succeeded in reaching the lake in question. It lay before him like a sea of quicksilver, with a boundless sea horizon on the south and southwest glittering in the noonday sun, and on the west, at fifty or sixty miles' distance, blue mountains rose from the bosom of the lake to a height of about seven thousand feet above its level.

"I was about fifteen hundred feet above the lake," the traveller relates, "and I looked down from the steep granite cliff upon those welcome waters, — upon that vast reservoir which nourished Egypt and brought fertility where all was wilderness, — upon that great source so long hidden from mankind, — that source of bounty and of blessings to millions of human beings; and as one of the greatest objects in nature, I determined to honor it with a great name. As an imperishable memorial of one loved and mourned by our gracious Queen, and deplored by every Englishman, I called this great lake 'the Albert N'yanza.' The Victoria and the Albert Lakes are the two sources of the Nile."

At sunrise, on the following morning, Sir Samuel was enabled to distinguish, with the aid of a powerful telescope, the outline of the mountains on the opposite shore, dark shades upon their sides denoting deep gorges, whilst two large waterfalls that cleft the sides of the mountains looked like threads of silver upon their dark face. The lake itself was a vast depression far below the general level of the country, surrounded by precipitous cliffs, and bounded on the west and southwest by great ranges of mountains from five to seven thousand feet above the level of its waters, thus rendering it the one great reservoir into which everything must drain, and "from this vast rocky cistern the Nile made its exit, a giant in its birth." "It was," adds Sir Samuel, "a grand arrangement of nature for the birth of so mighty and important a stream as the river Nile."

Unfortunately, at the period of Sir Samuel Baker's discovery of the Albert N'yanza, there had been some difference of opinion among geographers as to whether the Victoria Nile flowed directly onwards from Victoria N'yanza into the White Nile by Gondokoro, or whether its waters mingled with those of Albert N'yanza before joining the White Nile.

Instead, then, of Sir Samuel and his wife, as to all appearance they might have done, keeping, after their long fatigues, quietly in a boat, and allowing themselves to be peacefully rowed and drifted down the Nile, which is described as we have seen, as "a giant in its birth," they navigated the lake in canoes to Magungo, the point at which the Victoria Nile joined the lake, and what was worse, in order to settle a question of no very great importance, as to the lake-feeder at Magungo being really the prolongation of the Victoria Nile, they proceeded up that river, which is a succession of cataracts the whole way to the Karuma Falls, were stricken down again with fever, narrowly escaped being eaten up by crocodiles, named the first obstruction they met with, we hope inappropriately, "Murchison's Falls," were deserted by the natives, were imprisoned on the island of Patuan, were pilfered and insulted by King Kamrasi in Kissuna, and were subjected to no end of sickness, privations, and trials before they reached the White Nile. All this, when Sir Samuel Baker was distinctly told at Magungo that canoes could navigate the Nile in its course from the lake to the Madi country, as there were no cataracts for a great distance. True that both the Madi and the Koshi, who dwell on the right and left banks of the river at its exit, were said to be hostile to the lake people, but this presumed hostility would not have entailed difficulties greater than what had been already overcome, or than what they had to suffer at the hands of the cowardly and treacherous Kamrasi. The difficulties might, indeed, have been all overcome by change of boat and boatmen, a thing they had to do, even upon the lake itself; upon one occasion indeed, changing boatmen four times in less than a mile. Sir Samuel, however, adds afterwards, that the natives most positively refused to take him down the Nile from the lake into the country of the Madi, as they said they would be killed by the people, who were their enemies, as he would not be with them on their return up the river; so we are left in doubt if the Victoria Nile was ascended, instead of the Nile proper being descended, from the love of geography, or from sheer necessity. The latter is to be doubted, for the travellers could have exchanged canoes on reaching the Madi, and sent the lake people back in safety. This was all the more vexatious, as, Sir Samuel says, he could see the river issuing from the lake within eighteen miles of Magungo, and, although it is marked on the map as being navigable to the first cataract at Mount Koko, still the question of first importance, as to the navigability (with a few intervening portages) of the Great River Nile, from its embouchure in the Mediterranean to the Albert N'yanza, would have been forever determined, and Sir Samuel and Lady Baker might have been spared many perils and much suffering. This is one great point which may now happily be fairly considered as on the way of being settled.

It is not a little remarkable that so intuitively did the quick feminine perception of Lady Baker feel this point, that when Sir Samuel proposed going up to Karuma, although he felt, by taking so circuitous a route, he might lose the boats at Gondokoro and become a prisoner in Central Africa, ill and without quinine, for another year, Lady Baker not only voted in her state of abject weakness to complete the river to Karuma, but wished, if possible, to return and follow the Nile from the lake down to Gondokoro! The latter resolve, based upon the simple principle of "seeing is believing," was, however, declared by her lord and master "to be a sacrifice most nobly proposed, but simply impossible and unnecessary." If there was any unnecessary sacrifice to be made in the matter, it would certainly seem to have been in taking the sick lady up to Karuma, instead of conveying her by canoe down the Nile to Gondokoro.

A second and equally interesting point, although not of so much importance to the future opening of the country, is the possible communication between the Albert N'yanza and Lake Tanganyika. From the elevation at which Sir Samuel Baker stood, when he first saw Lake Albert, with a boundless horizon to the south and southwest, its waters would appear to extend beyond the parallel assigned by Burton and Speke to Lake Rusisi, and, in fact, to embrace that lake as a kind of inlet, as also Lake Tanganyika further south. The elevation given to Lake Tanganyika of only eighteen hundred and forty-four feet above the level of the sea, while the Albert N'yanza is two thousand four hundred and forty feet above the same level, and the information given to Burton and Speke as to the waters at the north end of Tanganyika flowing into that lake, are opposed to this view of the subject; but it is possible that there may have been an error in the barometrical observation made, as also in the information obtained from the natives. It is now known that the waters of Lake Tanganyika do not flow into the N'yassa, which has an elevation of only thirteen hundred feet above the level of the sea; but, on the contrary, that the rivers and small lakes south of the Tanganyika pour their waters into that great reservoir. It is not probable that Lake Tanganyika should have no outlet and receive rivers at both its north and south extremities, as also in its centre, — the Malagarasi. The position of the lake added to the discovery made by Sir Samuel Baker of the great southerly extension of the Albert N'yanza, would then tend to show that the most southerly tributaries south of Tanganyika — possibly the Moi Tawa, discovered by Livingstone, northeast of the N'yassa — are the most remote sources of the Nile. It is to be hoped that Livingstone's last journey will have settled this dubious point, and we shall but express the satisfaction which will be felt by all, at hearing of the safe return of the great traveller before Sir Samuel Baker's expedition is set in motion. As that expedition partakes, if we understand rightly, of a character of Egyptian occupation and annexation, the African chiefs may now be induced to look upon the presence of a white man in their countries as the forerunner of invasion on the part of their hereditary foes, and the life of such a man, however innocent his intentions, would no longer be safe.

Dr. Livingstone may, however, be in quite a different part of the country; for it is Sir R. I. Murchison's opinion that if the distinguished traveller satisfied himself when at the southern end of Lake Tanganyika that its waters were about eighteen hundred feet above the sea, as stated by Burton and Speke, he would necessarily infer that they could not flow northwards into the much higher equatorial lakes. In this case he would abandon the northern route, in which it was supposed he might find the waters of the Tanganyika flowing into the Albert N'yanza of Baker. Having also ascertained from the south and the east, it would be evident under these circumstances that this vast body of fresh water (three hundred miles in length) must find its way to the west, and he would then follow the river or rivers which issue on the west coast of Africa. Under this supposition, Sir R. I. Murchison thinks he may be first heard of from one of the western Portuguese settlements, or even from those on the Congo. If this view be entertained, we cannot be expected to hear of Livingstone for some time to come, as the distance he would have to traverse is vast, and the region unknown. This hypothesis is also said to explain why no intelligence whatever respecting him has been received at Zanzibar, inasmuch as he has been travelling through a vast country, the inhabitants of which have no communication with the eastern coast. Sir R. I. Murchison says he entertains a well-founded hope that his distinguished friend — thanks to his iron frame and undying energy — will issue from Africa on the same shore at which, after a very long absence, he reappeared after his first great traverse of Southern Africa.

A third and very curious point presents itself in the possible existence of one or more outlets to the Albert N'yanza. We have seen that Sir Samuel Baker satisfied himself as to the existence of a river flowing out of the lake into the White Nile, which the natives told him was navigable for some distance, and by which, therefore, it is to be supposed that the lake could be entered in boats from the Nile, without the necessity of conveying them, as we are informed is to be done, in pieces to the shores of the lake. But two French traders, Messrs. Jules and Ambrose Poncet, who have explored the country between the Gazelle Lake and the Albert N'yanza, express themselves as perfectly satisfied that the river Jur, Bibi, or Bahr Kakunda, as it is variously designated, flows out of the Luta N'zigé (as they call the Albert N'yanza) into the Gazelle Lake. If this is so, the river of the Jur tribe and of the Niam Nams would present another means of approach to the great lake.

But this is not all. The same informants, who have trading ports on the Jur, have also founded another station, marked on their map * as Cagouma (Kaguma), Etablissement Poncet, on a great river which flows from southeast to northwest, and which is called Bahr-Bura, or Bahr-Munbutu. This river, they say, which evidently comes from Lake Luta N'zigé, divides itself in about four degrees of north latitude into two branches, that to the east flowing, under the name of Suwa, to the northwest, to go probably to form the Shary or Asu, which throws itself, after its junction with the Bah-gun or Bah-bai, into Lake Tsad. The westerly branch, which is much the largest, keeps its name of Bahr-Bura, and flows in a west-northwest direction to about the sixth degree of north latitude, at which point, according to the Munbutu people, after receiving another considerable affluent coming likewise from the southeast, it empties itself into a great lake, in part marshy, and which was called by the people of Ali Umuri, an Arab trader, Birka Matuassat. This lake, again, is described as having two outlets: one to the north known as the Bah-gun or Bah-bai, joins the Shary south of Lake Tsad, the other, and the most important, issuing from the west end of the lake, according to all appearances gives birth to the Binuwa Niger, or, at all events, to an affluent of the Binuwa and Kwarra, — the Kibbi or Kulla, — which in that case will possess a much greater importance than has hitherto been conceded to it, — an importance equal to that of the Binuwa or Kwarra itself.

It is not likely that there should be so much division and subdivision of waters as is here described. Excepting in a delta, the general rule of rivers is to receive affluents in their progress to the sea, and not to divide into branches; but the region between the Albert N'yanza and the Gazelle Lake is nothing more than an inland delta, as is also apparently the case at the north end of the Victoria N'yanza, and the same thing may hold good of the Bahr-Bura and Lake Matuassat.

This latter lake would appear to correspond to the Muata Yanvo, of which the old geographer D'Anville obtained some notice, and near which was Monsol, or Munsul, capital of the Anziko, proximately placed on the map attached to Mr. W. D. Cooley's "Inner Africa Laid Open" (London, 1852).

It appears that an Italian explorer, Carlo Piaggia, has also pushed his researches in the same direction, and that he has obtained information of the existence of "a vast interior lake" lying on the equator or south of it; and Sir R. I. Murchison has justly pointed out that an entirely new field for research is thus laid open to the enterprise of explorers, who will have to determine whether the streams issuing from this immense lake and the adjacent region to the west of twenty-five degrees east longitude do not flow from a watershed entirely separated from that of all the affluents of the Nile, and which sends its waters into the South Atlantic Ocean, and probably by the great river of Congo.

It would scarcely seem that the immense lake here alluded to as lying on the equator, or south of it, is the same as the Matuassat of Messrs. Poncet, which is placed in about six degrees north latitude, unless it has an extent of some six degrees, which is not at all impossible. Albert N'yanza has possibly an almost equal extent, and, if it joins Lake Tanganyika, would embrace in its prolongation over ten degrees of latitude. It is curious, in connection with Sir R. I. Murchison's suggestion, that this great central lake may give birth to the Congo, that Fernando de Enciso speaks in his "Suma de Geografia," of a fact learned from the natives of Congo, that the River Zaire, or Congo, rises from a lake in the interior, from which another great river, presumed to be the Nile, flows in an opposite direction. This may be one of the rivers seen by Sir Samuel Baker, tumbling through gorges in the Blue Mountains west of the Albert N'yanza.

The theory, however, advocated by the Messrs. Poncet, of Lake Matuassat sending off tributaries to the Binuwa Niger, and to the Shary and Lake Tsad, as also by Fernando de Enciso and Sir R. I. Murchison, to the Congo, only corroborates the old opinion held by the father of history and by all the old geographers, that one half of the Nile flowed over Egypt and the other half over Ethiopia. "There are two mountains," said Herodotus, from information obtained from the registrar of Minerva's treasury at Laïs, "rising into a sharp peak, situated between the city of Syene in Thebais and Elephantine; the names of these mountains are the one Crophi and the other Mophi; that the sources of the Nile, which are bottomless, flow from between these mountains, and that half of the water flows over Egypt and to the north, and the other half over Ethiopia and the south."

The sources of the Nile, being described as bottomless, are evidently meant as issuing from a lake, and it is afterwards that they pass through the mountains, the names of which, admitting an error in their positioning, would be represented by the Koshi and Madi of the present day. The transposition and identification is rendered all the more necessary, as the sources of the Nile could not have been between Syene and Elephantine, nor could the river have divided itself in such a latitude to flow one half to Egypt and the other half to Ethiopia. It is remarkable that the Oriental geographers, as more especially Al Idrisi and Abu'l Fada, represent this division of the head waters of the Nile into an Egyptian and an Ethiopian river as a well-determined fact.

Such, then, are some of the points to be determined by the navigation and exploration of the Albert N'yanza, and they are of the greatest possible interest, as they will probably either themselves lead to the unveiling of the mystery which has so long made a blank of our maps in as far as Central Africa is concerned, or they may pave the way to the gradual unfolding of every detail connected with the origin of the Nile, the Congo, and the Binuwa Kwarra, or Eastern Niger, of the Egyptian Nile, and the Ethiopic Nile.

Interesting and curious as the solution of such questions may be, great as will be the difference made upon existing maps, and various the people and the regions that will be brought under the cognizance of the civilized world, still, even all these additions to knowledge pale in importance before the prospect opened of an amelioration in the condition of the African races, only recently made known to us by the explorations of Burton, Speke, Grant, Petherick, Baker, and others. Of all the impressions left upon the reader of Sir Samuel's book, those relating to the slave-trade of the White Nile are perhaps the most startling. Many people have thought but lightly of the evils connected with Oriental slavery. Those who were most enthusiastic in waging war against the trade of the west coast were content, for the most part, to look upon Turkish and Egyptian slavery as a minor evil compared with the other, and one which was so ineradicably mixed up with the nature of Oriental life and despotism, that any denunciations directed against it would be as absurd as they would be futile. No doubt, too, the slavery itself was a comparatively small evil. The subjection of one human creature to another is not so shameful a phenomenon to the African mind as to be unendurable, when it takes that patriarchal and domestic character with which slavery in the East appears to be more or less invested, and more especially when the slave continues to enjoy a climate something like his own.

Sir Samuel Baker may, however, be said to have lifted the veil which concealed the process by which the slave markets of Cairo and Constantinople were recruited.

Barth has given us a graphic if painful account of the expeditions of the Mohammedan Sultans of Bornu, Baghirmi, and Sokoto, carried on even into Adamawa and the regions of the Binuwa and Eastern Niger, and, still more recently, M. Mage has depicted with the most striking minuteness, life, as it is on the Upper Niger and in the vast Pullo-Felatah dominions. That life appears, under the rude sway of the Mohammedan, to be one successive, continuous, and incessant warfare; the enslaving of everything pagan; reprisals, murders, and executions. We have also heard something of the questionable proceedings of the Egyptians on the western frontiers of Abyssinia from Taka to the upper regions of the Blue Nile, and we have always regretted that the costly expedition sent to that country to liberate the British captives should have done nothing towards insuring the immunity of a Christian people against the enslaving propensities of their Egyptian neighbors. Sir Samuel Baker may be said to be one of the first to make us acquainted with the nature of the raids made by Mohammedan slave-dealers from Gondokoro against the Obbos and Latukas, and other tribes in the neighborhood, and which were so cruel and reckless in their character, that, it has been justly observed, one of the worst features of Sir Samuel's journey must have been the necessity of witnessing, without the power of mitigating in even the slightest degree, the atrocities which the slave-seekers committed. Under cover of carrying on an "ivory trade," armed bands of desperadoes ascend the river and penetrate into the heart of some savage country. To be at war with one another is a normal condition of existence amongst the native tribes. Taking advantage of this, the traders offer their alliance to the tribe with whom they first come in contact, on the understanding that they may be at liberty to make prisoners from the enemy. The African savage is either too simple to see, or, what is far more likely, is willing, for the sake of revenge, to close his eyes to the fatal nature of the friendship offered. Assisted by his Mussulman allies, he sets forth on the campaign, and, amidst the reckless slaughter that ensues, a draught of living captives is secured for the trader's net. But very soon the original dupes, if they can be so termed, discover that the trader is equally ready to turn his arms against them. In alliance with some other tribe, he makes war against them in turn, and the friends who assisted him to effect his first captures fall victims to his whips and chains in turn. Forced to some extent into association with the "ivory traders," Sir Samuel beheld their proceedings. Very narrowly did he escape a sudden death at their hands, but his wonderful intrepidity carried him through, and he lived to register a resolution that, if he ever came back from his wanderings, he would do something to interfere with the proceedings which, for the time being, he could only contemplate with secret indignation. The time for action has now happily arrived. No doubt it will be a difficult task to persuade the tribes, through which the "ivory traders" have passed, that the object of the expedition is simply the extinction of the slave-trade. It matters, however, little whether the Africans fully understand the expedition at first. The traders of Gondokoro will comprehend it readily enough, and they will soon feel, or be made to feel, that a prompt submission to the new system to be inaugurated is inevitable. This, then, one of the avowed philanthropic purposes of the expedition, with the anticipated opening of Central Africa to the purposes of commerce, and the withdrawing of the veil which has so long hung over so large a portion of the earth's surface, fully entitle the projected expedition to our most earnest hopes of success, and to anticipate that it will yet constitute one of the most remarkable pages in the history of our own times.

SPITE.

THE idea of malice occupies the mind long before the word, in all its terrors, is familiar. "You did it on purpose," whines the fretful child "under loss or vexation, experiencing at once an added bitterness and a sense of dignity in being the object of malignant design; and henceforth he realizes himself more distinctly as a citizen of the world, a sharer in its trials, already an object of spite, one that will in due time have enemies, who, if he fails, will be the cause of his failure. There are few people who, when things go wrong with them, do not attribute more than is probable to active ill-will on the part of others. Malice is no doubt a power in the world. To work towards a neighbor's downfall, for the disinterested satisfaction of seeing him fall, is the occupation of some persons; but such a solution of ordinary difficulties amongst ordinary people is seldom necessary in civilized society. Persons guilty of the tragic forms of malice are the highest or the lowest among men; on the one hand, kings and conquerors, statesmen pitted against one another at a crisis, heads of factions who must crush one another with a plot: on the other hand, the clown pulling up his parson's tulips or firing his neighbor's stackyard, the operative scarring the pretty jilt's face with vitriol, or blowing up the non-unionist's house and household. People's attention must be fixed long on a single object, their passions concentrated, their thoughts restricted to a narrow circle, for malice to achieve its triumphs, just as venom intensifies itself in dark holes and obscure corners among ruins and waste places of the earth. In the freer currents of social life, where there is a wide choice of interests and associates, where circumstances combine against the unwholesome fascination of antipathies, human nature is spared these temptations. Nor has it the needful strength and courage. Malice of the broad typical quality does not consist in mere malignity; there must be active mischief, a more than willingness to lend a helping hand. Like Thersites, "it will learn to conjure and raise devils, but it will see some issue of its spiteful execrations." And the opportunity to do mischief, vigilantly watched for, generally presents itself; but this watchfulness men are deterred from, if by no higher motive, by superstition, which reminds them that it is safest not to give the reins to ill-judging. Vindictive persons, says Bacon, live the life of witches, who, as they are mischievous, so end they unfortunate. And we see that it is so. There is the feeling that ill-wishes recoil, that our own good things are imperilled if we seriously set about diminishing our neighbor's stock; hence people are amiable in proportion to the interest they have in things remaining smooth and comfortable. Malice does not pay to common people; it is only magnificos and such great folks who find it the one lasting pleasure of life.

But society finds a substitute for malice — a domestic creditable neighborly form of the great vice — in spite. We scruple to call anybody malicious except in history or the newspapers, but with spite we are on more familiar terms. We see traces of it on the faces of some of our acquaintances, in the speech of others, in the actions of some few; nay, we may even detect some grains (when sorely tried) in ourselves, if we are curious in our investigations. Spite does not care to ruin anybody; only it is apt to reverse the apostolic precept, and most especially makes no hand at rejoicing with those that rejoice. It draws unflattered portraits; it picks holes; it finds self-compensation in the misfortune of others. For here, again, it does not do to define spite as mere ill-wishing, even in its most trifling and restricted form, unless action comes in. Narrow sympathies are perpetually immersed in barren discontent with what interferes with one's own convenience, — discontent which issues in positive gratification where another's pain brings relief to self. There are many worthy people, devoted to those nearest to them, helpful to their immediate surroundings, who will take cheerfully as a gift of Providence the news of a distant acquaintance's broken limb or fallen fortunes, if these disasters save them from an unwelcome guest or from the derangement of summer plans. In fact, most persons are made so. It is a sign of peculiar sweetness and nobleness of nature when it is otherwise. Yet we deny that these defective sympathies are spiteful, because their satisfaction arises solely from one's own relief, and not from another's pain; such people would be even better pleased if another's good fortune, rather than his ill luck, had delivered them from a quandary.

There are people distinct from these, who do like mischief for its own sake, — people who are companionable, who have their good moral points, but who, as we often observe, seem to be not only indifferent to the evil which occurs to others, but actually pleased to find themselves the cause of transient human suffering. They like to abash sensitiveness, and exercise ingenuity to bring this about; when the humor is on them, they say things for the mere pleasure of giving pain, probing a wound, and curiously watching the deportment of the sufferer.

There are many more who entertain a sort of general spite against humanity, and enjoy its smaller humiliations, losses, and vexations; who see something ludicrous in everything that alarms, disconcerts, and exposes, as though wit lay in the fact of one person being vexed while another looks on; to whom your being too late for the train, or breaking your horse's knees, or being put out of countenance, are exhilarating circumstances, although they are in no way benefited by your discomfiture; who from their own snug shelter will enjoy the spectacle of a wet, dripping holiday, when weeks of eager anticipation issue in the damp wretchedness of plodding thousands. This pleasure in witnessing disappointment is especially the diversion of spoiled and pampered youth, which has not yet realized the possibility that its own turn may come, and looks upon all misfortune, great and small, in the light of a spectacle in which it has no other concern than as spectator. Time bringing coward fears, if nothing better, does much of itself to cure this heedless and hard-hearted malice. The smooth brow and rounded contour which told nothing of what passed within become vehicles of softer expression from the mere encounter with inevitable sorrow; the countenance which before was merely impassive catches the gift of pity, though self may still have the greatest share of it. But if otherwise, if the malice is anything more than thoughtlessness, then spite imprints a mark on the features which says more plainly than any other vice, Beware! For spite, even where it wishes no great ill and is kept in check by conscience, even where it consists in the mere souçon of malevolence, is absorbing. It broods, and thus the features are moulded into a sympathy with the inner mind which no temporary transient misdoing imparts to them. It prompts thought to dwell most on what it hates or dislikes most; it dominates over revery.

Happily, however, these are not common physiognomies. That particular malevolent cast of eye and twist of lip are distinctive marks as rare as, on the other hand, are natures that are wholly foreign to some touch of the infirmity. Some few persons we may all know so free from this gall of bitterness as not only never to our knowledge to have said an ill-natured thing or betrayed a spiteful bias, but of whom we are confident that such a thing never happens either in sport or under provocation; who never teased even in boyhood; for teasing is the domestic form of the vice which should touch the consciences of the majority.

Teasing is undoubtedly a malicious practice where it inflicts annoyance designedly, though it may not be recognized as such because it constantly goes with liking, and is agreeable to the teaser in proportion to his interest in or attachment to his object. A pet son will tease his mother; a brother will tease his idolizing sisters, with the intention of vexing them, and will not stop till he has succeeded; yet all the while the entire party live in habitual ignorance of the motive at work, in a satisfied understanding that this is a sign of affection, and that the pain of the process is undesigned or inevitable; just as it was generally taken for granted that Tom Tulliver was fond of animals because he liked to throw stones at them. In some aspects of family life the illusion can scarcely be more than one-sided; but there can be no doubt that the bullying elder brother who torments his junior, finding the process more amusing with him than with a stranger, supposes in himself a fraternal fondness. Social as opposed to domestic teasing, can hardly be wholly unconscious, but it is assumed to be legitimate, — a necessary stimulant to the intercourse of friends, or a means of turning ill-humor to account. Thus Swift reports complacently to Stella how he had teased Prior the evening before because he himself was not in force: "I dined with Mr. Harley, and came away at six. There was much company, and I was not merry at all. Mr. Harley made me read a paper of verses of Prior's. I read them plain, without any fine manner. Prior swore I should never read any of his again, that he would be revenged, and read some of mine as bad. I excused myself, and said I was famous for reading verses the worst in the world." Of course this would be as good as a play to the bystanders, especially as there are two courses open to the victim of spite, — the natural and the dignified; and curiosity is awakened. Prior may have done wisely to defend his verses at the expense of his temper; but he not the less followed nature's impulse, and made the desired sport. When Lord Chesterfield warns his son against wit, the spitefulness which was then its social garb was probably in his mind. "A wit," he says, "is a very unpopular denomination, as it carries terror along with it, and people in general are as much afraid of a live wit in company as a woman is of a gun that she thinks may go off of itself."

All persons who for any reason preferred a quiet life, had in those days to use much the same argument against the loud social aggressions of spite. Thus Barrow on the malignity of so-called zeal: "A quiet sectary doth to most men's fancy appear more lovely than he that is furiously and fractionally orthodox." In fact, wit was not wit without a dash of spite.

"Spiteful he was not, though he wrote in satire,
For still there goes some thinking to ill-nature," and we are led to suppose that not only in books, but face to face, the science of provocation was carried to its highest pitch of spitefulness, and that the teasing was of that rough order described as "unfinching frankness." And this is the most piquant form of joke still to a public-house audience, who like to hear an unpopular member reminded that "there's things folks 'ud pay to be rid on besides vermin." We would fain hope that such pleasantries are confined in our day to bores, but fiction is at pains to assure us that the drawing-rooms of fashionable life still echo to similar utterances. Novels which profess to represent the manners of society amaze us constantly with these complacent pictures of vulgar spite. It was only the other day that we met with a heroine who, feeling herself "sat upon" by three elderly ladies at an evening party, chose to mistake one of them for a man, looking her in the face as she did so; to pity another for the chill of her low dress, as she must be seventy years of age; and to talk at the third with such malignant point that her victim was driven from the field, leaving her witty opponent victorious, and receiving the congratulations of an eager circle of observers.

It is a testimony to the self-control which civilization confers that spite is not the universal salt of conversation which all literature represents it to be. The fact is that tone and manner can convey the shades of ill-will much more delicately than most pens. If we are not intrinsically more amiable than our forefathers, we have at least found out this more refined method of annoyance. People used to be thick-skinned, and could give and take in a way which would now be extermination. Uncivil things may be so curiously concealed and wrapped up that it is only when too late that the point is detected, and the retort which springs to the dawning intelligence dies in its birth. It is by such arts that the cynical member of polite circles knows how to keep his hold of intercourse with sensitive persons whom it amuses him to irritate. Courtesy, the show of pleasing, cannot be dispensed with in decent society, whatever novelists may say. Dr. Johnson must have mended his manners, must have suppressed many a sneer and ugly, spiteful snub, had he lived in these days; and of course he would have mended them. Now, perhaps, the most effective theatres for such performances are the hustings for vulgar spite, and the House of Commons for refined exquisite malice. People may be civil to one another at home, without the assistance of Christian charity, when they have elsewhere a fitting arena for their spleen, and an antagonist at once worthy of their wit, and sensitive to its stabs. We hear of old maids and tea-tables, we see calm private spite now and then setting itself to some long-planned attack. But what can match in venom the scene when Greek meets Greek in the crisis of debate, when courtesies are flung aside, pungent recriminations take their place, and personalities set in? Then on either side quickened memory from "hiding-places ten years deep" drags forth the damaging fact, the broken pledge, the fatal periods of youth's heedless rhetoric. Then the blunders of a life are set in the glare of five hundred pair of eyes, exposed as a folly, magnified into a crime. And always the practised hand strikes where the nerves are most sensitive; the vigilant eye notes how each stroke tells, and gleams the keener as anguish betrays itself; while, in rapturous sympathy, "the many rend the skies in loud applause."

CIRCUMSTANTIAL EVIDENCE.

MANY years ago—so many that I don't care to reckon the exact number—it was my lot to pass a great deal of my time in France. A near relative had married and settled in what may be called the very centre of that country,—the former province of Berri,—and to his house I used to go during my school holidays, my college vacation, and my army leave of absence. Near the château where my relative lived was one of those small French towns which, being out of the way of the busy world life in which those who inhabit great capitals live, always seem to me the very headquarters of dulness and ennui. Still, such as it was, Le Blanc was the only place within twenty miles, or more, where a newspaper could be had, a letter could be posted, or a cigar could be purchased. In France, field sports are not of that exciting nature which they are with us. To rise at 5 A.M., start on a tramp over cultivated ground for five or six hours, and come home very much exhausted for the sake of bringing in a hare or a couple of partridges, was not what I called shooting, and so, during my sojourn at Bonasle, I generally confined my wanderings to the small town aforesaid. Gradually I came to know some of the people, and they began to know me. The Maire used to come forth from his little office, where he smoked all day, and greet me almost as an old friend. The Curé, who had, as a young man, served in the Algerian army, used to look out for me, and was always glad to hear such tales as I had to tell respecting the wars in India. Then there were two or three worthy souls, retired officers, who insisted upon taking coffee and petits verres of cognac at their expense whenever they saw me in the single street which constituted the only thoroughfare of the town, and who, when I was a very junior Lieutenant of Dragoons, insisted upon giving me the rank of Major, always speaking of me as "Monsieur le Commandant Anglais," and addressing me with as much deference as if I had been a lieutenant-colonel of life guards. Having visited the little place annually for several years, as school-boy, as collegian, and as officer on leave, the good people took an interest in me, and I in them.

It is seldom that an Englishman gets on intimate terms with French country-people, and still more rare for him to know thoroughly the ins and outs of all their little affairs. Such, however, was my case with the inhabitants of Le Blanc, and thus it was that I came to hear the tale of circumstantial evidence which I am about to relate.

There were in Le Blanc two priests, the Curé and the Vicaire (in France the curé is what we call the vicar, and the vicaire is what we term the curate), both of whom I knew, the former particularly well. There was, as I knew very well, no other clergyman in the place, and no other church within ten or a dozen miles; and yet, every now and then, I used to see an elderly and most venerable-looking man, dressed in the soutane, or cassock, of a priest, walking about the neighboring fields, and often coming out of the church, as if he had been there for his private devotions. After a time, being curious to know the name of this gentleman, I asked some of my friends, and they told me he was called "le père François."

Now, as the term "père" is in France only applied to the clergy who belong to the religious orders, and as the cures, vicaires, and others are invariably called "monsieur l'abbé" when spoken of, or to, I took it into my head that this old gentleman must be some sort of monk, who had perhaps forgotten, or perhaps thrown aside, his vows, and was now doing penance in this retreat for his past life. And yet there were certain facts which rendered this supposition very improbable. No man seemed to frequent the church more than the "père François." Not only was he always present at the daily mass, but I often saw him at his private devotions in the building when no one was present, and frequently noticed him at the altars as a communicant. His countenance was that of a man who had seen much trouble and gone through great grief, but by no means one which led me to think he had ever lived a bad life. And yet why should he dress like a priest and not officiate as such? Moreover, the inhabitants of the place, although always ready enough to speak of other people's business, either would, or could, give me no information respecting Père François's antecedents. Whenever they were questioned about him, they turned the conversation into some other channel. Thus it was that, although I had known the little town for some years, and had seen and bowed again and again to the old man, it was only at one of my last visits that I became acquainted with his history, and then only by mere chance.

Père François's real name was Caudret, — Monsieur l'Abbé Caudret. Many years before I had known him, — shortly after the restoration of the Bourbons in France, — he had gone to the ecclesiastical college of St. Sulpice, in Paris, with the intention of studying for the Church. His conduct at that establishment had been most exemplary, and after remaining there the usual four or five years, he had been ordained, and returned to his native diocese in the south, where he was at once appointed vicaire in a large town parish. In this position he had remained about six years; and when he left, on his appointment to be cure of a country parish, all his parishioners regretted extremely his departure. He was celebrated as one of the most excellent, self-denying, charitable, zealous, and yet judicious, priests in the diocese, and was equally well spoken of by his bishop, his fellow-clergy, and his parishioners. It was only after ten years spent in the most creditable exercise of his functions, that a cloud, which darkened all his after-life, cast its shadow upon him.

The presbytère (which we should call rectory, or vicarage) of M. Caudret's parish was situated near his church, but at some distance from the rest of the village. The latter was a very poor place, with no other village within six or seven leagues. Between the priest's house and the church, and built about thirty yards from the former, was a small house, consisting of two rooms, very modestly furnished, and called the hospice. In this hospice it was, and had been for many years, the custom to provide lodging for any stray traveller who asked for it, and who was too poor to go to the inn. One night a young woman called at the priest's house, and asked if she might take up her abode for the night at the hospice. She did so; and, as a heavy snow-storm came on next day, she remained the best part of a week, the priest's housekeeper giving her her meals in the kitchen of the presbytère, for she said she was poor, and on the way to her friends in a distant part of France. On the fifth or sixth morning of her sojourn, as she did not make her appearance in time for the early cup of coffee, the housekeeper went to call her, and, to her horror, found the poor creature murdered in her bed.

The alarm was given, and it was evident that a double crime had been committed, rendering her murder all the more infamous. Search was made, and close to her bed was found a knife which belonged to the priest, and which he always kept in his study, — a long Corsican dagger, which he had preserved for years as a curiosity. It was afterwards given in evidence, that when this weapon was found, M. Caudret was observed to turn deadly pale, and almost to faint. Further investigation brought to light that from his study-window, which was on the ground-floor, to the hospice, marks of a man's foot could distinctly be seen coming and going. These marks agreed exactly with a pair of shoes which were found dirty in the study, and which belonged to the priest. A handkerchief of his was, moreover, found in the unfortunate woman's bed, and it had evidently been used as a gag to stop her cries. In a word, circumstances were such, and the evidence against M. Caudret was so strong, that the Maire considered it his duty to arrest him. The people did not know what to believe. Until now his character had been almost that of a saint; now he was discovered as having been guilty of the acts of a demon.

He was taken to Lyons, and there, after numerous tedious interrogations before this and that authority, put upon trial for his life. All he could urge in his defence was, that, during the night, when the crime had been committed, he had been awake by hearing, as he thought, some one in his bedroom. He had called out, and asked who was there, but, receiving no answer, had dozed off again. Subsequently, but he could not say how long after, he had been again awake by the noise, as he thought, of his study-window being opened. He had got up, gone into the study, but, seeing nothing to justify his alarm, had imagined he must have been dreaming, and had gone to bed again. In the morning he had awoken rather later than usual, and missed both his pocket-handkerchief and a pair of shoes that had been the night before in his bedroom. The former he thought he must have dropped somewhere during the day; and he was just going to inquire for the latter, when the alarm of the murder was given, and he had rushed out to see what was the matter. This much, and his antecedents, were all he could urge in his defence. In fact, the accusation seemed to come upon him like a blow, and to deprive him of all energy.

With us in England every accused man is supposed to be innocent until he is proved guilty. I don't say this is always literally the case, but such is the theory of our criminal law, and a very just theory it is. In France it is exactly the contrary. The practice of criminal proceedings in that country is that every accused person is believed to be guilty, until he is proved to be innocent. And such was the case with M. Caudret. He was questioned by this authority, badgered by that, bullied by a third, made to contradict himself by a fourth, and sneered at by a fifth, until he almost believed he was guilty; and yet the very consciousness of his innocence made him desperate. And certainly, if ever circumstantial evidence against a man was strong, it was on this occasion. That he was the most unlikely man in the world to commit any crime,—and particularly such a crime,—every one admitted; and yet they could not help declaring that the evidence against him was terribly clear and distinct. Even some of his brother clergy, most of whom had known him as boy and man for thirty and more years, kept aloof from him, and declared, much as it grieved them to say so, that he was guilty.

The unfortunate priest underwent a long and most heart-breaking trial,—a prolonged mental torture, which can only be inflicted by a French criminal trial. As a matter of course the press was against him. In those days the fact of a priest being guilty of any crime was a subject of joy to the more than half infidel, and always bitterly anti-Catholic, newspaper writers of the period. These writings may or may not have influenced the jury. But, be that as it may, M. Caudret was found guilty, and sentenced to death. He met his fate with fortitude, merely declaring his innocence, and saying that it would be some day or other fully proved that he was innocent. A confessor attended him in his prison, and the authorities of that establishment could not but help noticing that after the first interview of that priest with the convicted man, he at any rate did not believe him to be guilty, although, of course, not a word was divulged of what had passed between the prisoner and himself.

In the days I write of, Charles the Tenth was king of France, and had a very great dislike to see any one, particularly a priest, executed. Although urged by the Minister of the Interior to sanction the capital punishment of M. Caudret, his Majesty obstinately—and, as it turned out, very fortunately—declined to do so, and commuted the sentence to one far worse for any man not an “habitual criminal” to bear, that of travaux forcés at the galleys, what we should call penal servitude, for life. The prisoner accepted the respite without a murmur, but without rejoicing. He was removed to Brest, and in a very short time he and his crime were forgotten by the outer world.

What a man of education, a man refined in his tastes, religious in his ideas, and knowing himself to be innocent, must have undergone at the bains, those only who have seen these establishments, and who know what goes on at those places, can form an idea. Our own penal prisons must be bad enough, but they are havens of rest and peace when compared with those of France. The only good description of these hells upon earth published in the English language was written some years ago by Mr. Sala, in a novel called “The Seven Sons of Mammon.” Those who recollect that writer’s account of the bain at Brest may imagine what M. Caudret had to endure for twenty-five long years of his life, and from which he only escaped at last by almost a miracle.

Charles X. had been dethroned; the Orleans dynasty had ruled over France, and had likewise vanished; the Republic had passed away like a dream; Louis Napoleon had been declared President, and then Emperor of France; and yet M. Caudret lingered in jail. He still wore the hideous yellow garments of a “lifer”; was sneered and jeered at as having been a priest; had to listen daily and hourly to language and tales of which the like could only be heard in the infernal regions; and was treated all the worse by the guardians of the abominable den, because he would not take part in the ribaldry and obscenity of the place. How he bore it—how he did not dash his head against the walls, and get rid of his fearful life—God alone knows. He was never heard in after years to describe what he had passed through, except in a single particular. Throughout the long days and weeks and months and years that he suffered his punishment, he had one, and only one, occasional glimpse of happiness. That was when the priest, who was chaplain of the bain, used to admit him to confession. Then, and only then, did he hear for a brief period some few words of consolation, and listen to the conversation of an educated man like himself.

But whenever he had had one of these interviews with the chaplain, the guardian, or warden of the room, took a devilish pleasure in having him chained for the next few days to some prisoner who was, if possible, more profane, and a greater blasphemer than the others. In other respects, after he was liberated from the bain, M. Caudret, when questioned about the prison, shuddered at the recollection of what he had passed through, but would never enter into particulars. All he would say was that it was far worse, and infinitely more fearful, than any man who had not lived there could imagine.

His liberation was brought about in this way, long after he had given up all hope of ever being released save by death. At the galleys of Toulon, was a convict who had been sentenced to the travaux forcés for ten years, and had undergone nearly the whole of his sentence when he met with a terrible accident, by which he was so injured that the medical men declared he could not live more than a few hours. At first he could not believe them, but after a time, feeling himself getting worse, he accepted the services of the chaplain, of the prison to prepare him for death. The chaplain, who was closeted with him for some time, ended by sending for the governor, and saying that the prisoner had, before he died, a public statement to make.

In the convict prisons in France a similar event is not uncommon, for the intricacies of crime are so bound up with one another, that when a criminal dies he often discloses some mystery connected with his former life. Such was the case with this man. When the governor and the proper attesting persons had assembled round his death-bed in the infirmary, he declared himself to have perpetrated, twenty-five years before, the murder of a woman in the hospice of a village not far from Lyons, for which the cure of the place had been tried, found guilty, and condemned. He gave full details as to how the murder had been committed, as a sequel to the other outrage; and how, in order to divert suspicion, he had entered the cure’s bedroom by the window, taken his shoes, walked in them to the hospice and back, making the footmarks as plain as possible, and had also taken with him the Corsican dagger which he found in his study. Being himself at that time under police surveillance, and afraid that he would be imprisoned unless the scent was thrown upon another person, he smeared the knife in the blood of his victim, so as to make people believe she had been murdered by that weapon. He—the murderer—it was who had taken the priest’s handkerchief, which he found on the study floor, and had put it into the dead woman’s mouth, as if it had been used for a gag. In short, after his deposition had been forwarded to the proper authorities, it was thought to be so truthful that a formal inquiry was made, the judgment given a quarter of a century before was reversed, and the doors of his infernal prison, greatly to his surprise, were thrown open for M. Caudret.

When this unfortunate man was declared innocent and set at liberty, his bishop offered to restore him his clerical faculties, and even to give him charge of a parish. But, although grateful for the kindness, he could not be prevailed upon again to take upon himself the duties of his calling. He said that the twenty-five years' residence at the bains had been such a pollution to his very soul, and that his body was so weakened and his whole nervous system so overset, that he was not fit to resume his functions. At the representation of the bishop an allowance of £20 a year was made him by Government and he retired to the small town where I met him, and where, after living for many years a most holy life, he died in peace some six or seven years ago. The French people have a sort of instinctive horror of any and every person — whether innocent or guilty — that has ever been connected with the bains, and this was the reason why they would not answer me about Pere Francois until they knew me better. I question whether any one ever suffered more from false circumstantial evidence than did this poor priest.

SHORT ESSAYS.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "FRIENDS IN COUNCIL."

THERE are two or three marked peculiarities in the vice of calumny. In the first place, considering the mischief it does, there is very little punishment to the person practising it. Personal vices are dearly paid for, even in this world; and most of us learn, through bitter experience, and by dire remorse, the sin and mischief of our wrong-doings.

Then there is the thorough ignorance, for the most part, on the part of the calumniator, of the mischief and the misery that he causes by calumny. A good, easy man, or one who believes himself to be such, may have been a steady propagator of injurious reports deeply affecting other people; and the poor man goes to his grave in the confident belief that he has been a most exemplary member of society. The most unfortunate fact about calumny is, that you seldom witness the sufferings you create by calumniating. Your other cruelties you know about, and often see the issue of them; but the agonies you cause by every form of calumny, detraction, disparagement, and erroneous statement, rarely come to your knowledge, or to the knowledge of any human being, except the person who is calumniated.

A certain humorist is wont to contend that the sum of misery in human life is always the same. He says the sum of forces in the material world is always the same, the quantity of motion is always the same, and so is the amount of human misery. It is in vain that you urge against him that everything has become milder in the world; that wars are conducted with less cruelty and less destruction of property; that religious persecution has, comparatively speaking, ceased to exist; that there is an immense advance in medical skill; and that, generally, humanity is in the ascendant. He is pleased to admit your statements; but contends that all these good things are counterbalanced by more sensitiveness on the part of the human race, and by their caring more and more for what is said and written about them; and also that there is so much more talking and so much more writing. In short, he maintains that the progress of calumny, and the severity with which it is felt, will always counteract any advantages that are gained for the human race.

A strange thing, too, he observes, is this: that the less truth there is in the calumny, the greater are the sufferings of the person calumniated. "You would think," he says, "that when a man hears that something has been said or written of him that does not apply to him, any more than it would to the inhabitant of another planet, he would not take the calumny to heart. But no; this only makes him more furious and more vexed. If it did apply, he could then bear it, as he should deserve it; and so in this case the pointless arrow inflicts the severest wound."

Moralists have exhausted their energies in denouncing the vices of detraction and backbiting. With the exception of St. Paul's grand words about charity, — which embrace the whole subject, — perhaps the most practical remarks that have been made upon it are those which have been made by the writer who goes by the name of Thomas à Kempis. After denouncing the evil of uttering injurious statements known to be false, which, however, is comparatively rare, he goes on to say that you should not soon pour out to the ears of others those injurious reports even that you do believe. "Nec audita, vel credita, mox ac aliorum aures effundere."

In a company of learned men there was talk about posthumous fame. Some said that it was a strong motive to exertion with many persons. Others maintained that its potency as a motive was very small indeed, except with a few half-crazy people, like Alexander the Great. All agreed that it was a foolish motive as applied to the mass of men, because anything that was worthy of the name of "fame" was unattainable for them.

A man writes an elaborate work upon a learned subject. In a few years' time, another man also writes an elaborate work upon the same learned subject, and is kind enough to allude to the former author in a foot-note. Twenty or thirty years afterwards, this second man's work is also absorbed in a similar manner, and his labors are chronicled in a foot-note too. Now the first man's fame, if you come to look at it carefully, is but small. His labors are kindly alluded to in a foot-note of a work which is also kindly alluded to in a foot-note of a work published forty or fifty years hence.

Surely this fame in a foot-note is not much worth having.

Then take the fame of a soldier, — of any but the few distinguished generals whose names may be numbered on your fingers. Take the officer who is mentioned in a despatch. It is no doubt a great thing for him in the present day to be so mentioned; but fifty years hence nobody will know anything about the battle, much less about the despatch, except that it was a battle lost or won by a certain general. It is a great chance if the name of the principal general on each side is remembered by the same person.

Surely the fame to be gained by having one's name thus embalmed in a despatch is scarcely worth the loss of a limb, to say nothing about the risk of one's life.

One of the few things which give one a high opinion of the world is its splendid favoritism. This man may leap over a ditch, when he ought to have kept on the hither side of it; he may run, instead of walk, when walking is the proper thing; he may even be caught munching apples in his neighbor's orchard, — I speak metaphorically, — and the world declines to see that he has done anything wrong. It puts up its telescope to its blind eye, because he is a favorite.

Then there is another man, who shall always have the right quantity of starch in his shirt-collar, shall obey all the nine rules of propriety, and shall be of, apparently, unimpeachable virtue; yet the world, though it would not say so openly for the world, thinks him an ass, a pedant, and, perhaps, even a thoroughly bad fellow. Just let him, in a weak moment, disobey only one of the nine rules of propriety, and see how soon the world will be down upon him, for he is not a favorite.

Some of our transatlantic cousins (that most thoughtful man, Emerson, for instance) would, doubtless, explain this phenomenon by talking of the "over-soul," or some such great affair; but, at any rate, the phenomenon indicates that there is something which looms larger in the minds of men than the outer aspect of a man or his doings, or even their own forms and rules and proprieties, which yet they pretend to set such store by. That "something" is probably a great, fertile, and sympathetic nature in the favorite, which is perceived by all men, and heartily, though often but secretly, appreciated by them.

The famous Duke of Buckingham always seems to me to afford the best type of a favorite, having been a person of such a winning nature that his influence was equally potent with two men of such different characters as James the First and Charles the First, — the one, moreover, being the reigning monarch, and the other the heir-apparent, two personages that are seldom inclined to favor the same person.

Everybody who is fond of investigating character seeks for tests. Now, there are tests which, at first sight, seem to be good, but are really worth nothing. You may search forever, and be forever wrong, to find the crucial test of a man's character in his choice of a wife, of a house, of furniture, even of his friends, or of any of his many surroundings, for that which surrounds a man is not necessarily sympathetic with him. Tests of this kind fail, because of the influence of circumstances, which influence you can seldom eliminate.

Take, for instance, his friends. Friendship is often the result of the merest accident. One cannot but have some liking for one schoolfellow and college companions, whether they are especially suitable to one or not; and, indeed, throughout life, friendship depends much upon vicinity.

To find a certain test, you must have something that assuredly proceeds from the man himself, — something that he says, or does, when freed from the influence of others, and when uncontrolled by circumstances. Authors are far better understood than other men, because they cannot help betraying their real thoughts and opinions, as, when they write, they often forget who they are, with whom they live, and even what is expected of them.

In minor matters, it is often easy to find a good test. For example, if you want to ascertain what is to be ascertained of the character of a man from his style, open his book anywhere, and you are nearly sure to discern at once the peculiarities of his style. He never can conceal them.

If a man means to do a thing, and does not do it, you have a sure test. To take writing, again, as an instance; you can see that in such a sentence a man meant to do something forcible and telling, and to produce a great effect; but, perhaps, it is merely fine writing or bombast. You have at once a measure of the man's powers in that direction.

What he blames, what he praises, are good tests of his character. What he plays at, what he laughs at, are still better tests. All serious work is, to a certain extent, compulsory; but gamesomeness and laughter are, for the most part, involuntary. The serious beaver is always building his house, but, in that constant work of his, shows no peculiarity of beaver character.

It is better, in some respects, to be admired by those with whom you live than to be loved by them. And this, not on account of any gratification of vanity, but because admiration is so much more tolerant than love. If you are admired by those who surround you, you have little to explain, or to justify. They believe in you. And this makes the wheels of life go very smoothly with you. Of course love often infers admiration; but there are many instances in which the two things are utterly dis severed.

For people who are of that eager spirit that they must contend with something, or somebody, there are always the great men of former days to contend with, and, if possible, to be surpassed; and also, there is Nature to be wrestled with, who will not yield her "open secrets" without much compulsion, and who is an antagonist always at hand, offering full scope for our utmost energy and mettle.

FOREIGN NOTES.

ALFRED TENNYSON has returned from his tour in Switzerland.

It is said that more than 10,000 of the richer classes left Paris during the recent election disturbances.

"OUR New Way Round the World" and "Old-town Folks" are among the American books attracting attention in England just now.

THE clerk of the weather furnishes Calcutta with a devastating cyclone once a year regularly, — whether by contract or not is not known.

THE London Leader has changed its shape and commenced to publish a serial novel entitled "A Fast Woman." "The Fast Woman" is rather slow reading.

M. AMÉDÉE ACHARD's last book, "Les Trois Graces," is the history of three sisters, the Graces of the title, the sudden death of whose father drives them to work for a living. One becomes a nun, one a milliner, and afterwards the wife of a Paris shopkeeper, the third a governess, an actress, and a great many other improper things. The encouragement to what Carlyle called, many years ago, the literature of desperation, must be irresistible indeed in France, when M. Achard panders to it as he has done in many parts of this novel.

A RECENT discovery in the Département de la Dordogne of human skeletons coeval with the mammoths, and undeniably appertaining to the earliest quaternary period, presents features of such unusual interest that the French Government have sent

M. Lartet, the distinguished palæontologist, to make a report on the subject. He reports that the bones of five skeletons have been discovered, and that they belong to some gigantic race whose limbs, both in size and form, must have resembled those of the gorilla. But the simian origin of man must not be inferred from these analogies, as the skulls, of which only three are perfect, afford testimony fatal to this theory, having evidently contained very voluminous brains. The skulls are now in the hands of a committee of savans, who are preparing an exhaustive craniological report.

IN the Atlantic Ocean, a little to the west of the Azores, there exists a space seven times larger than all Germany, according to Humboldt, completely covered with a dense mass of marine vegetation. Monsieur Jules Lavinière has proposed to the Société d'Agriculture to make these floating meadows, as they are called by Aviedo, subservient to the purposes of agriculture. His suggestion is that the ships occupied during the summer in cod fishing should in other seasons be employed in conveying this abundant manure to the Azores, where an entrepôt could be established, the weeds pressed and dried, and the mineral salts they contain extracted. Analysis has shown that these weeds possess the same fertilizing properties as those employed as manure on the French coasts, and the Revue Scientifique declares the idea to be "très originale, et peut-être très féconde. Monsieur Lavinière calculates that these floating meadows produce annually sufficient vegetable matter to manure 900,000,000 hectares, a hectare being about an acre and a half.

"THE Harvard boating men," says the Pall Mall Gazette, "are doing their best to prepare for the contests to which they have invited Oxford and Cambridge. They are not accustomed to row with a coxswain, but they are practising almost daily with what they call their 'deadweight,' and the crew are all picked men. The captain, Mr. Loring, is said to be the best man of his time at an oar. There are to be several spare hands brought over in case any of the chosen crew fall ill. Two of these reserves are close upon six feet in height, and muscular in proportion. The race will excite great interest in the United States, and at Harvard much anxiety is felt that Oxford should send its best representatives, so that it may not be said hereafter, 'If we had put so and so in the boat, we could have beaten you.' The London Rowing Club are prepared to treat their transatlantic friends with great hospitality, and they may safely calculate upon receiving equally kind treatment wherever they go. It is only to be hoped that the experiences of the last match between Oxford and Cambridge will not be forgotten, and that by some means or other the steamboats will be kept under proper control."

A LETTER from Samarcand in the Invalides Russe gives an interesting account of the life of the Russians in that town. All the Russian inhabitants, says the correspondent, reside in the citadel except the governor, whose house, however, is so near that he can at any moment take refuge in one of the forts. These are so strong that no Bokharian army could take them. The Emir's palace has now entirely lost its Oriental character, having been converted into a hospital and storehouse for provisions. The mosques are to be used as Russian churches, and one of them is already provided with popes, vestments, and other requisites for that purpose. A club has been opened by the officers of the garrison, and all sorts of luxuries, such as articles for the toilet, toys, ribbons, chignons, &c. are to be had in plenty at the shops. They are very sparsely provided, however, with more common and necessary articles, which are both bad and very dear. "Our pleasures," concludes the correspondent, "are such as might be expected from our situation. Two months ago we were visited by a conjurer, since when the only sight we have had was a Savoyard with a barrel-organ and a monkey."

AN amusing story is told in the Life of the Earl of Dundonald by his son, the present Earl of one of his squabbles with the Brazilian Government, which owed him so much and treated him with such ingratitude. When Brazilian naval commander-in-chief he was, says the son, "in spite of the Emperor's friendship, or rather in consequence of it, insulted in all sorts of ways by the Ministry." He received late one evening trustworthy information that the Ministry had arranged a plan for sending troops to search his flagship while he was on shore at Rio Janeiro, on the pretext that he had concealed on board a large amount of national treasure. Lord Dundonald, or (as he then was) Lord Cochrane, immediately took horse, and rode off to the Emperor's country palace, and demanded to see his Majesty. The gentlemen in waiting refused him entrance, and said that the Emperor had long since retired to bed. "No matter," replied Lord Cochrane, "in bed or out of bed, I demand to see him, in virtue of my privilege of access to him at all times, and, if you refuse permission, you will take the consequences." His Imperial Majesty was not asleep, if in bed, and hearing the altercation and Lord Cochrane's voice, he came out to ask what had brought his naval commander-in-chief there at that hour. Lord Cochrane informed his Majesty of the contemplated plan of searching his ship; there was to be a military review by the Emperor the next day, and while the review was proceeding troops were to be sent on board his ship to offer him this indignity. If they came on board, he told the Emperor, he would treat them as pirates. The story concludes thus:—

" 'Well,' replied his Majesty, 'you seem to know everything; but the plot is not mine, for I am convinced that no money would be found more than we already know of from yourself.' I then entreated his Majesty to take such steps for my justification as would be satisfactory to the public. 'There is no necessity for any,' he replied. 'But how to dispense with the review is the puzzle. I will be ill in the morning; so go home and think no more of the matter. I give you my word your flag shall not be outraged.' The Emperor kept his word, and in the night was taken suddenly ill. As his Majesty was really beloved by his Brazilian subjects, all the native respectability of Rio was early next day on its way to the palace to inquire after the royal health, and ordering my carriage, I also proceeded to the palace, lest my absence might seem singular. On my entering the room, where the Emperor was in the act of explaining the nature of his disease to the anxious inquirers, his Majesty burst into a fit of uncontrollable laughter, in which I as heartily joined, the bystanders evidently, from the gravity of their countenances, considering that we had both taken leave of our senses. The Ministers looked astounded, but said nothing. His Majesty kept his secret, and I was silent."

This was in the reign of Don Pedro I., the father of the now reigning Emperor.

THE THREE OVERHEARD WHISPERS.

I. THE FIRST WHISPER.

NIGHT after night the music clashed in our rear. It was very pleasant and interesting, as we lounged about in our little garden, or took coffee in the small building that served us for a summer-house. We were living in Paris, and, for the sake of economy, quite close to the barriers, for the rents get wonderfully cheaper as you clear away from the Champs Elysées and the Faubourg. Now close to our residence there was some place of public entertainment, the Salle d'Artois, I think they called it. We did not much like the proximity, but there was never any noise or disturbance, and the crash of the music through the summer air was at times pleasant enough. It is astonishing what children in respect to amusement our heroic neighbors are. In the prettiest locality they get up some parody of a theatre or some imitative Mabilles. I am bound to say, however, that our Salle d'Artois was a considerable ornament to our avenue, which converged, like many other identical avenues close by, to the main boulevard and the perpetual rond point. There was a revolving gate to the salle, or jardin, before which the inevitable gendarme lounged, and on each side there was a bowery expanse of foliage, and in the foliage were niched statues, claspedly holding lamps that shed a mild, seductive lustre. The general notion conveyed by the whole was that this illuminated pathway led you on to some ideal hall of dazzling delight; but we knew by the view from our back windows that the place was a mere barn, and that it belonged to that numerous class of entertainments of which the best part is to be seen on the outside and for nothing. A very moderate price, — half a franc, I think, — would give admission, and of this half franc half was to be returned to the ticket-holder in the way of consummation. It was, in fact, a mushroom sort of concert or casino place, of which so many spring up in the outskirts of Paris, and which provided a kind of rough entertainment for local patrons who wanted to do things cheap, and to be saved a journey into Paris.

The salle might be necessary for those people in Les Ternes who insisted upon some kind of amusement every night, and who, rather than not have it, would shoot for nuts or ride on horses in a whirligig. We Britishers do not require much amusement, and when we take it we like it of the very best. I don't know how often I had passed the alluring portal of the salle with its colored lights. I don't know how often I had n't had the benefit of its rapid dance music. But I can truly say that the remotest intention of visiting this choice place of amusement never crossed my mind. Neither can I explain to myself up to this day how I ever came to do so.

I remember that it had been very hot all that day; that I had stopped at home trying all sorts of combinations with ice and eau de Seltz, which had the invariable effect of making things in general much hotter; that in the evening I had gone to two or three places where that day was the reception-day; that I had come back and, as my custom was, had smoked and taken coffee, looked through the Moniteur du Soir and Le Petit Journal, favorite publications in our economical quarter of the city. After that, in the cool of the evening, I took my little constitutional turn round the garden, smelling the wall-flowers that were our chief horticultural ornament. Then I paused. It was onze heures. Being a man of regular habits, as an ordinary matter I should have gone in-door, have tampered with my constitution with some more iced effervescent drink, and composed myself towards slumber with a book. But the music was crashing so emphatically that, to the dismay of the concierge, who, relying on my regular habits, had gone to bed, I sallied forth into the boulevard. "I declare," I said to myself, "I will look up our little salle to-night. There's nobody who will know me. And I've heard the music so often that they ought to see the color of my money."

Near the entrance there was a narrow lane, — about a stone's throw off. I think I see it now, narrow, and so dark from the huge buildings that lined it. And in the lane that night — I remember it so well — was a private cabriolet, with a dark-colored panel, and two servants in livery, waiting in a leisurely way, as servants wait who have waited long and have long to wait. Then I paid my coin, and the enchanted portal received me. I advanced up the fairy path, which came to an abrupt termination at the first curve.

I emerged on a mere shed, uncovered and opening on a bit of ground, the general effect being entirely sordid, the sordid effect harmonizing with all the accompaniments. There was some dancing going on, of an irregular and free-and-easy kind, a few only indulging in terpsichorean vagaries, while many more, seated at little or long tables, looked critically on. Not a few men were in blouses, and some women in caps, a genuine ouvrière class, which had been working hard all day, steadily looking forward to their evening's relaxation. Then there were some very dressy young men, with compan-

Now, as the term "père" is in France only applied to the clergy who belong to the religious orders, and as the curés, vicaires, and others are invariably called "monsieur l'abbé" when spoken of, or to, I took it into my head that this old gentleman must be some sort of monk, who had perhaps forgotten, or perhaps thrown aside, his vows, and was now doing penance in this retreat for his past life. And yet there were certain facts which rendered this supposition very improbable. No man seemed to frequent the church more than the "père François." Not only was he always present at the daily mass, but I often saw him at his private devotions in the building when no one was present, and frequently noticed him at the altar-rails as a communicant. His countenance was that of a man who had seen much trouble and gone through great grief, but by no means one which led me to think he had ever lived a bad life. And yet why should he dress like a priest and not officiate as such? Moreover, the inhabitants of the place, although always ready enough to speak of other people's business, either would, or could, give me no information respecting Père François's antecedents. Whenever they were questioned about him, they turned the conversation into some other channel. Thus it was that, although I had known the little town for some years, and had seen and bowed again and again to the old man, it was only at one of my last visits that I became acquainted with his history, and then only by mere chance.

Père François's real name was Caudret, — Monsieur l'Abbé Caudret. Many years before I had known him, — shortly after the restoration of the Bourbons in France, — he had gone to the ecclesiastical college of St. Sulpice, in Paris, with the intention of studying for the Church. His conduct at that establishment had been most exemplary, and after remaining there the usual four or five years, he had been ordained, and returned to his native diocese in the south, where he was at once appointed vicar in a large town parish. In this position he had remained about six years; and when he left, on his appointment to be curé of a country parish, all his parishioners regretted extremely his departure. He was celebrated as one of the most excellent, self-denying, charitable, zealous, and yet judicious, priests in the diocese, and was equally well spoken of by his bishop, his fellow-clergy, and his parishioners. It was only after ten years spent in the most creditable exercise of his functions, that a cloud, which darkened all his after-life, cast its shadow upon him.

The presbytere (which we should call rectory, or vicarage) of M. Caudret's parish was situated near his church, but at some distance from the rest of the village. The latter was a very poor place, with no other village within six or seven leagues. Between the priest's house and the church, and built about thirty yards from the former, was a small house, consisting of two rooms, very modestly furnished, and called the hospice. In this hospice it was, and had been for many years, the custom to provide lodging for any stray traveller who asked for it, and who was too poor to go to the inn. One night a young woman called at the priest's house, and asked if she might take up her abode for the night at the hospice. She did so; and, as a heavy snow-storm came on next day, she remained the best part of a week, the priest's housekeeper giving her her meals in the kitchen of the presbytere, for she said she was poor, and on the way to her friends in a distant part of France. On the fifth or sixth morning of her sojourn, as she did not make her appearance in time for the early cup of coffee, the housekeeper went to call her, and, to her horror, found the poor creature murdered in her bed.

The alarm was given, and it was evident that a double crime had been committed, rendering her murder all the more infamous. Search was made, and close to her bed was found a knife which belonged to the priest, and which he always kept in his study, — a long Corsican dagger, which he had preserved for years as a curiosity. It was afterwards given in evidence, that when this weapon was found, M. Caudret was observed to turn deadly pale, and almost to faint. Further investigation brought to light that from his study-window, which was on the ground-floor, to the hospice, marks of a man's foot could distinctly be seen coming and going. These marks agreed exactly with a pair of shoes which were found dirty in the study, and which belonged to the priest. A handkerchief of his was, moreover, found in the unfortunate woman's bed, and it had evidently been used as a gag to stop her cries. In a word, circumstances were such, and the evidence against M. Caudret was so strong, that the Maire considered it his duty to arrest him. The people did not know what to believe. Until now his character had been almost that of a saint; now he was discovered as having been guilty of the acts of a demon.

He was taken to Lyons, and there, after numerous tedious interrogations before this and that authority, put upon trial for his life. All he could urge in his defence was, that, during the night, when the crime had been committed, he had been awake by hearing, as he thought, some one in his bedroom. He had called out, and asked who was there, but, receiving no answer, had dozed off again. Subsequently, but he could not say how long after, he had been again awake by the noise, as he thought, of his study-window being opened. He had got up, gone into the study, but, seeing nothing to justify his alarm, had imagined he must have been dreaming, and had gone to bed again. In the morning he had awoken rather later than usual, and missed both his pocket-handkerchief and a pair of shoes that had been the night before in his bedroom. The former he thought he must have dropped somewhere during the day; and he was just going to inquire for the latter, when the alarm of the murder was given, and he had rushed out to see what was the matter. This much, and his antecedents, were all he could urge in his defence. In fact, the accusation seemed to come upon him like a blow, and to deprive him of all energy.

With us in England every accused man is supposed to be innocent until he is proved guilty. I don't say this is always literally the case, but such is the theory of our criminal law, and a very just theory it is. In France it is exactly the contrary. The practice of criminal proceedings in that country is that every accused person is believed to be guilty, until he is proved to be innocent. And such was the case with M. Caudret. He was questioned by this authority, badgered by that, bullied by a third, made to contradict himself by a fourth, and sneered at by a fifth, until he almost believed he was guilty; and yet the very consciousness of his innocence made him desperate. And certainly, if ever circumstantial evidence against a man was strong, it was on this occasion. That he was the most unlikely man in the world to commit any crime,—and particularly such a crime,—every one admitted; and yet they could not help declaring that the evidence against him was terribly clear and distinct. Even some of his brother clergy, most of whom had known him as boy and man for thirty and more years, kept aloof from him, and declared, much as it grieved them to say so, that he was guilty.

The unfortunate priest underwent a long and most heart-breaking trial,—a prolonged mental torture, which can only be inflicted by a French criminal trial. As a matter of course the press was against him. In those days the fact of a priest being guilty of any crime was a subject of joy to the more than half infidel, and always bitterly anti-Catholic, newspaper writers of the period. These writings may or may not have influenced the jury. But, be that as it may, M. Caudret was found guilty, and sentenced to death. He met his fate with fortitude, merely declaring his innocence, and saying that it would be some day or other fully proved that he was innocent. A confessor attended him in his prison, and the authorities of that establishment could not but help noticing that after the first interview of that priest with the convicted man, he at any rate did not believe him to be guilty, although, of course, not a word was divulged of what had passed between the prisoner and himself.

In the days I write of, Charles the Tenth was king of France, and had a very great dislike to see any one, particularly a priest, executed. Although urged by the Minister of the Interior to sanction the capital punishment of M. Caudret, his Majesty obstinately—and, as it turned out, very fortunately—declined to do so, and commuted the sentence to one far worse for any man not an “habitual criminal” to bear, that of travaux forcés at the galleys, what we should call penal servitude, for life. The prisoner accepted the respite without a murmur, but without rejoicing. He was removed to Brest, and in a very short time he and his crime were forgotten by the outer world.

What a man of education, a man refined in his tastes, religious in his ideas, and knowing himself to be innocent, must have undergone at the bains, those only who have seen these establishments, and who know what goes on at those places, can form an idea. Our own penal prisons must be bad enough, but they are havens of rest and peace when compared with those of France. The only good description of these hells upon earth published in the English language was written some years ago by Mr. Sala, in a novel called “The Seven Sons of Mammon.” Those who recollect that writer’s account of the bain at Brest may imagine what M. Caudret had to endure for twenty-five long years of his life, and from which he only escaped at last by almost a miracle.

Charles X. had been dethroned; the Orleans dynasty had ruled over France, and had likewise vanished; the Republic had passed away like a dream; Louis Napoleon had been declared President, and then Emperor of France; and yet M. Caudret lingered in jail. He still wore the hideous yellow garments of a “lifer”; was sneered and jeered at as having been a priest; had to listen daily and hourly to language and tales of which the like could only be heard in the infernal regions; and was treated all the worse by the guardians of the abominable den, because he would not take part in the ribaldry and obscenity of the place. How he bore it—how he did not dash his head against the walls, and get rid of his fearful life—God alone knows. He was never heard in after years to describe what he had passed through, except in a single particular. Throughout the long days and weeks and months and years that he suffered his punishment, he had one, and only one, occasional glimpse of happiness. That was when the priest, who was chaplain of the bain, used to admit him to confession. Then, and only then, did he hear for a brief period some few words of consolation, and listen to the conversation of an educated man like himself.

But whenever he had had one of these interviews with the chaplain, the guardian, or warden of the room, took a devilish pleasure in having him chained for the next few days to some prisoner who was, if possible, more profane, and a greater blasphemer than the others. In other respects, after he was liberated from the bain, M. Caudret, when questioned about the prison, shuddered at the recollection of what he had passed through, but would never enter into particulars. All he would say was that it was far worse, and infinitely more fearful, than any man who had not lived there could imagine.

His liberation was brought about in this way, long after he had given up all hope of ever being released save by death. At the galleys of Toulon, was a convict who had been sentenced to the travaux forcés for ten years, and had undergone nearly the whole of his sentence when he met with a terrible accident, by which he was so injured that the medical men declared he could not live more than a few hours. At first he could not believe them, but after a time, feeling himself getting worse, he accepted the services of the chaplain, of the prison to prepare him for death. The chaplain, who was closeted with him for some time, ended by sending for the governor, and saying that the prisoner had, before he died, a public statement to make.

In the convict prisons in France a similar event is not uncommon, for the intricacies of crime are so bound up with one another, that when a criminal dies he often discloses some mystery connected with his former life. Such was the case with this man. When the governor and the proper attesting persons had assembled round his death-bed in the infirmary, he declared himself to have perpetrated, twenty-five years before, the murder of a woman in the hospice of a village not far from Lyons, for which the cure of the place had been tried, found guilty, and condemned. He gave full details as to how the murder had been committed, as a sequel to the other outrage; and how, in order to divert suspicion, he had entered the cure’s bedroom by the window, taken his shoes, walked in them to the hospice and back, making the footmarks as plain as possible, and had also taken with him the Corsican dagger which he found in his study. Being himself at that time under police surveillance, and afraid that he would be imprisoned unless the scent was thrown upon another person, he smeared the knife in the blood of his victim, so as to make people believe she had been murdered by that weapon. He—the murderer—it was who had taken the priest’s handkerchief, which he found on the study floor, and had put it into the dead woman’s mouth, as if it had been used for a gag. In short, after his deposition had been forwarded to the proper authorities, it was thought to be so truthful that a formal inquiry was made, the judgment given a quarter of a century before was reversed, and the doors of his infernal justice. It was not mere "chat and jabber," as I had termed it. On the face of at least one of them there was an expression of terrible anxiety. The eye was wild, and the arm wildly struck out almost in an attitude of despair. As they once more passed by me, the elder one was speaking, and I heard her say in a compressed whisper of intense emotion, "I should break my heart if she has eloped from the convent with any Frenchman."

So saying they turned abruptly from the alley, and went through a deserted path in the direction of the river.

III. THE THIRD WHISPER.

The next night, my wife and I and the young attaché were at the Théâtre Français at the Palais Royal, occupying a state box.

This was not one of the little amenities, as might be supposed, of journalism. The box had been lent to the embassy, and the embassy had given it to the attaché and the attaché had placed it at our disposal, subject to the pleasant condition of his own excellent company.

It was a most delicious box, such as you often get in Paris, but never in London. The London box retreats into bareness, ugliness, and shadow; but behind sittings in this box there was a perfect miniature little drawing-room, — a salon, cosy with couches and glittering with mirrors, where any number of one's friends might come round and chat between the acts.

The parterre was quite filled, not, as in the London pit, with a plentiful sprinkling of women and children, but with a critical audience of staid men, including, doubtless, a troop of claqueurs, but, nevertheless, sure to give eventually a clear discerning verdict on the merits of a new piece. It was a great night at the Français. There was a new piece by an eminent author, and this was also the début of a new pupil. Consequently, the house was completely filled, and M. Alphonse Kock and his backers were there in great force that night.

The actress was a great success; she was one who, all her industrious and innocent life, had been working for and looking forward to this night. The piece was so good that in a very brief time it was plagiarized for the London and New York stage.

In the interval between the third and fourth acts I had taken up my lorgnette and glanced through the house, and in the stage-box I saw the aristocratic young fellow who had been talking with the pretty English singing-girl at the Salle d'Artois.

That had been on the Monday night. On the Tuesday night we had been out to dinner as I had mentioned. On Wednesday I had been concocting my lucubrations for the Coketown daily paper, which heard "from our own correspondent" (great emphasis on the own), and to-day we were having this dramatic treat at the Français.

"Do you know," I said to the attaché, "who that man is in the upper stage-box opposite, with the bouquet, which I suppose he designs for Mademoiselle Reine?"

"Very likely," returned my diplomatic friend. "Papillon will be quite in love with Mademoiselle Reine. He's a terrible fellow, they say. Would you like to know him?" he continued. "I can introduce you presently. I shall meet him at supper on the boulevards."

"Who is he?" I said.

"Don't you know him? he belongs to the Jockey Club, and is quite a great man just now. His father made all his money on the Bourse; but he is aristocratic looking enough for the Faubourg St. Germain."

"He is one of the Imperialist lot, then, I suppose, — a new man and a rich?"

"O yes, he is rich enough, if he does n't gamble it all away. He has got money and his wife has money."

"You don't mean to tell me that that young fellow is married?"

"O yes, he is. But when his wife has had a month or two at Paris he sends her home into Normandy, and stays on as a bachelor. Lots of men do that. Paris is so expensive that they cut the season down as much as they can."

"Is he a nice fellow?"

"Nice enough, according to Paris notions, but not very nice according to your English notions. A selfish lot, I expect. Very gentlemanly, but all on the surface, like most of them."

I am very punctual and domestic as a rule, but having seen this young fellow under such very different circumstances the other night, I felt a curiosity to meet him. I accordingly accepted the attaché's offer to go with him to the supper at the Maison Dorée.

I put my wife safely into the carriage which we had waiting for us, and strolled with my friend, the Honorable Mr. R——, along the boulevards to the café where we should meet Papillon. There were one or two men from the Jockey Club there, the successful dramatist of the evening, and the attaché with some diplomatic friends, who relieved the labors of the chancellerie with social relaxation at the Maison Dorée.

The supper was pleasant enough, as little Parisian suppers always are. But it is unnecessary that I should speak of it unless in reference to our gay young friend, Monsieur Papillon.

I was introduced to him, and he received me with the utmost empressment. His smile and his shrug were of the stereotyped Parisian character. I acknowledged, however, that his handsome face, his rich complexion, and his kindling eye would very probably make him a lady-killer, and his slightly broken English speech, which on the whole he spoke exceedingly well, and his foreign accent, would prove little hindrance to his killing English ladies. It was easy to see, from the little he said in conversation, that he was devoted to pleasure, and had an utter abnegation of all principle. And so much is this the ordinary state of things in Paris that I have sometimes wondered whether it might not be for the ultimate good of the world that Paris might be held beneath the Atlantic Ocean for a quarter of an hour.

Monsieur Papillon stared rather hard at me, as if haunted by some recollection of my face, but apparently he could not identify it. I had a momentary thought of reminding him of the Salle d'Artois; but, less from any reasonings on the subject than from an instinct, I mentally decided that it would be better not to do so.

He was certainly the most juvenile and joyous of Benedicts, and wore his married chains as lightly as if they were roses. He made one or two jocular allusions to "madame ma femme," stowed away safely in the department of Calvados. As supper became prolonged, Monsieur Papillon said he would send away his carriage. Presently he told one of the waiters to send his servant in to him. At once a rather ill-looking fellow entered, whom I immediately recognized as having seen the other night amusing himself with the coachman while the carriage was waiting in that dark by-street in Les Ternes.

Monsieur Papillon beckoned the man to him and spoke quietly a few words, in that quiet, subdued tone in which people speak to servants when they do not wish to attract attention or to disturb company. Now it so happened that I sat next but one to this gentleman, my diplomatic young friend being interposed between us. I confess that I leaned back in my chair, and using him as far as I could as a screen, I sought to make out anything he might be saying. The attaché spoke to me, and I gave him a mechanical answer. I strained every nerve to hear what I could of that whispered conversation. At last, slightly raising his voice, but without departing from a whisper, he said,—

"Remember, — the Maison Dupont at Fontainebleau."

Soon after I departed. The fun of the party was growing too fast and furious for me. I was very married, and not able to regard connubial ties so slightly as that butterfly Papillon. It was a point of minor morals with me that I should get to bed by midnight. At midnight also the Salle d'Artois closed. Somehow, there was an impulse on my mind that I would go and survey the ground and see what the pretty English singer was doing with herself.

A voiture de remise took me quickly, and I arrived at the suburban place of amusement a good twenty minutes before it closed. But the company was thinning, and in a moment I saw that the principal person I sought was not there. I took some refreshment, and then tried, not unsuccessfully, to imitate the ways of those people who make a point of maintaining friendly relations with waiters and proprietors, in the cafés they frequent.

"Had mademoiselle, the pretty Englishwoman, been singing that night?"

"Yes, but she was gone. She was gone at eleven hours."

"Would she be there to-morrow night?"

"No, — this was her last night. Her engagement was terminated."

"How was that?" I asked next. "She sang very nicely. Did not monsieur the proprietor think so?"

"Yes, certainly, she did sing very well, — for an Englishwoman. But the public required novelties, and it did not do to keep the same singer long before them."

"Had she been there very long?"

"Not very long."

Here the man went away, and to my mind he did not seem to care to discuss the merits of the young lady who had just passed away from his employ.

That night I looked amid the contents of the parcel which M. Kock had sent me from the office for the paragraph to which he had referred, but I could not find it.

IV. IN THE FOREST OF FONTAINEBLEAU.

The next morning while I was dressing I took a sheet of paper and wrote down the three whispers which I had overheard in the course of the last three days.

They were, of course: —

(a) "O, no, no. It cannot be until Friday."

(b) "I should break my heart if she has eloped from the convent with any Frenchman."

(c) "Remember, — the Maison Dupont at Fontainebleau."

The curious notion had somehow wrought itself into my mind that it was possible that these three overheard whispers might stand in a certain relation and connection to each other.

It was just possible, but the chances were utterly against the truth of such a theory. There was indeed a certain speciousness in the idea. It might not be difficult to invent a framework of circumstances into which these three whispers might be tessellated and inwrought. But it was much more easy to suppose that the different whispers belonged to different sets of circumstances standing in no sort of connection to each other. Of course, on any doctrine of chances, the odds were tremendously against the theory of any such correlation as I was supposing. Taking the three sentences in their chronological consecutiveness, what on earth could a Friday have to do with an elopement from a convent, and what on earth could an elopement from a convent have to do with any particular locality at Fontainebleau? And how extremely unlikely it must be that a gay, frivolous, and not over reputable place like the Salle d'Artois could stand in any sort of connection with the staid solemnity of a convent! I had indeed, it is true, certain information beyond these whispers which might have a possible connection with their subject-matter.

There had certainly been an escape from a convent. Here Kock's newspaper paragraph possibly corroborated and identified the second whisper. But I could not see in what possible connection the remark (b) could stand to (a) and (c). It was possible that (a) and (c) might stand in a definite relationship. The chances of a coincidence between the two were immeasurably better than the chances of a coincidence between the three. The existence of that charming gentleman Monsieur Papillon was a connecting link between the two. Was it also possible that his existence could be adumbrated in the second whisper? i. e., "I should break my heart if she has eloped from the convent with a Frenchman." And now the subject which had been gradually growing on my mind made me feel quite hot and feverish. It seemed to me that some woful drama was being enacted that day in which, quite involuntarily, I was called upon to play a principal part. And this very day, of which the golden moments were slipping away so fast, was Friday, the day on which something was to happen, the scene of which was laid at Fontainebleau. I flung down impatiently a set of numbers, which had just come in by post, of the "Coketown Daily Express," although they contained some choice examples of my most careful observations and reasonings in politics.

"There is sometimes," I said to my wife, "a destiny in the overhearing of whispers. Do you remember the cranes of Ibycus?"

But my wife did not recollect the cranes of Ibycus.

"Ibycus," I said, "was a poet, who, travelling through a wild country, fell in company with two evilly disposed men, who set upon him to rob and murder him, in which design they succeeded only too well. The dying poet looked around for succor, but saw nothing but some cranes hovering in the air. 'O ye cranes,' he said, 'avenge Ibycus!' A month or two later his two murderers were in an open-air theatre, and some cranes were visible not far off. 'Behold,' whispered one man to another, 'the cranes of Ibycus!' Now this remark was overheard. Ibycus was bound to this city, and there was surprise and consternation that he had not arrived. It was manifest that these two men, whose physiognomy was probably hardly in their favor, knew something about Ibycus. They were seized, examined separately, and the truth coming out, were both executed. Now these providential cranes brought murderers to justice. But it is manifest, my dear, that the casual over-hearing of a speech was the moving cause of the discovery, though the cranes have always absorbed the credit."

"Well," said my wife, "your overheard whispers gave a time, which is to-day, and a locality, which is Fontainebleau. There may be something worse than murder going on. Why don't you go down to Fontainebleau to-day?"

I was astonished at the direct simplicity of this suggestion, which had not occurred to my mind.

"Because," I answered, "I don't see how a convent can have anything to do with Friday or with Fontainebleau."

"But I thought you gentlemen, if you had a lot of data, did not mind having an x in it, but sought to solve its value in an equation."

This was really clever in the wife, and I thought there was something clever in the notion. Still, I was by no means prepared to fling away a day on spec and make, perchance, a bootless excursion. "But don't wait dinner," was my ultimatum, "for, after all, I might go down to Fontainebleau."

I presently gained the knifeboard of the Courbevoie omnibus and took three sous' worth of danger down to the Louvre. Then I continued to walk down the Rue Rivoli, bethinking myself that it was all in the direction of the railway station whence I must start for Fontainebleau.

But how astonished I was when, just as I gained the beautiful tower of St. Jacques, I came upon the very two women who had so greatly interested me in the garden of the Tuileries the day before yesterday.

Without the delay of a second I advanced to them and took off my hat. I turned to the elder one, who still had evident marks of grief and agitation on her countenance, and said, —

"Madam, will you allow me to speak to you for a few minutes on a very important matter?"

She gave a little shriek. "It must be about Clara, Mrs. Burns. O sir, tell me where is my daughter?"

I asked them if they would step across the road, and enter into the little enclosure around the Tower. We sat down on one of the pleasant benches close by Pascal's statue. The air was scented with flowers, the little children were playing about with their bonnes, and there was the fountain's musical ripple.

"Is your daughter," I asked, "a tall, handsome girl, — sings well, — has fair hair and complexion, but dark eyes, — about nineteen?"

"It must be she. It is the very same. O sir! where is she?"

But I was phlegmatically obliged to say that I had not the least idea of her whereabouts.

They were so downcast at this that I ventured to explain that I thought it possible we might be put on the right track to find her. Then I soon succeeded in getting their little story from them.

The elder lady was the widow of a London merchant, who, having always kept up a costly and luxurious establishment, had left his family only poorly off, owing to a great depreciation in the value of his property. There were several daughters, and it was necessary that at least one or two of them should become governesses, which was hard upon girls who were accustomed to a gay and rather fast life. Mrs. Burns, an Anglo-Parisian friend of Mrs. Broadhurst's, had suggested to her that her daughter should enter a Dominican convent, where a school was kept, on what are called in England "mutual terms." The young lady was to give lessons in English, and receive some lessons in French. Board and lodging were to be provided for her, but no stipend was to be given.

After a time Miss Clara Broadhurst grew exceedingly dissatisfied with her position. The early hours and the plain fare of the convent did not suit her. She had a great notion that she deserved a stipend. She had also a great notion that she had better go upon the stage, or that she might do well as a singer at public concerts. Although the living at the convent was so plain, and the rules so stringent, Miss Broadhurst was not called upon in any degree to be treated as a Roman Catholic inmate would be treated; and all her school work being finished in the morning, she had full range of liberty between the early dinner and the early tea. There appeared to be no doubt but a great deal of this time was spent in the Bois de Boulogne. It appeared that she had made several undesirable acquaintances in Paris, in the case of English and French ladies against whom Mrs. Burns could not actually allege anything, but of whom she disapproved as companions of the daughter of her friend. Latterly Miss Broadhurst had been dropping hints to her mother that she had an opening in life much more to her taste than teaching in a French convent. Then her letters grew rarer, and then they ceased. Later still she disappeared from the convent. She had gone out one afternoon as usual, and had never come back. It had evidently been a step studiously contemplated, for all her clothing and effects, for some days past, had gradually been in course of removal.

[I may here state what subsequently transpired, — that she had obtained an engagement to sing at the Salle d'Artois. I was never able rightly to make out whether she had formed the acquaintance of Monsieur Papillon previous to or during this musical engagement, but have reason to suspect that the former was the case.]

Mrs. Broadhurst had immediately been telegraphed for by her friend Mrs. Burns to come to Paris; and in a state almost of distraction she had been making inquiries everywhere in Paris about her daughter, but had not hitherto met with any success in the search.

Such is a brief outline of the hurried story which they told me, and they now looked impatiently towards me to see what consolation or guidance I could offer them. My own mind was in a state of utter incertitude. I was uncertain even on the question of identification, — whether the girl I had seen was really the Clara Broadhurst who was missing. But here they were positive, and would allow no expression of doubt. I then told my trembling and astonished listeners that, assuming the identity, I knew that their Clara was intimate, and apparently deeply in love with a Frenchman; that I had heard her mention this present Friday to him in a way that looked like an assignation with him; that I knew that on this very day her engagement to sing in public terminated; and I also knew that on this very day the Frenchman was going down to Fontainebleau. The almost irresistible inference was that she was going to accompany him to that place. I also told them that it was my intention to go to Fontainebleau that very day; but I did not think it necessary to say that I was going there simply on account of the young lady unknown, for then they might be building still higher expectations that might prove fallacious. I discovered that if we moved off at once we should be in time for as early a train as Monsieur Papillon was at all likely to take. We caught our train, and in about three quarters of an hour I and my two sudden and unexpected companions arrived at Fontainebleau.

The reader will probably recollect that long, straight road with its rows of straight trees, between the station and the town of Fontainebleau. We looked eagerly to see who might be our companions in the train: but no one whom I could recognize alighted at the station. When we got into the town, and had alighted at an ugly-looking hotel, I persuaded them to have some refreshment, and I endeavored to calm Mrs. Broadhurst's intense nervous excitement. Then I lighted a cigar, and strolled about, settling our plan of operations. My first object was to discover where the Maison Dupont might happen to be. I easily ascertained that it was a very respectable boarding-house kept by M. Dupont, a respectable and responsible man, situated about twenty minutes' ride from the town, on the verge of the forest. Finding that some hours must elapse before the arrival of the next train, I persuaded them to visit the palace and grounds; showed them the spot where the first Napoleon kissed the eagles, and took his farewell; showed them the pond where the third Napoleon tumbled topsy-turvy among the great carp; pointed out the Empress's gondola, which I believed was the very same that Lord Byron had used at Venice, and, in fact, exhausted all my little store of Napoleonic reminiscences. The ladies, however, were hardly in a state of mind that permitted them to do justice to my agreeable and improving vein of anecdote. I thought it best, therefore, to dismiss all notions of sight-seeing, and confine ourselves strictly to the immediate business of the day. Mrs. Broadhurst and I were immediately to proceed to the Maison Dupont, and Mrs. Burns was to return to the station and watch for the runaways. It was curious how the impression that they would arrive had now become rooted in our minds.

We drove leisurely to the locality that had been indicated to me, obtaining glimpses of flowery spaces and deep forest glades. When we arrived at the Maison Dupont, we were ushered into the pleasant presence of Madame Dupont, and, as I had agreed with my companion, I took charge of this sufficiently difficult and embarrassing business.

I asked Madame Dupont if she had any room for any more inmates.

Madame Dupont was very full, and was expecting fresh arrivals. Still, there was one chamber unoccupied.

Mrs. Broadhurst at once said that she would be glad to engage the room for herself.

Might I ask who were the new arrivals? We were daily expecting some friends of ours who were going to sketch in the forest.

She thought it was for a gentleman and his sister. The name was Bertrand. Her two best bedrooms were taken for them, by telegraph. They had also wanted a private sitting-room, but she had only the use of the public rooms to offer them, but for the day at least they would have these rooms pretty well to themselves.

I will now put down in chronological order the few remarkable events of that afternoon.

Good Mrs. Burns waited for many anxious hours at that uninteresting station. It had been arranged that if they came and proceeded anywhere else than to the Maison Dupont she should follow them, and at once communicate with us by a messenger. But if they went to the Maison Dupont her mission was at an end, and she was to return to the hotel, where we would communicate with her.

The eight o'clock train from Paris duly arrived, and then, sure as fate, Mrs. Burns recognized her young acquaintance, Clara Broadhurst, leaning on the arm of a young dandified Frenchman.

"Why, Clara," said the good lady, "what brings you here, and how d'ye do? They told me that you had returned to England. Did n't you like the convent?"

"Madame," said Clara, very haughtily, and speaking in French, "I am sorry that I have no time to speak to you now. I may tell you that I am engaged to marry this gentleman, Monsieur Bertrand, of Marseilles, and have come here on a visit to some of his friends."

The gentleman had calmly ignored the stout English lady, and was hailing a voiture. Clara made a courtesy and swept past her. Mrs. Burns was petrified with astonishment. But she heard the word Dupont in the direction.

When Monsieur and his interesting companion arrived at the Maison Dupont, they were met by the smiling landlady, who told them that she was so sorry that she had no private room for them. There was only a gentleman in a salon, and she understood that he was going almost directly, as soon as he had done some little business for a friend.

There was a gentleman sitting at the window, with his hat in one hand and that day's "Galignani" in the other. This individual was the esteemed Paris correspondent of the "Coketown Daily Express."

As he entered I rose from my seat and faced him. "Ah, Monsieur Papillon," I exclaimed, "I am so happy; what an extraordinary encounter! I had the pleasure of meeting you in very agreeable company last night on the Boulevards."

He shook hands with me hurriedly and gave a forced laugh. "Vous avez tort, Monsieur. I am M. Bertrand, of Marseilles, much at your service. What do you say, — Papillon? it is one good joke. they call me that because I am light-hearted."

"Just as you like," I answered; "it is of no importance, but I don't think our mutual friend, the Hon. Mr. B., of the English Embassy, would take such a liberty with either of us as to make an introduction under false colors."

I noticed that he bit his lips and appeared greatly disgusted. His companion turned first towards him and then towards me her large, inquiring eyes.

"Ah, B., he is what you do call one funny dog."

"And so are you, Monsieur Papillon," I answered. "But how is madame, your wife, — and the charming little infant in Calvados?"

He changed color very much, and muttered a mille tonnerres. Then he seized his companion's resisting hand, and said, smilingly, "Voilà madame."

"No, no, no," I said, laughingly. "That is not

M. Lartet, the distinguished palæontologist, to make a report on the subject. He reports that the bones of five skeletons have been discovered, and that they belong to some gigantic race whose limbs, both in size and form, must have resembled those of the gorilla. But the simian origin of man must not be inferred from these analogies, as the skulls, of which only three are perfect, afford testimony fatal to this theory, having evidently contained very voluminous brains. The skulls are now in the hands of a committee of savans, who are preparing an exhaustive craniological report.

In the Atlantic Ocean, a little to the west of the Azores, there exists a space seven times larger than all Germany, according to Humboldt, completely covered with a dense mass of marine vegetation. Monsieur Jules Lavinière has proposed to the Société d'Agriculture to make these floating meadows, as they are called by Aviedo, subservient to the purposes of agriculture. His suggestion is that the ships occupied during the summer in cod fishing should in other seasons be employed in conveying this abundant manure to the Azores, where an entrepôt could be established, the weeds pressed and dried, and the mineral salts they contain extracted. Analysis has shown that these weeds possess the same fertilizing properties as those employed as manure on the French coasts, and the Revue Scientifique declares the idea to be "très originale, et peut-être très féconde." Monsieur Lavinière calculates that these floating meadows produce annually sufficient vegetable matter to manure 900,000,000 hectares, a hectare being about an acre and a half.

"THE Harvard boating men," says the Pall Mall Gazette, "are doing their best to prepare for the contests to which they have invited Oxford and Cambridge. They are not accustomed to row with a coxswain, but they are practising almost daily with what they call their 'deadweight,' and the crew are all picked men. The captain, Mr. Loring, is said to be the best man of his time at an oar. There are to be several spare hands brought over in case any of the chosen crew fall ill. Two of these reserves are close upon six feet in height, and muscular in proportion. The race will excite great interest in the United States, and at Harvard much anxiety is felt that Oxford should send its best representatives, so that it may not be said hereafter, 'If we had put so and so in the boat, we could have beaten you.' The London Rowing Club are prepared to treat their transatlantic friends with great hospitality, and they may safely calculate upon receiving equally kind treatment wherever they go. It is only to be hoped that the experiences of the last match between Oxford and Cambridge will not be forgotten, and that by some means or other the steamboats will be kept under proper control."

A LETTER from Samarcand in the Invalides Russe gives an interesting account of the life of the Russians in that town. All the Russian inhabitants, says the correspondent, reside in the citadel except the governor, whose house, however, is so near that he can at any moment take refuge in one of the forts. These are so strong that no Bokharian army could take them. The Emir's palace has now entirely lost its Oriental character, having been converted into a hospital and storehouse for provisions. The mosques are to be used as Russian churches, and one of them is already provided with popes, vestments, and other requisites for that purpose. A club has been opened by the officers of the garrison, and all sorts of luxuries, such as articles for the toilet, toys, ribbons, chignons, &c. are to be had in plenty at the shops. They are very sparsely provided, however, with more common and necessary articles, which are both bad and very dear. "Our pleasures," concludes the correspondent, "are such as might be expected from our situation. Two months ago we were visited by a conjurer, since when the only sight we have had was a Savoyard with a barrel-organ and a monkey."

AN amusing story is told in the Life of the Earl of Dundonald by his son, the present Earl of one of his squabbles with the Brazilian Government, which owed him so much and treated him with such ingratitude. When Brazilian naval commander-in-chief he was, says the son, "in spite of the Emperor's friendship, or rather in consequence of it, insulted in all sorts of ways by the Ministry." He received late one evening trustworthy information that the Ministry had arranged a plan for sending troops to search his flagship while he was on shore at Rio Janeiro, on the pretext that he had concealed on board a large amount of national treasure. Lord Dundonald, or (as he then was) Lord Cochrane, immediately took horse, and rode off to the Emperor's country palace, and demanded to see his Majesty. The gentlemen in waiting refused him entrance, and said that the Emperor had long since retired to bed. "No matter," replied Lord Cochrane, "in bed or out of bed, I demand to see him, in virtue of my privilege of access to him at all times, and, if you refuse permission, you will take the consequences." His Imperial Majesty was not asleep, if in bed, and hearing the altercation and Lord Cochrane's voice, he came out to ask what had brought his naval commander-in-chief there at that hour. Lord Cochrane informed his Majesty of the contemplated plan of searching his ship; there was to be a military review by the Emperor the next day, and while the review was proceeding troops were to be sent on board his ship to offer him this indignity. If they came on board, he told the Emperor, he would treat them as pirates. The story concludes thus:—

" 'Well,' replied his Majesty, 'you seem to know everything; but the plot is not mine, for I am convinced that no money would be found more than we already know of from yourself.' I then entreated his Majesty to take such steps for my justification as would be satisfactory to the public. 'There is no necessity for any,' he replied. 'But how to dispense with the review is the puzzle. I will be ill in the morning; so go home and think no more of the matter. I give you my word your flag shall not be outraged.' The Emperor kept his word, and in the night was taken suddenly ill. As his Majesty was really beloved by his Brazilian subjects, all the native respectability of Rio was early next day on its way to the palace to inquire after the royal health, and ordering my carriage, I also proceeded to the palace, lest my absence might seem singular. On my entering the room, where the Emperor was in the act of explaining the nature of his disease to the anxious inquirers, his Majesty burst into a fit of uncontrollable laughter, in which I as heartily joined, the bystanders evidently, from the gravity of their countenances, considering that we had both taken leave of our senses. The Ministers looked astounded, but said nothing. His Majesty kept his secret, and I was silent."

This was in the reign of Don Pedro I., the father of the now reigning Emperor.

THE THREE OVERHEARD WHISPERS.

I. THE FIRST WHISPER.

NIGHT after night the music clashed in our rear. It was very pleasant and interesting, as we lounged about in our little garden, or took coffee in the small building that served us for a summer-house. We were living in Paris, and, for the sake of economy, quite close to the barriers, for the rents get wonderfully cheaper as you clear away from the Champs Elysées and the Faubourg. Now close to our residence there was some place of public entertainment, the Salle d'Artois, I think they called it. We did not much like the proximity, but there was never any noise or disturbance, and the crash of the music through the summer air was at times pleasant enough. It is astonishing what children in respect to amusement our heroic neighbors are. In the prettiest locality they get up some parody of a theatre or some imitative Mabille. I am bound to say, however, that our Salle d'Artois was a considerable ornament to our avenue, which converged, like many other identical avenues close by, to the main boulevard and the perpetual rond point. There was a revolving gate to the salle, or jardin, before which the inevitable gendarme lounged, and on each side there was a bowery expanse of foliage, and in the foliage were niched statues, claspedly holding lamps that shed a mild, seductive lustre. The general notion conveyed by the whole was that this illuminated pathway led you on to some ideal hall of dazzling delight; but we knew by the view from our back windows that the place was a mere barn, and that it belonged to that numerous class of entertainments of which the best part is to be seen on the outside and for nothing. A very moderate price, — half a franc, I think, — would give admission, and of this half franc half was to be returned to the ticket-holder in the way of consumation. It was, in fact, a mushroom sort of concert or casino place, of which so many spring up in the outskirts of Paris, and which provided a kind of rough entertainment for local patrons who wanted to do things cheap, and to be saved a journey into Paris.

The salle might be necessary for those people in Les Ternes who insisted upon some kind of amusement every night, and who, rather than not have it, would shoot for nuts or ride on horses in a whirligig. We Britishers do not require much amusement, and when we take it we like it of the very best. I don't know how often I had passed the alluring portal of the salle with its colored lights. I don't know how often I had n't had the benefit of its rapid dance music. But I can truly say that the remotest intention of visiting this choice place of amusement never crossed my mind. Neither can I explain to myself up to this day how I ever came to do so.

I remember that it had been very hot all that day; that I had stopped at home trying all sorts of combinations with ice and eau de Seltz, which had the invariable effect of making things in general much hotter; that in the evening I had gone to two or three places where that day was the reception-day; that I had come back and, as my custom was, had smoked and taken coffee, looked through the Moniteur du Soir and Le Petit Journal, favorite publications in our economical quarter of the city. After that, in the cool of the evening, I took my little constitutional turn round the garden, smelling the wall-flowers that were our chief horticultural ornament. Then I paused. It was onze heures. Being a man of regular habits, as an ordinary matter I should have gone in-door, have tampered with my constitution with some more iced effervescent drink, and composed myself towards slumber with a book. But the music was crashing so emphatically that, to the dismay of the concièrge, who, relying on my regular habits, had gone to bed, I sallied forth into the boulevard. "I declare," I said to myself, "I will look up our little salle to-night. There's nobody who will know me. And I've heard the music so often that they ought to see the color of my money."

Near the entrance there was a narrow lane, — about a stone's throw off. I think I see it now, narrow, and so dark from the huge buildings that lined it. And in the lane that night — I remember it so well — was a private cabriolet, with a dark-colored panel, and two servants in livery, waiting in a leisurely way, as servants wait who have waited long and have long to wait. Then I paid my coin, and the enchanted portal received me. I advanced up the fairy path, which came to an abrupt termination at the first curve.

I emerged on a mere shed, uncovered and opening on a bit of ground, the general effect being entirely sordid, the sordid effect harmonizing with all the accompaniments. There was some dancing going on, of an irregular and free-and-easy kind, a few only indulging in terpsichorean vagaries, while many more, seated at little or long tables, looked critically on. Not a few men were in blouses, and some women in caps, a genuine ouvrière class, which had been working hard all day, steadily looking forward to their evening's relaxation. Then there were some very dressy young men, with compan-

Madame Papillon. Unless I am greatly mistaken, that is Miss Clara Broadhurst."

She started up, almost as if shot. "O sir! and do you know me? And is not this gentleman M. Bertrand, of Marseilles?"

"My child," I answered, "his name is Papillon. He is a member of the Jockey Club at Paris. His place is in the north of France, where he has left his wife."

She cast on him a look of the most indignant reproach. Then she burst into a flood of tears and began to moan. "O, what shall I do? What shall I do? My mother, my poor mother! O I wish I had never come to Paris! O my mother, where are you?"

"I am here, my child," said Mrs. Broadhurst, and she calmly glided from the petite salon adjoining, and folded her weeping daughter in her arms.

When I went up to Paris a few hours later by the night mail, among the gentlemen in the smoking compartment I recognized, with much satisfaction, my young friend, M. Papillon. He was very affable and offered me a light.

Miss Clara Broadhurst afterwards sang in a London concert-room. After a very short term of professional life, however, she married a very worthy man. I wonder, however, whether he—or indeed either of them—altogether knew about the curious incident of The Three Overheard Whispers.

APPARENT DEATH.

VERY lately the present writer was requested to attend, on a Monday morning, the funeral of a lady sixty-seven years of age, the wife of the mayor of a small French town, who had died in the night between the Thursday and the Friday previous. On the company assembling, the curé informed us that the body would remain where it was for a while, but that the usual ceremonies (except those at the cemetery) would be proceeded with all the same. We therefore followed him to the church, and had a funeral service without a burial. It transpired that the body was still quite warm, and presented no signs of decomposition.

In the ordinary course of things, this circumstance might not have prevented the interment; but the poor lady herself had requested not to be buried until decomposition should have begun beyond the possibility of mistake; and the family remembered, and regretted, that her brother had been put into the ground, three days after his death, while still warm, and with his countenance unchanged. They had occasionally felt uneasy about the matter, fearing that they might have been too precipitate in their proceedings. So in this case they resolved to take no irrevocable step without the full assurance of being justified in doing so. The corpse was kept uninterred long after every doubt was set at rest. Certainly we manage some things better in England than in France; amongst them being the interval allowed to elapse between death and interment. Still, there are circumstances and cases which, even here, afford matter for serious reflection.

It will easily be supposed that the dangerous briefness of this interval has been urged upon the attention of the French Legislature, and been ably discussed by the French medical press. In 1866, a petition was presented to the Senate from a person named De Cornol, pointing out the danger of hasty interments, and suggesting the measures he thought requisite to avoid terrible consequences. Amongst other things, he prayed that the space of twenty-four hours between the decease and the interment now prescribed by the law should be extended to eight-and-forty hours.

A long debate followed, in which Cardinal Donnet, Archbishop of Bordeaux, took a leading part. He was decidedly of opinion that the petition should not be set aside by the "order of the day," but that it should be transmitted to the minister of the interior for further consideration and inquiry. Some of the venerable prelate's remarks produced so great an effect on his auditors as to merit particular mention. He said he had the very best reasons for believing that the victims of hasty interments were more numerous than people supposed. He considered the regulations on this head prescribed by the law as very judicious, but unfortunately they were not always executed as they should be, nor was sufficient importance attached to them. In the village where he was stationed as assistant curate in the first period of his sacerdotal life, he saved two persons from being buried alive. The first was an aged man, who lived twelve hours after the hour fixed for his interment by the municipal officer. The second was a man who was quite restored to life. In both these instances a trance more prolonged than usual was taken for actual death.

The next case in his experience occurred at Bordeaux. A young lady, who bore one of the most distinguished names in the department, had passed through what was believed to be her last agony, and as, apparently, all was over, the father and mother were torn away from the heart-rending spectacle. At that moment, as God willed it, the cardinal happened to pass the door of the house, when it occurred to him to call and inquire how the young lady was going on. When he entered the room the nurse, finding the body breathless, was in the act of covering the face, and indeed there was every appearance that life had departed. Somehow or other, it did not seem so certain to him as to the bystanders. He resolved to try. He raised his voice, called loudly upon the young lady not to give up all hope, said that he was come to cure her, and that he was about to pray by her side. "You do not see me," he said, "but you hear what I am saying." Those singular presentiments were not unfounded. The words of hope reached her ear and effected a marvellous change, or rather called back the life that was departing. The young girl survived, and in 1866 was a wife, the mother of children, and the chief happiness of two most respectable families.

The last instance related by the archbishop is so interesting, and made such a sensation, that it deserves to be given in his own words.

"In the summer of 1826, on a close and sultry day, in a church that was excessively crowded, a young priest who was in the act of preaching was suddenly seized with giddiness in the pulpit. The words he was uttering became indistinct; he soon lost the power of speech, and sank down upon the floor. He was taken out of the church, and carried home. Everybody thought that all was over. Some hours afterwards, the funeral bell was tolled, and the usual preparations were made for the interment. His eyesight was gone; but if, like the young lady I have mentioned, he could see nothing, he could nevertheless hear; and I need not say that what reached his ears was not calculated to reassure him. The doctor came, examined him, and pronounced him dead; and after the usual inquiries as to his age, the place of his birth, &c., gave permission for his interment next morning. The venerable bishop, in whose cathedral the young priest was preaching when he was seized with the fit, came to his bedside to recite the De Profundis. The body was measured for the coffin. Night came on, and you will easily feel how inexpressible was the anguish of the living being in such a situation. At last, amid the voices murmuring around him, he distinguished that of one whom he had known from infancy. That voice produced a marvellous effect, and excited him to make a superhuman effort. Of what followed I need say no more than that the seemingly dead man stood next day in the pulpit, from which he had been taken for dead. That young priest, gentlemen, is the same man who is now speaking before you, and who, more than forty years after that event, implores those in authority not merely to watch vigilantly over the careful execution of the legal prescriptions with regard to interments, but to enact fresh ones, in order to prevent the recurrence of irreparable misfortunes."

A remarkable pamphlet, Lettre sur La Mort Apparente, Les Conséquences Réelles des Inhumations Précipitées, et Le Temps Pendant lequel peut persister L'Aptitude à être Rappelé à la Vie, by the late regretted Dr. Charles Londe, records accidents which are more likely than the preceding to occur in England. Even were the bathing season not at hand, deaths by drowning are always to be apprehended. We therefore cite the following:

On the 13th of July, 1829, about two o'clock in the afternoon, near the Pont des Arts, Paris, a body, which appeared lifeless, was taken out of the river. It was that of a young man, twenty years of age, dark complexioned, and strongly built. The corpse was discolored and cold; the face and lips were swollen and tinged with blue; a thick and yellowish froth exuded from the mouth; the eyes were open, fixed, and motionless; the limbs limp and drooping. No pulsation of the heart nor trace of respiration was perceptible. The body had remained under water for a considerable time; the search after it, made in Dr. Bourgeois's presence, lasted fully twenty minutes. That gentleman did not hesitate to incur the derision of the lookers-on, by proceeding to attempt the resurrection of what in their eyes was a mere lump of clay. Nevertheless, several hours afterwards, the supposed corpse was restored to life, thanks to the obstinate perseverance of the doctor, who, although strong and enjoying robust health, was several times on the point of losing courage, and abandoning the patient in despair.

But what would have happened if Dr. Bourgeois, instead of persistently remaining stooping over the inanimate body, with watchful eye and attentive ear, to catch the first rustling of the heart, had left the drowned man, after half-an-hour's fruitless endeavor, as often happens? The unfortunate young man would have been laid in the grave, although capable of restoration to life! To this case, Dr Bourgeois, in the Archives de Médecine, adds others, in which individuals who had remained under water as long as SIX HOURS were recalled to life by efforts which a weaker conviction than his own would have refrained from making. These facts lead Dr. Londe to the conclusion that, every day, drowned individuals are buried, who, with greater perseverance might be restored to life.

Nor is suffocation by foul air and mephitical gas a rare form of death in the United Kingdom. It is possible that suspended animation may now and then have been mistaken for the absolute extinction of life. Dr. Londe gives an instructive case to the purpose. At the extremity of a large grocer's shop, a close, narrow corner, or rather hole, was the sleeping-place of the shopman who managed the night sale till the shop was closed, and who opened the shutters at four in the morning. On the 16th of January, 1825, there were loud knocks at the grocer's door. As nobody stirred to open it, the grocer rose himself, grumbling at the shopman's laziness, and proceeding to his sleeping-hole to scold him. He found him motionless in bed, completely deprived of consciousness. Terror-struck by the idea of sudden death, he immediately sent in search of a doctor, who suspected a case of asphyxia by mephitism. His suspicions were confirmed by the sight of a night-lamp, which had gone out, although well supplied with oil and wick; and by a portable stove containing the remains of charcoal partly reduced to ashes.

In spite of a severe frost, he immediately had the patient taken into the open air, and kept on a chair in a position as nearly vertical as possible. The limbs of the sufferer hung loose and drooping, the pupils were motionless, with no trace either of breathing or pulsation of the heart or arteries; in short, there were all the signs of death. The most approved modes of restoring animation were persisted in for a long while, without success. At last, about three in the afternoon, that is, after eleven hours' continued exertion, a slight movement was heard in the region of the heart. A few hours afterwards the patient opened his eyes, regained consciousness, and was able to converse with the spectators attracted by his resurrection. Dr. Londe draws the same conclusions as before; namely, that persons suffocated by mephitism are not unfrequently buried when they might be saved.

We have had cholera in Great Britain, and may have it again. At such trying times, if ever, hurried interments are not merely excusable, but almost unavoidable. Nevertheless, one of the peculiarities of that fearful disease is to bring on some of the symptoms of death, the prostration, the coldness, and the dull, livid hues, long before life has taken its departure. Now Dr. Londe states as an acknowledged fact that patients pronounced dead of cholera have been repeatedly seen to move one or more of their limbs after death.

While M. Trachez (who had been sent to Poland to study the cholera) was opening a subject in the dead-house of the Bagatelle Hospital in Warsaw, he saw another body (that of a woman of fifty, who had died in two days, having her eyes still bright, her joints supple, but the whole surface extremely cold), which visibly moved its left foot ten or twelve times in the course of an hour. Afterwards, the right foot participated in the same movement, but very feebly. M. Trachez sent for Mr. Searle, an English surgeon, to direct his attention to the phenomenon. Mr. Searle had often remarked it. The woman, nevertheless, was left in the dissecting-room, and thence taken to the cemetery. Several other medical men stated that they had made similar observations. From which M. Trachez draws the inference: "It is allowable to think that many cholera patients have been buried alive."

Dr. Veyrat, attached to the Bath Establishment, Aix Savoy, was sent for to La Roche (Department of the Yonne), to visit a cholera patient, Thérèse X., who had lost all the members of her family by the same disease. He found her in a complete state of asphyxia. He opened a vein; not a drop of blood flowed. He applied leeches; they bit, and immediately loosed their hold. He covered the body with stimulant applications, and went to take a little rest, requesting to be called if the patient manifested any signs of life. The night and next day passed without any change. While making preparations for the burial, they noticed a little blood oozing out of the leech-bites. Dr. Veyrat, informed of the circumstance, entered the chamber, just as the nurse was about to wrap the corpse in its winding-sheet. Suddenly a rattling noise issued from Thérèse's chest. She opened her eyes, and in a hollow voice said to the nurse: "What are you doing here? I am not dead. Get away with you." She recovered, and felt no other inconvenience than a deafness, which lasted about two months.

Exposure to cold may also induce a suspension of vitality, liable to be mistaken for actual death. This year, the French senate has again received several petitions relative to premature interments. The question is serious in a country where custom (to say nothing of law) rules that burials shall take place within eight-and-forty, seventy-two, or at most ninety-six hours after death. And, considering the length of time that trances, catalepsies, lethargies, and cases of suspended animation have been known occasionally to continue, it is scarcely in England less interesting to us, though public feeling, which is only an expression of natural affection, approves, and indeed almost compels, a longer delay. The attention of the French Government being once more directed to the subject, there is little doubt that all reasonable grounds for fear will be removed.

The petitioners have requested, as a precaution, that all burials, for the future, should, in the first instance, be only provisional. Before filling a grave, a communication is to be made between the coffin and the upper atmosphere, by means of a respiratory tube; and the grave is not to be finally closed until all hope of life is abandoned. These precautions, it will be seen at once, however good in theory, are scarcely practicable. Others have demanded the general establishment of mortuary chambers, or dead-houses, like those in Germany. And not only the petitioners, but several senators, seem to consider that measure the full solution of the problem. Article 77 of the Civil Code prescribes a delay of twenty-four hours only; which appears to them to be insufficient. Science, they urge, admits the certainty that death has taken place, only after putrefactive decomposition has set in. Now, a much longer time than twenty-four hours may elapse before that decomposition manifests itself. Deposit, therefore, your dead in a mortuary chapel until you are perfectly sure, from the evidence of your senses, that life is utterly and hopelessly extinct.

In Germany coffins, with the corpses laid out in them, are placed in a building where a keeper watches day and night. During the forty years that this system has been in force, not a single case of apparent death has been proved to occur. This negative result cannot be cited as conclusive, either for or against the system. In a country where a million of people annually die, an experiment embracing only forty-six thousand corpses is too partial to be relied on as evidence. Moreover, mortuary chambers exist only in a few great centres of population; and it is especially in small towns and country districts, where medical men are too busy to inspect the dead, that premature interments are to be apprehended.

Out of Germany, as in England and France, there might be a great difficulty in getting the population to accept and make use of mortuary chambers. And even if favorably looked upon in large cities, the rich, as in Germany, would refuse to expose their dead there to the public gaze. In the country and in isolated villages the plan would be impossible to carry out. M. Henri de Parville, while announcing the existence of an infallible test for distinguishing apparent from real death, protests that to wait until a body falls into decomposition is just as opposed to French habits, to hygiene, and to the public health, as mortuary chambers are unacceptable by the public in general. He holds that the legislature has already adopted the wiser and more practical measure. The permission to inter a corpse cannot be granted until the civil officer has gone to see the body of the deceased. When the Article 77 of the Civil Code was under discussion by the Council of State, Fourcroy added: "It shall be specified that the civil officer be assisted by an officer de santé, — a medical man of inferior rank to a doctor of medicine, — because there are cases in which it is difficult to make certain that death has actually occurred, without a thorough knowledge of its symptoms, and because there are tolerably numerous examples to prove that people have been buried alive." In Paris, especially since Baron Haussmann's administration, Article 77 has been strictly fulfilled; but the same exactitude cannot be expected in out-of-the-way nooks and corners of the country, where a doctor cannot always be found, at a minute's warning, to declare whether death be real or apparent only. It is clear that the legislature has hit upon the sole indisputable practical solution; the difficulty lies in its rigorous and efficient application.

It has been judiciously remarked that it would be a good plan to spread the knowledge of the sure and certain characteristics which enable us to distinguish every form of lethargy from real death. It cannot be denied that, at the present epoch, the utmost pains are taken to popularize every kind of knowledge. Nevertheless, it makes slow way through the jungles of prejudice and vulgar error. Not long ago it was over and over again asserted that an infallible mode of ascertaining whether a person were dead or not was to inflict a burn on the sole of the foot. If a blister full of water resulted, the individual was not dead; if the contrary happened, there was no further hope. This error was unhesitatingly accepted as an item of the popular creed.

The Council of Hygiène, applied to by the government, indicated putrefaction and cadaverous rigidity as infallible signs of actual death. In respect to the first, putrefaction, a professional man is not likely to make a mistake; but nothing is more possible than for non-professionals to confound hospital rotteness, gangrene, with true post-mortem putrefaction. M. de Parville declines to admit it as a test adapted for popular application.

Moreover, in winter, the time required for putrefaction to manifest itself is extremely uncertain.

The cadaverous rigidity, the stiffness of a corpse, offers an excellent mode of verifying death; but its value and importance are not yet appreciable by everybody, or by the first comer. Cadaverous rigidity occurs a few hours after death; the limbs, hitherto supple, stiffen; and it requires a certain effort to make them bend. But when once the faculty of bending a joint is forcibly restored, — to the arm, for instance, — it will not stiffen again, but will retain its suppleness. If the death be real, the rigidity is overcome once for all. But if the death be only apparent, the limbs quickly resume, with a sudden and jerking movement, the contracted position which they previously occupied. The stiffness begins at the top, the head and neck, and descends gradually to the trunk.

These characteristics are very clearly marked; but they must be caught in the fact, and at the moment of their appearance: because, after a time, of variable duration, they disappear. The contraction of the members no longer exists, and the suppleness of the joints returns. Many other symptoms might be added to the above; but they demand still greater clearness of perception, more extended professional knowledge, and more practised habits of observation.

Although the French Government is anxious to enforce throughout the whole Empire the rules carried out in Paris, it is to be feared that great difficulties lie in the way. The verification of deaths on so enormous a scale, with strict minuteness, is almost impracticable. But even if it were not, many timid persons would say: "Who is to assure us of the correctness of the doctor's observations? Unfortunately, too many terrible examples of their fallibility are on record. The professional man is pressed for time. He pays a passing visit, gives a hurried glance; and a fatal mistake is so easily made!" Public opinion will not be reassured until you can show, every time a death occurs, an irrefutable demonstration that life has departed.

M. de Parville now announces the possibility of this great desideratum. He professes to place in any one's hands a self-acting apparatus, which would declare, not only whether the death be real, but would leave in the hands of the experimenter a written proof of the reality of the death. The scheme is this: It is well known that atrophine — the active principle of belladonna — possesses the property of considerably dilating the pupil of the eye. Oculists constantly make use of it, when they want to perform an operation, or to examine the interior of the eye. Now, M. le Docteur Bouchut has shown that atrophine has no action on the pupil when death is real. In a state of lethargy, the pupil, under the influence of a few drops of atrophine, dilates in the course of a few minutes; the dilatation also takes place a few instants after death; but it ceases absolutely in a quarter of an hour, or half an hour at the very longest: consequently, the enlargement of the pupil is a certain sign that death is only apparent.

This premised, imagine a little camera-obscura, scarcely so big as an opera-glass, containing a slip of photographic paper, which is kept unrolling for five-and-twenty or thirty minutes by mean of clock-work. This apparatus, placed a short distance in front of the dead person's eye, will depict on the paper the pupil of the eye, which will have been previously moistened with a few drops of atrophine.

It is evident that, as the paper slides before the eye of the corpse, if the pupil dilate, its photographic image will be dilated; if, on the contrary, it remains unchanged, the image will retain its original size. An inspection of the paper then enables the experimenter to read upon it whether the death is real or apparent only. This sort of declaration can be handed to the civil officer, who will give a permit to bury, in return.

By this simple method a hasty or careless certificate of death becomes impossible. The instrument applies the test, and counts the minutes. The doctor and the civil officer are relieved from further responsibility. The paper gives evidence that the verification has actually and carefully been made; for, suppose that half an hour is required to produce a test that can be relied on, the length of the strip of paper unrolled marks the time during which the experiment has been continued. An apparatus of the kind might be placed in the hands of the minister or one of the notables of every parish. Such a system would silence the apprehensions of the most timid. Fears — natural enough — would disappear, and the world would be shocked by no fresh cases of premature burial.

IN THE HEART OF THE EARTH.

I THINK we created some excitement at Falmouth. Unconventional in our attire, merry in our deportment, excited in our demeanor, and altogether imbued with that excellent Mark Tapscott philosophy of being "jolly under any circumstances," it is small wonder that we did create some excitement at Falmouth. We have none of us a word to say against Falmouth, — a charming, health-giving, and delightful spot, in the most beautiful of all English counties, Cornwall, — indeed, we are all of us inclined to mark with a white stone the day that the Falmouth expedition was proposed in a certain smoking-room, of which history knoweth not, but individuals a very great deal. The little army that invaded the place of which I am speaking, where the sea is of the bluest and the harbor of the grandest description, was mixed in its tastes, talent, and temper. In this consisted our jollity. We gave and took; smothered our absurdities; advertised our excellences; offended no one, and seldom laid ourselves open to giving offence. I am not egotistical, for I am speaking of the party in its collective form. We behaved prettily on all occasions. It was too hot to put ourselves out of temper, and the society too pleasant to suggest boredom. If young Cecil, the budding poet, chose to read Tennyson's Idyls, — backed up most strongly by Isaline Langworthy, with the fair hair and blue eyes, — on the pleasant cliff underneath the castle, we raised no objection. Those who cared to hear Cecil spout listened; and those who detested poetry went to sleep. If the famous Farquaharson, briefless barrister, orator, and sucking politician, chose to discuss Mr. John Stuart Mill and the female franchise, women's rights and the rest of it, — backed up most strongly by Maude Carruthers, with the raven hair and olive complexion, — we allowed him to rap his knuckles on the table, and talk us into a semi-idiotic state of stupor. If Harry Armstrong found delight in bringing his London manners into Cornwall, and preferred the society of a certain soft-eyed little divinity who sold newspapers and gum-arabic in the town to our sweet society, we allowed him to make excuses for deserting us, and, with the exception of a little innocent and unavoidable "chaff," he was free to "spoon" all day in the stationer's shop for aught we cared. We excused Lillian Corner's scales and morning exercises, for the sake of her Heller, Hiller, Schubert, and Chopin; her tarantellas, moonlight sonatas, and reveries, with which we were favored in the evening if we behaved ourselves very prettily. The "irrepressible Edgar," as we used to call the youngest male member of our community, was allowed to give full vent to his overflowing spirits all day long, provided he woke us betimes in the morning to get our matutinal plunge in the blue waters that curled themselves refreshingly into "Summer Cove." And what of our host and hostess? Theirs indeed was a rule of love; and as they allowed us to do exactly as we liked, we were the more considerate in meeting their wishes, and pulling all together.

We had vainly imagined that we had seen everything worth seeing in the environs of Falmouth, and enjoyed ourselves as much as is consistent with human nature, when our party received a valuable addition. A certain sweet songstress of whom the world has heard, and of whom the world will ere long hear a great deal more, came down amongst us to breathe her native air, and get new inspirations and health from the woods and caverns and rocks and sea-music, with which we were surrounded.

But the songstress did not come alone. She brought her sweet voice and all our old pet songs; the songs set to words which were poetry, and the words wedded to music which breathed of love, and was therefore quite unsealable; she brought her cheery manner and her indomitable pluck,—she has been in the saddle during the late American campaign for days and days, has this sweet songstress of mine,—and she brought her brother.

Her brother was such a good fellow that I must really introduce him with a little bit of preface. He was, if I may make use of an expression, most puzzling at school, and most useful in after life,—a walking oxymoron. He was an Englishman, and not an Englishman. An Englishman he was in heart, and speech, and bearing; but destiny had stolen him away from his native land years ago, to shed his cheeriness on other climes.

So much, however, did he love the old country, that once in every three or four years he wended his way back again,—the lucky swallow!—his pockets full of gold, and his heart full of love, to spend a holiday in England and a little fortune in generosity.

During these holiday trips he never left his sister or his parents; and as his sister and his parents had chosen to run down to Falmouth, like a dutiful fellow, Washington followed them thither.

We were at breakfast when Washington burst in upon us at Falmouth; and breakfast at Falmouth was not such an early meal as it might have been. With that generosity and unselfishness which is characteristic of Englishmen, I will at once exculpate the whole male portion of our party.

The irrepressible Edgar was bound to wake us in the morning; and we were always on our backs in the sea by eight o'clock. But the women! oh, those dear women! Well, generally speaking, we had but little to complain of. They were cheerful, and bore the fatigue which strong-legged men not unfrequently impose upon fragile women without a murmur; but they were not proof against the nightly exercise of that highly necessary, but eminently female organ, the human tongue! At ten o'clock, deceptive yawns were chorused forth, to take us off our guard, and persuade us to allow them to go to bed. Not an objection was urged. The poet perhaps looked somewhat more lachrymose than usual, and the orator came to a dead stop in an able harangue on the "Female Franchise"; but Isaline's hand was squeezed by the poet, and Maude's eyes followed by the orator, without another murmur at ten o'clock.

I am bound to confess that I don't altogether consider that the poet or the orator were quite fairly treated. Ten minutes after Isaline and Maude had disappeared in a bevy of beauty, the strangest, wildest, and most discordant noises proceeded from the upper regions.

That strange freemasonry of women which exists solely and entirely in the upper regions, at a time which should be devoted to sleep and rest, puts aside all thoughts of weariness previously assumed. Then commence the monkey-tricks of women. They wrestle and they plunge, they dance fandangos in limited attire, they vie with one another in feats of agility and fancy; they talk, they do one another's hair, they do anything but that for which they left the sweet society of males,—go to sleep!

The consequence is that, having devoted the freshest part of the night to folly, they have to devote the smallest part of the night to sleep. And when the morning comes, the great hungry men, ravenous from fresh air and salt water, have to fling pebbles and sand and gravel up at the windows in the upper regions, from which the tantalizing sirens will never emerge.

And so it came about that Washington found us at breakfast at an unorthodox hour, and we all got outrageously chaffed. We very soon saw that there were to be no half-measures with Washington. He did not intend allowing the grass to grow under his feet. His stay in England was limited, and that which had to be done was evidently to be "done quickly."

I must say that, up to the time of Washington's arrival, we had not made the most of our time. In the little smoking-room in which the expedition had been arranged, all sorts of excursions and drives, and picnics and sails, had been mapped out.

But, once at Falmouth, we dreamed away our time. It was very pleasant. We bathed till breakfast, and basked till lunch, and lounged till dinner, and sang and strolled till tea, and talked till bedtime; and so day after day slipped away, and Washington found us at breakfast prepared for another day's dream.

I suppose we wanted a leader. Energy—that is to say, personal energy—was out of the question. Washington assumed the vacant directorate and led us. It was a case of "Ibimus! Ibimus! utcumque precedes Washington."

To tell the truth, it was Washington who persuaded me to go into the heart of the earth.

He did not begin rashly or impetuously. He did not frighten me with an accurate description of the "man-engine," and the "bucket," and the interminable ladders; but in a light and airy way,—before all the girls, by the by,—he led the conversation gently up to mines and mining adventures. He told us how the Princess of Wales and a talented contributor to "Punch" had been down the Botallack; and then taking stock of me, after a preliminary examination of my biceps and a general examination of other muscular developments, he asked me how I should like to be introduced to the Wheal Isabel.

"Of all things in the world," I said, "provided she be young and good-looking. But why Wheal? Is it a sign of endearment or a token of respect? Am I to understand from the mysterious word Wheal that Isabel is a Cornish Countess, or a Gypsy Queen? Introduce me to the Wheal Isabel? Certainly! Wheal or woe Isabel, could anything unfortunate be synonymous with such a charming appellation?"

"Hold hard!" he said; "this Cornish air of ours has filled you too full of ozone. Restrain your ardor. Isabel is not an enchanting maiden fashioned by your poetical imagination. She is no gardener's daughter, no maid of Tregedna, no coast mermaid, no Cornish beauty. She is black, deep, dirty, and terrible. She will cause you a ten-mile ride, trouble, fatigue, and some little expense; but the Wheal Isabel is worth knowing."

"In Heaven's name, then," said I, "who or what is she?"

"The Wheal Isabel," said he, "is one of the largest mines in this magnificent district; and if you would like to be introduced to her you shall."

"Coal?" said I, shuddering.

"Or tin?" echoed the mucilaginous Armstrong.

"Gold, no doubt," whispered Isaline in my ear.

"Nonsense," said Washington; "copper."

I very soon saw that at this very early period of the entertainment there was no getting out of an introduction to Wheal Isabel.

The curiosity of the women was fairly aroused. And that was quite enough.

In an instant the programme was mapped out entirely to the satisfaction of the girls. We were all to ride over to the Wheal Isabel under the mentorship of Washington, and I was to be the unhappy victim sacrificed on the copper altar.

Friend Washington, who, at one time, had been all cockahoop about the dangers and daring of the expedition, got out of it, or rather of the fatiguing part of it, with that irritating air of indifference peculiar to leaders of expeditions.

"You know, my dear fellow, I have seen these kind of things so often before, that it is really hardly worth while the trouble of changing one's clothes for it," said he, with that charming tone of superiority which is so comforting to the man who knows that he is about to make a fool of himself for the benefit of his fellow-creatures. "But I would advise you to go down," he added, suspicious that I would back out of it at the last moment. "You will never regret it."

And then he cleverly magnified me into a hero, whereas the girls said pretty and complimentary things, and the expedition was finally arranged. Our cavalcade was not altogether pretty to look at, but I think it may be safely termed a good one to go. Falmouth was not great in saddle-horses.

We had a 'bus-horse, a hearse-horse, a fly-horse, a wall-eyed horse, and a broken pummel. With these excellent assistants to a ten-mile ride along the Cornish roads, we started, amidst much laughter of parents, and cheering of neighboring butcher-boys, on our journey to the Wheal Isabel.

Very black and barren grew the land as we neared the Queen of Copperdom. The trees, somehow or other, left off growing; the fields seemed sown with ashes instead of grass; tall chimneys emitted huge volumes of smoke, and deserted shafts, broken wheels, and grimy-looking monsters met us at every turn.

When four cross-roads met amidst a labyrinth of shafts and out-houses in the centre of a blackened heath, we drew rein.

"I think this must be the place," said Washington. He was right. A stalwart Cornishman came out to meet us, and to him we presented our credentials, addressed to the Captain of the Mine.

The captain was somewhat disappointed, I think, when he found that we were not all to be indoctrinated into the mysteries of mining. Miners are, after all, but men, and the laughing merriment of our joyous girls had already won over the rough heart of the honest miner.

"No, it is only this gentleman," said the treacherous Washington, with the old tone of superiority again. "I have been down mines scores of times."

This was all very well of Washington vaunting his superiority in this way, but why should he, by implication, assert that I was a fool because I was a novice, and because I had not been down a mine?

I was quite prepared to go through all the dirty work, but I wanted to be thought a hero, not a jackass.

The girls stood by me bravely. Their sympathy relieved me from some of the humiliation I felt, and they seemed determined, at all events, that I should not go down into the heart of the earth without a cheer.

I was handed over to the tender mercies of a sub-captain, who hinted that it would be as well if two other miners were told off as a private escort, to guard me through the lower regions.

"It's as well to have two or three with you, sir," said he; "they treat you with more respect down below, and they're a rough lot, I can tell you."

I assented, of course. At such a time it would, by no manner of means, be politic to dissent from anything or anybody.

For the next hour or so my life was in the hands of the slaves of the Wheal Isabel.

The sub-captain led me into a little out-house, where he personally superintended my toilet. I had imagined that it would merely be necessary to put a rough canvas suit over my ordinary clothes. But I was very soon disabused of this notion.

"We must have everything off, sir," said my guide, in a soothing medical tone, as if he were about to operate on me. "It's an awfully dirty place down there."

The costume will bear description. I was first encased in flannel, clean, of course; and over this came an old clay-stained, muddy, stiff miner's suit. My feet were wrapped in two flannel dusters and then thrust into a pair of old miner's shoes, miles too big for me. On my head was placed a very stiff billy-cock hat, literally as hard as iron, smeared with tal-low grease. On the brim in front the captain dabbed a lump of clay, and into this he stuck a farthing rushlight. About half a dozen more rushlights were suspended to my waist, and I was then pronounced ready for action.

On our way across the open to the hut in which our party was resting, my attendant asked me which way I intended to go down. Asked me, indeed! as if I knew what the good fellow was talking about. I was only anxious not to look a fool and to do exactly what I was told. I must own that I felt a perfect child in his hands.

"Will you go down," said he, "by the ladders, or by the bucket, or by the man-engine?"

He might just as well have asked me the Hindostance for Wheal Isabel.

"The ladders," said he, by way of explanation, "are the most tiring and the most tedious. You will take a good hour to get down by the ladders. The bucket is a dirty way of going down; besides, in this mine, it is used alone for bringing up the rubble and the ore, and any interference with this arrangement stops the working of the mine. Now the man-engine is the quickest way, and it is the way all the men here go down. Would you like to try it?" and then he added, looking at me, "but you must be very careful."

This was the first suggestion that had been made to me that there was any danger in my undertaking. Now the principle of the bucket and the ladders I naturally understood, but I had no more idea what a man-engine was than the man in the moon. My mentor, for some mysterious reason of his own, kept on quietly pressing the superior advantage of the man-engine. And so I consented. If I had only known then, at that quiet moment, away from the laughing girls and the heroic Washington, what I was undertaking, and the mortal agony I was about to endure, my prudence would most certainly have got the better of my pride, and I should have been whizzed quietly down in the dirty bucket.

But as it was, in my ignorance and in the innocence of my heart, I decided for the man-engine; and in a minute more I was ushered into the hut.

My quaint appearance was the signal for a loud burst of laughter. Some would "never have known me, would you?" others pronounced me a fright; but one little soft angelic voice declared me to be "a handsome young miner."

"You're sure you are all right?" said the same little confiding voice. "Have you had some brandy?"

"All right," said I, feeling very pale. "I should think so. Particularly now."

"But how are you going down?" said the sweet voice; "the captain has been telling us all about it."

"By the man-engine."

"For mercy's sake, don't! it's very dangerous if you're not accustomed to it. He told me so."

That tone of entreaty persuaded me more than ever that I would take the most dangerous route. It was very brutal, I know, but at such a time I would sooner have died than shown the white feather.

They escorted me towards the infernal machine like a criminal on his road to execution.

"Set it a going, Bill," said the sub-captain; and then in a few terse sentences he explained the principle of the engine.

Two parallel horizontal bars provided with iron steps at intervals of about ten yards, were forever working up and down, up and down. The method of getting down the shaft was by passing from bar to bar and from step to step the very instant the word "Change" was given. It was essentially requisite to change the moment the word of command was given, and to make no bungle or shuffle about the operation. The engine waited for no man. There was no possibility of calling a halt, and no saving hand to catch one if a mis was made. All one's safety rested with one's self. One false step or false clutch at the next rung, and it would have been all over with me. Now this fun was all very well with the daylight shining down the shaft, when one could see the iron steps and see the handles, but in the pitch darkness it was simply awful. The rushlight in one's hat gave little or no light; and it was ten chances to one if the water dashing off the sides of the shaft did not extinguish it.

They practised me at first for a turn or two about a hundred yards up and down the shaft, and even in the daylight I bungled a little.

"You must change quicker, sir," said my guide; "if the iron steps knock against you, it will be all up with you."

I was very pale, I know, after the first short practice. I felt that I was doing a madcap act; I know that the men ought to have stopped me; the little voice, now quite trembling, begged me not to go; but I bit my lips and vowed I would not show the white feather.

"Do you think you are all right, sir?" said my guide. "Will you go? You must decide now finally."

"All right," I said.

And then the bell rung and down we went. I saw the little face,—it was the very last thing I saw,—and upon my honor I really and truly felt that I should never see that little face again except by a miracle.

But there was no time then to think of anything but my own safety.

That terrible monotonous word "Change" came ringing out from the dark depths of the shaft, uttered by the sub-captain on the next ledge below me. And I knew that my life depended upon every change.

Hours, days, years, yes, and centuries, seemed to pass between every change. It was like a hideous nightmare. The awful suspense between every word of command; the feeling that something terrible might happen next time; the loneliness of my situation, the darkness of the shaft, the rush of the water, the glimmer of the rushlights going down; the sad hollow echo of the captain's voice giving the word of command, and exhorting me to be careful, now kindly, now fearfully; all these things combined made up as hideous a day-dream as it is possible to conceive.

For full five-and-twenty minutes I was in this awful suspense, and in that time went through about five hundred changes.

At last, half blinded with beads of cold perspiration and nearly dead with fright, I heard the welcome bell ring again, and I was safe on the first ledge of the mine.

The man-engine went no further, and the rest of the journey had to be accomplished by ladders. I never told the men what I suffered, but in a rough, kindly way I was congratulated on my feat.

"I never thought you would have come, sir," said one. "It frightens most after the first turn."

"Can't you signal up that we are all safe?" said I, thinking of the little face.

"Yes, sir, to be sure."

And they did.

The signal came back again, "Thank God!" and all the miners took off their hats at the last signal. They are pious fellows, these Cornish miners.

I was quite two hours away from my friends, groping about, now on my hands and knees, now down ladders from ledge to ledge, now in a stooping position, now erect in the dark, mysterious corridors I found in the heart of the earth. It was hot, — stifling hot, hotter than the very hottest room in a Turkish bath. But the stalwart, half-clad men working away at the ore were so interesting, and the metal sparkled so on the ground, and the scene was so strange and fascinating, that I could not tear myself away.

On and on I went, still forever walking on. I was very thirsty, and would have given anything for a draught of beer. But no stimulants of any kind are found in the heart of the earth. I was allowed, however, to put my mouth to the bung-hole of a water-barrel, and very refreshing was the draught.

"You can walk on like this for hours, sir," said the captain, seeing I was tired, and still determined not to give in.

"Is it pretty much the same?"

"I think you have seen all now," said he.

So we went back.

"Which way will you go?" said my guide. I was very tired.

"In the bucket," I said, without any hesitation.

With my pockets laden with copper ore, and in the rough embrace of a stalwart miner, — for it was close quarters for two in the bucket, — we were swung up to the daylight.

Dash went the bucket against the sides of the shaft, through which the water oozed and trickled and splashed. Lighter and lighter it became, until, at last, I saw above me the clear, blue, cloudless sky; and, half dazzled with the glaring light, and blinking like an old owl, I arrived safe and sound on terra firma.

They greeted me with another loud peal of laughter, louder and merrier than the last. My appearance was certainly not prepossessing. I was covered with red mud from head to foot, hot, dishevelled, wild, and weary. And then "I smelt so pah!" as Hamlet says. However, a refreshing cold bath, a hair-brush, rough towels, and a change of clothes soon made me presentable; and after an excellent luncheon in the board-room of the owners of the Wheal Isabel, we were all very soon trotting away towards Falmouth.

One word more. A brooch made from the copper ore I brought up from the mine rests on the neck of the owner of the little face which is looking at me as I write from a distant corner of the room. Sometimes when I am out of sorts — which is not very often now — I wake up suddenly from a disturbed dream in my old arm-chair, and fancy somehow that the little face is gone, that there is a strange singing in my ears, and from a dark unearthly vault a voice keeps moaning, "Change."

[BY PROFESSOR SEELEY.

In the famous controversy between Julius Cæsar and Brutus, the present age takes a different side from the last. Brutus used to be considered in the right, but public opinion now declares for Cæsar. Cæsar's partisans, however, may state their case in two ways. They may represent him as having simply achieved a great administrative reform, and made government more efficient at the expense of republican liberties. This they may consider to have been on the whole a necessary and useful work, and they may respect Cæsar as a practical statesman, who had the wise hardihood to abolish venerated institutions when they had become, in the lapse of time, mischievous. But it is also possible to represent him as a great popular hero, the hope of all the subject nationalities of Rome, carried to power in their arms, and executing justice in their behalf upon the tyrant aristocracy that had oppressed them. If we take this view, no admiration or enthusiasm for him can be too ardent; and we not only regard Brutus and Cæsar differently from our fathers, but, as it were, reverse their positions. Cæsar becomes Brutus, and Brutus Cæsar. Brutus is now the tyrant, for he represents the oppressive aristocracy, and Cæsar is the tyrannicide, who armed himself in the cause of the nations, and stabbed the oppressor, once at Pharsalus, again at Thapsus, and again at Munda.

This latter view might be supported if we could assume that all the consequences of the revolution which Cæsar conducted were intended by him and by his party. By that revolution in the end the exclusive domination of the Roman aristocracy and of the City was destroyed; the provincials, who before had been insolently oppressed, now began to be more considered and more mercifully treated. If this could not have happened without the deliberate intention of those who achieved it, then the Cæsarians become at once enlightened Liberals, and Cæsar the greatest Liberal leader that ever lived. We are obliged, then, to suppose a vast tide of enthusiastic sentiment pervading the better part of the citizens, and the provincials moved by an ecstatic hope as the champion of mankind advances towards his final triumph, striking down one after another the enemies of the good cause. The Roman revolution is thus made to resemble the French, and Cæsar becomes a hero, a paragon, in whom appear the popular talents of Mirabeau, without his betrayal of the popular cause; the high aims of the Girondins, without their illusions; and the genius of Napoleon for war and government, without his egotism and brutality.

But the truth is that what Cæsar and his party intended is to be carefully distinguished from what they actually accomplished. The revolution had many beneficial results, which were indirect and little contemplated by its principal authors. If we study the movement itself we shall find that Cæsar was no champion of the provincials, that his party had no notion of redressing the wrongs of the provincials, that they were inspired by no desire to establish any general principle whatever, and by no enthusiasm except a military enthusiasm for their leader. The true nature of the revolution will very clearly appear, and its resemblance to the French Revolution will be shown to be an illusion.

It is certain, in the first place, that Cæsar did not in any degree owe his elevation to the favor of the provincials. He owed his elevation to the admirable efficiency of his army, and to his admirable use of it. This army contained no doubt Gallic auxiliaries, but the great muster of provincials was on the side of the Senate. Cæsar's provincial auxiliaries were better drilled, and, like his Roman legionaries, they were no doubt personally attached to him; but that he was the champion of their interests against the Senate never occurred to them. There is no trace that the provinces conceived themselves to have any special interest in the quarrel. According to their personal connections with the two leaders they ranged themselves on one side or the other, — the East for the most part with Pompeius, while Gaul was at the service of Cæsar. Their hearts, apparently, were not in the contest at all; but, if we ask on which side were their hands, we shall be obliged to reply that so little did they understand Cæsar to be their champion that the majority of them were ranged against him on the side of their oppressors.

But let us go on to ask, Why should they have regarded Cæsar as their champion? What was there in his career which might lead them to suppose him more kindly disposed to them than any other proconsul of his time? His most conspicuous act was the conquest of Gaul. Let it be granted that the greatest service he could do to Gaul was to conquer it. Let us even grant, for the sake of argument, that he was himself aware of this, that he acted from purely philanthropical motives, and distinctly understood the conquest of Gaul to be a necessary stage of the evolution of humanity. Still his conduct was surely of a nature to be misunderstood by Gaul itself and by the provincials generally.

His good-will towards the non-Roman populations was not so apparent that it could not be mistaken. He stood before them covered with the blood of slaughtered Gauls, an object certainly more pleasing to Rome than to the subjects of Rome. He might not be detested so much as the plundering, peculating proconsuls, but he must have been more feared; and so far from appearing to the provincials a deliverer from the tyranny of Rome, he must have seemed to represent and embody that tyranny in its most irresistible and inexorable form.

But perhaps Cæsar had, at some earlier time, identified himself with the provincials; perhaps he had introduced measures calculated to better their condition and enlarge their franchises; perhaps he had expressed disgust at the treatment they met with, and sympathy with their suffering. The answer is, that he had not distinguished himself in any such way. One or two prosecutions of extortionate provincial governors which he had undertaken could not give him any such distinction. Such prosecutions were recognized as the established way by which young men brought themselves into notice, and also as an established way of annoying the Senate. Yet these prosecutions were the only service he had ever rendered the provinces. In his consulship, at the time when he was the recognized leader of popular legislation, he had not appeared as the champion of the provincials, but of quite a different class, whose interests were, if anything, somewhat antagonistic to the interests of the provincials, — the poorer class of Roman citizens.

Again, if Cæsar was no champion of the provincials, neither was his party, nor those earlier leaders of the party to whose position he had succeeded. Their constituency from the beginning had been a different one. When the great controversy was opened by Tiberius Gracchus, there were in the Roman world, not to count the slaves, three aggrieved classes: first, the poorer class of Roman citizens; secondly, the Italian allies, who had not yet been admitted to the Roman citizenship; thirdly, the provincials. Now if the party which the movement of Gracchus called into existence, and which went on increasing its influence until, in the person of Julius Cæsar, it triumphed over itself and its enemies together, had really been the party of the provincials, — if the Gracchi, and Marius, and Saturninus had been representatives of the interests of the empire as against the interests of the ruling city, they would have taken up the cause of all these aggrieved classes. The Italian allies, and still more the provincials, as the most numerous and the most oppressed class, would have claimed a larger share of their sympathy than the poor Romans. Yet, in fact, none of these leaders had ever said a word about the provincials, except, indeed, to propose that lands taken from them should be granted to Roman colonists. On the Italian allies they had not been altogether silent. Caius Gracchus had even undertaken their cause, but it then appeared clear not only that the party he represented was a different one, but that it was a party decidedly hostile to the Italians. The inclusion of the Italians in the colonization scheme of Marius also, according to Appian, "gave offence to the democracy." The truth is that there had been men in Rome whose liberality was real and comprehensive, but they were not among the democratic leaders, the predecessors of Cæsar. Two men in particular had disregarded party watchwords, and had indulged sympathies not purely Roman. Both of them were aristocrats, and inclined rather to the senatorian than to the popular party. These were Scipio Æmilianus and the great Roman Whig Drusus. The former died probably by the hand of an assassin when he was on the point of bringing forward the cause of the Italians. The other succeeded for a moment in effecting a coalition between a section of the noblesse, a section of the people, and the Italians, and was prevented by an accursed dagger from earning a place among the most beneficent statesmen of all history.

The Italians forced their way through the pale of citizenship by a war in which the Senate and the democracy were allied in deadly hostility to them. Marius, the uncle and immediate predecessor of Cæsar, fought against them in this war, no less than Sulla, the champion of the aristocracy. When Cæsar appeared upon the scene, therefore, the cause of the Italians was already won, and there remained only two aggrieved classes, — the Roman proletariat, crushed for the time by Sulla, and the provincials. Now it was the former, not the latter of these classes of which Cæsar made himself the champion. The provincials, as such, found no champion. Particular misgoverned provinces were from time to time patronized by rhetoricians who were equally ready, as Cicero showed himself, to take a brief from accused and evidently guilty governors; but neither Cæsar, nor any one else, ever raised the cry of justice to the provincials. Except in the case of the Transpadane province, — a province only in name, being within the limits of Italy, and already in possession of the inferior or Latin franchise, — Cæsar connected himself before the civil war with no measure of enfranchisement, and had given no pledge to the world that any oppressed class except the Roman populace would be the better, or have any reason to be thankful, for his success. No writer of the time regards Cæsar in the light of an emancipator. Cicero gives no hint that Cæsar's partisans defended his conduct on those grounds. That somewhat vacillating politician repeatedly in his letters balances the two parties against each other. He explains why, on the whole, he prefers Pompeius, but he has much to say against Pompeius also. In these letters we might expect to find Cæsar's championship of the provincials, if he had ever undertaken, or was supposed to have undertaken, any such championship, discussed, and either allowed or rejected. Cicero, as a student of philosophy, was quite alive to enlarged and philanthropic considerations; if any such considerations made for Cæsar, we should surely have heard of it. But there is nothing in his letters to show that in the hot discussions which must have been everywhere going on any general principles were appealed to by the Cæsarians; that it had occurred to any Cæsarian to suggest, what occurs so naturally to us who know the sequel, that it was a monstrous injustice that the world should be governed in the interest of a single city, that the Senate were the authors and supporters of this system; that Cæsar was the man to put it down, and had undertaken to do so. The Cæsarians were a party without ideas.

It is most easy to delude ourselves into the belief that what actually happened was intended to happen; and since in this revolution the provinces did something towards throwing off the yoke of Rome, to describe the revolution as a convulsive effort on the part of the provinces to throw off the yoke of Rome. But the facts are before us, the process by which the revolution was accomplished can be clearly traced, and we can see that the provinces had no share at all in the revolution by which they ultimately benefited; that it was a purely Roman movement; that the evil — for there was such an evil — which the revolutionaries struggled against was of quite a different nature, and that the relief which the imperial system actually brought to the provincials was an indirect and secondary consequence of a general improvement in the machinery of government.

How, then, did the revolution really come about? Undeniably the immediate cause of the revolution was the practice, which had gradually sprung up, of conferring upon eminent generals for special purposes powers so extravagant as to enable the holders of them to rise above the laws. Where such a dangerous practice prevails revolution is at once accounted for. Such an experiment may be tried and no revolution follow; but at Rome it was tried often, once too often. How, then, came the Romans to adopt such a practice? What, on the one hand, was the occasion which led them to appoint these dangerous dictators? On the other hand, how came they to overlook the danger? To both these questions it is possible to give a satisfactory answer, and to answer these questions is to explain the revolution.

Republicanism at Rome, though successful and glorious for so long a time, had, perhaps, always been, as a creed, confined to a class. Long after the expulsion of the kings, it had been necessary to watch with extreme jealousy every individual who drew public attention too exclusively to himself. Cassius, Manlius, Mælius, perished for their eminence, and this shows how large a proportion of the citizens were felt still to retain monarchical predilections. But the republic succeeded so well that such jealousy at length became unnecessary; the glory and the regal disposition of Africanus brought no danger to liberty, though they clouded the last years of the hero himself with moody discontent. The disease, however, was only kept under, it was not cured. The government of a person was the instinctive preference of the lower orders, though the great families were able, as it were, to divide their allegiance among themselves. Anything which should weaken or disorganize this firm union of ruling houses, anything which should sever the lower orders from them, would in a moment bring the monarch upon the stage again. For more than half a century after the mortal struggle with Hannibal the ascendancy of the nobles over the lower orders continued unbroken, and then, through the mere growth of the population and change of circumstances, it began to decay. It was simply a moral ascendancy; by the constitution, the rabble of Rome could at any time take into their own hands legislation and government.

The first Gracchus, with perfectly pure intentions, showed them the way to do this. The second Gracchus, influenced perhaps by revenge and party hatred, took this city rabble in hand, organized them, and formed them into a standing army of revolution. Spurious Mælius, in an earlier age, had been suspected of aiming at the tyranny when he sold corn at a low price to the poor during a famine. Caius Gracchus adopted the same plan. By his lex frumentaria he at once demoralized, and attached to the cause of revolution, a vast class which had before been in the tutelage of the aristocracy. The bond was now broken that attached the people to the hereditary rulers. And how little this people cared for republican liberty became apparent the moment it began to think and act for itself. It did not at once destroy the existing government. The habit of deference and obedience long remained in a people naturally as deferential and fond of aristocracy as the English themselves. But as soon as any cause of discontent arose, or public needs became pressing, they took refuge at once in a monarch, whom they created, indeed, only for a limited period, but from whom they neither took nor cared to take guarantees that he would ever give back into their hands the power which they had intrusted to him. Thus Caius Gracchus was supreme until his liberality began to include the Italians. Marius was supreme for five years, — had, in fact, a longer reign than Julius Cæsar. Pompey in his turn received as much power as he cared to use; and, finally, by the Vatinian law, the people plainly told Cæsar that they were his subjects as soon as he chose to be their king. At this point the people disappear; in all subsequent contentions the two parties are the Senate and the army.

Still the people showed no eagerness for revolution. As I said, it was only in cases of need that they created a monarch. And it was only because these cases of need occurred frequently that monarchs were frequently created.

And here arises the second question, what were these needs for which no other expedient could be devised? Perhaps it was the oppression practised by the senatorial governors upon the provincials. If so, then it would be true that the imperial system was introduced in the interest of the subject nationalities. But nothing of the kind appears. In the quarrels between the Senate and the moneyed class (called knights), the wrongs of the provincials are often paraded, for both the Senate and the moneyed class had a strong interest in the provincials, the one as governors, the other as tax-farmers. But the democracy never concerned themselves in any way with the treatment of the provincials, for it was a question which did not at all affect their interests. Quite different were the reasons which led them to call in dictators, and, if we examine the different cases, we shall find that the real motive was always the same. There was one evil to which the empire was constantly exposed; one evil to cure which, and to cure which alone, the imperial system was introduced.

What made the people give supreme power to Marius, and continue it to him for five years? First, the failure of the aristocratic government to carry on the war with Jugurtha; afterwards, the imminent danger of the empire from the Cimbri and Teutones. What made them give extraordinary powers to Pompey, and afterwards extend and increase them? First, the alarming spread of piracy in the Mediterranean, stopping trade and threatening the capital with famine; next the necessity of exerting unusual power to crush Mithridates. What made them give extraordinary powers to Cæsar? Rumors of an intended emigration of the Helvetii, raising apprehensions of a danger similar to that which Italy had experienced from the Cimbri invasion. Nothing can be more certain than the connection of cause and effect in these cases. The history of the introduction of imperialism is briefly this: government at Rome was so little centralized that the empire was unable to grapple with any really formidable enemy that assailed it either from without or within. To save themselves from destruction they were compelled, or thought themselves compelled, to resort frequently to the obvious expedient of a dictator. The more frequently they did this, the more did the republican government fall into disuse and contempt, the more did men's minds and habits adapt themselves to a military régime. The new scheme of government, whenever it was tried, succeeded. It accomplished that for which it was created. It gave the empire inward security and good order; it crushed foreign enemies, and extended the boundaries of dominion from the Rhone to the Straits of Dover, and from the Mediterranean to the Euphrates. What wonder that in the end it supplanted the older constitution, when its advantages were so unmistakable, and the one thing it took away, Liberty, was that which the proletariat of Rome and the democracy of Italy had never either understood or valued?

The Jacobins used to think of Cæsar as a great aristocrat, patriotically assassinated by the noble sans-culotte, Brutus. I confess it seems to me not much less untrue to describe him as a champion of nationalities, and a destroyer of aristocratic privilege and exclusiveness. It was the war-power, not the people, that triumphed in him. The people, indeed, — that is, the people of Italy, — were, in the first instance, the authors of his elevation, but it was not enfranchisement that they wanted, it was simply military protection. The enemies they feared were not a Catullus or a Cato, but Helvetian or German hordes. It was not aristocratic privilege they rebelled against, but aristocratic feebleness, — the feebleness which had led to the shameful treaty with Jugurtha and the bloody defeat of Arausio.

That the revolution was a triumph, not of liberalism, but of military organization, will become still clearer if we now proceed to examine the new institutions which it introduced.

Had Cæsar lived longer, he would no doubt have stamped a liberal character upon his work. Though he was no champion of the provinces, and though he owed his elevation immediately to the army, and only remotely to the democracy, yet his disposition was liberal, and his statesmanship bold, original, and magnanimous. He might, therefore, have developed at once and forced into ripeness those germs of good in the new system which, as it was, ripened but slowly. He might have taken away from Italy that unjust precedence in the empire which she retained for three centuries, and raised the provinces to citizenship and participation in the honors of the state. This he might have done; but had he done it he would have accomplished another revolution. That the empire at that time did not require such changes, even if it would have borne them, is plain from the fact that his successor, Augustus, was able to found a secure and durable imperial system, — was able, in fact, to conduct the movement which his uncle had begun to its natural goal, without appealing to any liberal tendencies. Augustus was in all things aristocratically disposed; his institutions bear the stamp of a conservative, exclusive, old Roman spirit. This did not prevent him from proving a most efficient successor to the liberal-minded Cæsar. It did not prevent him from being more completely successful than almost any statesman in history. The explanation of this is, that Liberalism was not of the essence of Cæsar's work. It adorned his character, and helped him in his early struggles, but the revolution he accomplished was independent of it, and when divorced from it could go on just as prosperously as before.

After the new system had been permanently settled in the tranquillity of the Augustan age, the great change which had passed over the empire was found to be this: A standing army had been created and thoroughly organized, a uniform taxation had been established throughout the empire, and a new set of officials had been created, all of a military character, all wielding greater power than the republic had been accustomed to intrust to its officials, but, on the other hand, all subject to the effective and rigorous control of the emperor. In other words, in the place of anarchy there had come centralization and responsibility.

We have heard much lately of the power which all organisms possess of differentiating special organs to meet special needs. The operation of this law is very visible in human society. In fact, it might be maintained that the whole history of a state is the record of a series of such differentiations. To take a simple example from Roman history: At an early time the kings, and afterwards the consuls, were at the same time generals in war and judges in peace. Life had not yet become complex. But, as population and activity increased, these functions showed a tendency to separate. At first all that the citizens were conscious of was, that it was necessary to have three men instead of two to do the work. So they created a prætor, with precisely the same functions as the consuls. But nature knew better, and by the gradual operation of a silent decree took away from the consuls their judicial functions, and from the prætor his military functions. Thus a differentiation was accomplished; and whereas there had been before but one organ of government, there were now two unlike each other: and whereas before all authority was conceived as of one kind, it was now regarded as twofold, administrative and judicial. Now we may apply this principle to the great Roman revolution, and describe it as a differentiation. War had originally been conceived as a function devolving equally upon the citizens. When the military season came on, the farmer or shopkeeper left his peaceful occupations, donned his armor, and presented himself before the consul in the Campus Martius. When the campaign was over he went back to his work. But the larger the territory of the state became, the heavier the task that devolved upon its armies, the more numerous its dangers, the more extensive its vulnerable frontier, the more imperiously did Nature call for a military differentiation. The special need must be met by a special organ. A special class of men must be set apart for special military functions. I have shown that it was the necessity of defending the State against its foreign enemies that caused the revolution. In the throes of this revolution the new organ made its appearance. On the restoration of tranquillity, the Roman Empire is seen to be guarded by an institution which had been unknown to the republic, by a standing army of twenty-five legions.

This change constitutes by itself a vast social revolution in comparison with which any changes in the form of political government are insignificant. The rise of standing armies in modern Europe is well known to mark a great epoch. But it was a much less sudden and radical change than the corresponding change in the Roman Empire. For when the citizen resigned his arms to the professional soldier, he did not merely, as might at first sight appear, relieve himself of a disagreeable duty, disencumber himself of a burden which hampered his industry. He did much more than this; he placed himself under entirely new conditions of life. He parted with all his traditions, and blindly undertook to explore a new world. In the first place he resigned his liberty. We in England, who have witnessed the reconciliation of standing armies with liberty, may have some difficulty in understanding how impossible was any such reconciliation in the Roman Empire. But it is undeniable that under the imperial system the Roman did lose his liberty. With an equivalent, or without an equivalent, he parted with it, and no one who examines the history can doubt what cause principally contributed to deprive him of it. The emperor possessed in the army an overwhelming force, over which the citizens had no influence, which was totally deaf to reason or eloquence, which had no patriotism because it had no country, which had no humanity because it had no domestic ties. To this huge engine of despotism it was vain to oppose any resistance. Human freewill perished in its presence as in the presence of necessity. Not in institutions only, but in the hearts of men, liberty withered away, and its place was taken by servility and stoicism, and Byzantine Christianity. It may occur to us that checks to the emperor's authority over the army might have been devised. But these are modern notions. The army was called into existence not by enactments, but by revolution, and there was no collective wisdom anywhere, no parliament which could call attention to the danger, or discuss it, or provide safeguards against it.

But at the introduction of standing armies the Roman citizen parted with something else, something which lies not less near than liberty to the springs of human character. He parted with the conception of war as the business of life. The great military nation of the world—the nation which had bred up its successive generations to the task of subduing mankind, which by unrivalled firmness of cohesion, by enduring tenacity of purpose, by methodic study and science of destruction, had crushed all the surrounding nationalities, not with a temporary prostration merely, but with utter and permanent dissolution—now found its work done and its occupation gone. The destructive theory of life had worked itself out. The army itself henceforth existed mainly for defence, and the ordinary citizen was no longer concerned with hostilities of any kind, whether offensive or defensive. Human life was forced to find for itself a new object. The feelings, the aspirations, the tastes, the habits, that had hitherto filled it and given it dignity, became suddenly out of date. It was as if a change had passed over the atmosphere in which men lived, as if the temperature had suddenly fallen many degrees, making all customs obsolete at once, giving an antiquated and inappropriate look to the whole framework of life. It was a revolution which struck with incongruousness and abortiveness the very instinctive impulses of men, placed an irreconcilable difference between habit and reason, preconception and fact, education and experience, temperament and reality, the world within and the world without. This might have a bright side. Poets sang of a golden age returned, and they hymned industrialism in exquisite language:—

But the real enjoyment of the new state of things was still remote, and required to be nursed by habit. It was an uncomfortable transition when the old instincts and ardors were superannuated and no new animating principle yet discovered. The new bottles had come before the new wine: the loss was felt far more keenly than the gain; the parting guest was shaken by the hand more warmly than the comer. A sullen torpor reigned in the first years of the millennium of peace, listlessness fell upon the dwellers in that uncongenial paradise; Mars and Quirinus were dead, and He who was to consecrate peace was scarcely born. Men were conscious of a rapid cooling of the air, of a chill gathering round them,—the numbness that follows a great loss, the vacancy that succeeds a great departure:—

“In uros et altars round,
A drear and dying sound
Affrights the flames at their service quaint.”

I hope to return to this subject. Meanwhile, let me point out how the other institutions of the imperial system were determined by the presence of the standing army. Such a great force could not be kept up, particularly as Augustus renounced the profitable course of conquest, without a rigorous system of taxation. Augustus organized a land-tax for the whole empire, and laid the foundation of that fiscal system which in the end crushed the very life out of the people. Further, a great military system requires that great power shall be intrusted to individuals. Personal authority is the characteristic military principle. When, therefore, the standing army was organized, this principle received a great development.

From the beginning, the empire had many more great posts than the republic. It created the legatus legionis or commander of a legion (the legion had before been commanded in a very ineffective way by the tribunes in succession). This new officer, commanding more than six thousand men, held prætorian rank, and there were not less than twenty-five such officers at once. Besides this, three new prefectures were created,—the prefecture of the prætorian guard, the prefecture of the city, and the prefecture of the watch. If we compare these new city officers with the city magistracies of the republic, we find that they confer a greater amount of power because their term is not limited to a year, and also that they all bear a military character, since an armed guard was attached to each. Another office, still more characteristic of the empire, was that of the legatus Augusti; this was the title given to the governor of one of the great frontier provinces. He united the functions of civil governor with the command sometimes of two or three legions and as many allied troops, — that is, an army of twenty or thirty thousand men. He was appointed by the emperor, and, like every one else, responsible to him. It is true that the proconsuls and proprietors of the republic had often held power as great, and with less responsibility; but when the standing army was fully organized and the frontier of the empire finally determined, these great commands became permanent, and not merely occasional. The great legates of the Rhine were regularly appointed always with much the same range of power; and as they were not chosen by the haphazard system of popular election out of a few privileged families, but selected with tolerable impartiality, for the most part, out of those who had approved their powers of government in inferior positions, they appeared much more considerable personages than the provincial governors of the republic. This seems to me the fairest side of the imperial system. Essentially military, it was an incomparable school of great military officers. It produced in singular abundance men capable of great commands, and conducting themselves in such posts not merely with ability, but with justice and moderation, though generally also with the hardness of the military profession. Such men as Plautius, Corbulo, Vespasian, Agricola, Trajan, all held the post of legatus Augusti, and they are the glory of the empire.

Surrounded by this splendid staff of military officers, prefects, legates, and commanders of legions, appeared the Emperor. In modern history, only Napoleon has occupied a position at all similar, — absolute disposer of an army of 300,000 men, and keeping his eye at the same time on military operations as distant from each other as the Thames from the Euphrates. His power was from the beginning so great, and became so speedily unlimited, that we are apt to lose ourselves in generalities in describing it. But if we examine the process by which this power grew up, if we watch the genesis of Leviathan, we shall clearly see the special need which he was differentiated to meet, — we shall plainly discover that he sprang, not out of democracy, not out of any struggle for equality between rich and poor, or between citizen and provincial, but out of the demand for administrative, and especially military, centralization. That Julius Cæsar began life as a demagogue is a fact which tends to confuse our notions of the system which he introduced. Let us rather fix our attention on Augustus, who founded and organized the empire as it actually was and as it lasted till the time of Diocletian. He began as a professed Senatorian, he acquired the support of the army, he became ultimately emperor; but with the democracy he never had any connection. It was the object of his life to justify his own power by showing the necessity of it, and by not taking more power than he could show to be necessary. The profound tranquillity of his later years proved that he had satisfied the empire. The uneasiness and unrest which had filled the whole century that preceded the battle of Actium had shown that the empire wanted something which it could not find. The peace that filled the century which followed it, the general contentment which reigned, except among the representatives of the fallen republic, showed that the empire had found that of which it was in search. Yet assuredly no comprehensive enfranchisement, no democratic levelling of classes, had taken place. If the ancient boundaries had been overleaped in the times of disturbance, Augustus devoted himself as soon as peace was restored to punishing such transgressions, and preventing the recurrence of them. His legislation is a system of exclusions, a code of privilege and class jealousy. It consists of enactments to make the enfranchisement of slaves difficult, enactments to prevent freedmen from assuming the privileges of the free-born. He endeavored to revive the decaying order of the patriciate, the oligarchy of the oligarchy itself, — a clique which excluded Cato, and into which Augustus himself had gained admission only by adoption. He took pains to raise the character of the Senate, which was the representative of the aristocratic party, and to depress the Comitia, which represented the democracy. He bore, indeed, to his uncle a relation not unlike that which Sulla bore to Marius. Assuredly, any one who studies the Augustan age alone would conclude that in the long contest between aristocracy and democracy, aristocracy had come out victorious. Both parties, indeed, had sacrificed much, but in the Augustan age democracy was nowhere; aristocracy was on the lips of the prince and in his legislation; it was unfashionable to mention the name of Julius; the great historian of the age spoke with admiration, and nowhere with reproach, of his assassins, and earned from his master the epithet of the "Pompeian." Yet we are told this did not interrupt their friendship. The truth is Augustus was very much a Pompeian himself: an aristocrat to the core, and, sympathizing with the old republic in all things, he was yet the worthy and legitimate heir of his uncle, because he labored successfully to complete what his uncle had begun; and this an aristocrat could do as well as a democrat, namely, to give the Roman world centralization.

Monarchy has often been used in the interest of the people as a means of coercing an insolent aristocracy. The Greek τίπαιροι of the sixth century B. C., were popular sovereigns of this kind. But monarchy can also be used in the interest of aristocracy itself. Thus the monarchy of Louis XIV. was oppressive to the people, and supported itself upon the loyalty and sympathy of the noblesse. Now the Roman world wanted monarchy for its own sake, that is, it wanted a strong and centralized government; whether the monarchy favored the democracy or the aristocracy was a matter comparatively of indifference. The first monarch was democratic, the second aristocratic, but both were equally successful, both equally satisfied the wants of the time. For, unlike in most respects as Augustus showed himself to Julius, he followed him closely in the one essential point. Though without much talent or taste for war, he jealously kept in his own hands the whole military administration of the empire. Here alone he showed no reserve and wore no disguise, though in assuming civil powers no monarch was ever more cautious, or showed more anxiety not to go further than public necessity forced him.

He became permanent commander-in-chief; and — what shows clearly the conception which was formed of his special function — all provinces which were in the neighborhood of an enemy, and in which a large military establishment was to be kept up, were committed to his care, and governed by his commissioners. He assumed, besides, the power of a proconsul in every province, by which means he became a kind of Governor-General of all the conquests of Rome. If we examine the powers which were given to Pompey in the war with the pirates, we shall see that they were very similar to these, and that in fact the imperial system may be considered as a kind of permanent Gabinian Law, an arrangement by which a general was empowered to wield at his discretion all the military force of the empire, and to interfere in civil government so far as he might consider the military exigencies of the State demanded.

It confirms this view to find that the most serious embarrassment which Augustus met with, particularly in his later years, was the evident superiority in military ability of Agrippa to himself, for this superiority carried with it a sort of natural title to supersede Augustus as emperor, and the difficulty was only surmounted by a kind of tacit compact by which Augustus bound himself to deny Agrippa nothing, and Agrippa not to claim all, while in the mean while they placed themselves as much as possible in distant parts of the empire, and so avoided the danger of a collision. This view at the same time explains the infinite alarm with which Augustus received the news of the defeat of Varus in Germany, and the loss of three legions. Rome had weathered much worse storms than this. But what struck Augustus was that his system could not stand for a moment if it did not secure that for which it existed, the safety of the frontiers; that liberty and republican pride would be felt to have been sacrificed in vain, that Cato, and Pompey, and Cicero, and Brutus would seem to have been martyrs, if the empire was still liable to barbaric invasion.

Considered in this light, the imperial system will appear to have had for a long time a splendid success. Though the imperial period is inferior as a period of foreign conquest to the period of Marius, Sulla, Pompey, and Cæsar, this is not owing to any military superiority of republicanism, but to the fact that the imperial system had been practically introduced long before it was legally recognized. It was not by republicanism, but by a temporary suspension of republican principles that the great generals I have just mentioned achieved their conquests. Pompey in the East and Cæsar in Gaul were as absolute as Trajan, and it was because they were so that they had such great success. Their conquests, therefore, may be claimed for the imperial system, though not for the imperial period; and to estimate the military effectiveness of the republican system, we must look back to the disastrous years when general after general succumbed to Jugurtha's gold, and army after army to Cimbric hordes. It is true that the imperial system did not in the long run succeed, that the very evil which it was created to avert fell in the end upon the empire, that the frontier was passed at all points, and that the barbaric world overbore the Roman. But two centuries passed before the system showed any signs of inadequacy.

Such, then, in its design and in its direct working was the imperial system, simply a concentration of military force. But since it affected such a vast area, its indirect consequences are not less important than its direct ones. Of these the principal were two, the extinction of liberty, and the increase of material happiness. Of the first I have already spoken; it is displayed in a striking light throughout the history of the Senate in its relation to the emperors. The Senate had always been the vital institution of republican Rome. In it was embodied the force which had resisted Hannibal, which had made the Italians into a compact and homogeneous people, which had subjugated Sicily, Spain, Greece, and Carthage. Without this institution, this body of life-peers freely chosen by a people who liked neither self-government nor slavery, but liberty to choose their governors, — without the freedom of each senator with respect to the rest, and the freedom of the people in the election of the Senate, Rome could never have become great. The popular assemblies had always been insignificant by the side of the Senate, and Augustus was right to elevate the Senate rather than the popular assemblies when he wished to persuade the people that their venerated republic still existed. Henceforward the Senate and the Emperor confronted each other like the past and the present. The Senate was respected; it was replenished with the leading men of the time; trouble was even taken by the emperors to maintain its character; it was eloquent; its debates and the lives of its members preserved the tradition of old Roman virtues; it was allowed to talk republicanism, and to canonize the "Pharsalica turba," the martyrs who had fallen in resisting Cæsar; it was highly cultivated and fond of writing history, a dignified literary club. But it had not power, in truth it had not reality. It is a painful or a majestic phenomenon, according as it acts or refrains from action. When it acts it is like Lear with his hundred knights brawling in his daughter's palace. In a moment the wicked look comes upon Regan's face; the feeling of his helplessness returns upon the old man, and the hysterica passio shakes him. But so long as it remains passive it is an impressive symbol, and there is something touching in the respect with which the emperors treated it. Seldom has any State shown such a filial feeling towards its own past as the Romans showed in the tenderness with which they preserved through centuries a futile and impotent institution, because it represented the institutions of their ancestors. Like a portrait of the founder of the family in some nobleman's house, such was the Senate in the city of the Cæsars. It was not expected to move or act; nay, its moving seemed prodigious and ominous; it was expected "picture-like to hang by the wall"; and so long as it did this it was in no danger of being despised or thought superfluous, but on the contrary, was held precious and dear.

Meanwhile liberty was actually dead, and several centuries passed in which Europe resembled Asia. That effeminacy fell upon men which always infects them when they live for a long time under the rule of an all-powerful soldiery. But with effeminacy there came in process of time a development of the feminine virtues. Men ceased to be adventurous, patriotic, just, magnanimous; but, on the other hand, they became chaste, tender-hearted, loyal, religious, and capable of infinite endurance in a good cause.

The second indirect consequence was an increase of material happiness.

The want of system, which had exposed the empire to foreign enemies, had created at the same time much internal misery. Imperialism, introducing system and unity, gave the Roman world in the first place internal tranquillity. The ferocious civil conflicts of Marius and Sulla had sprung out of republican passions, which were now for good as well as for evil stilled. The piracy which had reigned in the Mediterranean was no longer possible with a permanent Gabinian Law, with a Pompey always at the head of affairs. One new danger, indeed, was introduced, — the danger of military revolutions; but, formidable as the power of the army was, it was found possible to restrain it from the worst extremities for two centuries. The dreadful year 69, which recalled the days of Cinna, was the only serious interruption to the tranquil course of government between the accession of Augustus and the death of Aurelius. Whatever Cæsar took from his country, he gave it two centuries of peaceful government.

Once more: he gave to the government of the empire a somewhat more equitable spirit. It was not for this purpose that his army raised him to power, but centralization carried with it of necessity this result. The cruelty with which the provinces were governed was of the kind that is always produced in government by want of system. There was no one upon whom it was incumbent to consider the interests of the provinces. The Senate, to which all such affairs were left, consisted of the very men who had the strongest interest in plunder and extortion. The provincial governments were divided among the aristocracy as so much preferment; the whole order lived upon the plunder of the world, and nothing is more manifest than that such a system could never be reformed from within.

The difficulty of getting the House of Commons to put down bribery at elections would have been as nothing compared to the difficulty of inducing the Roman Senate to reform the government of the provinces. The new power which was now created proved very serviceable for this end. The emperor had no interest in any misgovernment; he was in a position to judge it coldly, and he had power to punish it. At the same time, in the general revision of the whole administration which now took place, the establishments of the provincial governors were put upon a better footing, and, in particular, stated salaries were assigned to them. A better system undoubtedly was introduced, and we may believe that the monstrous misgovernment of the republic passed away. From this time it may probably be said of the countries conquered by Rome that they were better governed than they had been in their times of independence. But it does not appear that they were governed positively well. Oppression and extortion, though on a reduced scale, seem still to be the order of the day.

In conclusion, then, that great controversy between Cæsar and Brutus, that question whether Cæsar was a benefactor or a scourge to his kind, seems to me too vast to be answered with any confidence. The change he accomplished had remote consequences not less momentous than the immediate ones. If the nations owed to him two centuries of tranquillity, it is not less true that the supremacy which he gave to military force in the moment when he ordered the passage of the Rubicon, led to the frightful military anarchy of the third century, and ultimately to the establishment of Oriental sultanism in Europe. If he relieved considerably the oppression of the provinces, he also destroyed the spirit of freedom in the Romans, and I do not feel able to calculate exactly how much is lost when freedom is lost. But what it is hard for us to compute, I am persuaded that Cæsar himself could calculate far less. Like other great conquerors, he had "the hook in his nose," and accomplished changes far more and greater and other than he knew. He had energy, versatility, and unconquerable resolution, but he was no philosopher; and yet to measure in any degree the consequences of such actions would have taxed an Aristotle. I believe that he looked very little before him, that he began life an angry demagogue, with views scarcely extended beyond the city; that in the anarchy of the time he saw his chance of rising to power by grasping the skirts of Pompey; that in Gaul he had no views that any other proconsul might not have had, only greater ability to realize them; that at the head of his army and his province he felt to the full a great man's delight in ruling strongly and well; that during this period the corruption of the Senate and the anarchy of the city became more and more contemptible to him, but that in the civil war his objects were still mainly personal; and that it was not till he found himself master of the Roman world that his ideas became as vast as his mission, and that he became in any way capable of understanding the purport of his own career.

HENRY CRABB ROBINSON.

ROGERS, the poet, said to his guests one day, "If there is any one here who wishes to say anything, he had better say it at once, for Crabb Robinson is coming." In similar spirit we may remark that if any of the reading public have a book in hand they had better finish it off or lay it by at once, for Crabb Robinson is come. The volumes* which treat of him are, like himself when he was among us, — irresistible, to be attended to whether you will or no; and worth the attention, because brimful of anecdote, incident, learning, quaint talk, profound thought, sublime philosophy, childlike fun, bold speculation, and religious feeling, lovely in its conception and practice.

To the younger public we suspect the name of Crabb Robinson will not sound familiar. It was not so with their fathers. Even they who had not the honor of being known to him had the happiness of often hearing many of his best stories repeated to them by original hearers. The flashes of his wit may not have illumined their atmosphere, but they could enjoy the coruscations from a distance. His healthy influences had boundless extension; and as for the practical religion to which we have referred, a man could hardly take his walks abroad in any direction without striking the trail of Crabb Robinson's benevolence.

Nearly a hundred years have elapsed since he was born (in 1775), a son of the handsomest young pair that ever set up home in Bury St Edmunds. The father was a well-to-do tanner; the mother, one of those lovable mothers whose name you never hear mentioned without its exciting some comment of respect or affection. The reader will learn to love her for her good sense, though she was not a clever woman. The pulses of the heart beat swifter at the beautifully expressed fondness of Robinson for his mother; how he loved her as a child! how reverently he regarded her memory, when he was an old man!

* Diary, Reminiscences, and Correspondence of Henry Crabb Robinson, Barrister-at-Law. Selected and edited by Thomas Sadler.

These parents were dissenters. The good people almost made their boy an infidel by "too much of it." Crabb's ever-active spirit could not bear the oppression of weary hours at meeting throughout the Sunday, and Henry's "Commentary" to listen to till supper-time, at home. It was a great relief to Crabb, while his sire was reading, to slip off his chair, and turn the apple-pie in the Dutch oven before the fire, where it awaited the hour for the evening repast. Crabb Robinson's independence of spirit and ready expression of opinion were shown at a very early age. Though he was whipped for it, by the tenderest of mothers, he could be indecorous at those dreary meeting services; and he had so little reverence for a too dolefully religious aunt, that when she approached the house her audacious nephew, not out of his frocks, would announce the fact by proclaiming, "Behold, the groaner cometh!" At five years of age his mind was already busy, and with no less a subject than recognition in a future state! The little fellow broke in upon a serious discussion on this subject among the elders by pronouncing in favor of recognition. His grandmother had recently died, and Master Crabb Robinson remarked, "I shall know my grandmother in heaven by the green ribbon round her cap."

Young gentlemen of the present day, whose school-time is only a trifle longer than their holidays, may "thank their stars" that they were not as Crabb Robinson and his contemporaries often were, kept at school three years together, without once going home. Neither are they bound to a calling without having a voice in the matter. Young Robinson, taken off the school form was clapped on to a stool in an attorney's office, and he was no more consulted about it than the stool. This was at Colchester, where he had Mr. Francis for a master. The quirks of the trade jarred on his finer sense; but he turned everything to happy and useful purpose. Hearing Erskine for the first time was the opening of a new life. The young clerk did not give himself up to rapture. He analyzed as rapidly as he enjoyed; and he at once found out Erskine's method, namely, his sticking to one point, and yet employing such varied phraseology as to seem as if he were illustrating a score of points in succession. At Colchester, too, he saw and heard Wesley, in the last days of that noble missionary. "He stood in a wide pulpit, and on each side of him stood a minister, and the two held him up, having their hands under his armpits. His feeble voice was barely audible," but it was tremulously attuned to love. "He addressed the people on liberality of sentiment, and spoke much against refusing to join with any congregation on account of difference of opinion. He said, 'If they do but fear God, work righteousness, and keep his commandments, we have nothing to object to.'" The excellent gift of charity, however, was not much appreciated at that time. Young Robinson could honor Priestley for his heart and his intellect, Godwin for his free utterance of his free thought, and Holcroft for the chivalry of his politics, but he feared the penalty. The "Church and King" people looked upon these and other men like them as atheists and republicans. To be the second was almost as bad as to be the first, and Robinson, because he applied practice to Wesley's theory, came to be thought both. Robert Hall warned a household of his faith to expel the young infidel from its bosom; but Robinson wrote a letter, so frank and manly, that Hall, frank and manly too, confessed his error, though he justified his action.

When Robinson came up to London to continue the study of his profession, — that is, or was, to learn little or nothing about it, — he had no difficulty in getting into the best intellectual society of the day. "My lodgings," he says, "were of a simple kind, in Drury Lane, and my expenses were not more than about a guinea a week." We fancy that fine and fast young gentlemen of the present day, for whom no income is sufficient, would think this "decidedly vulgar." But the young attorney's clerk had an intellect which rendered him welcome to intellectual men. Their names glorify and the stories of them brighten these pages. They crowd pleasantly about the reader, and they are capitably hit off by the diarist. All the noble, aspiring, or eccentric spirits of the time are there: among them, Southey, a republican, of having been which he afterwards said he was no more ashamed than of having been a child. There was also Thirlwall, with all the advanced politicians and reformers. Thirlwall, who would have reformed religion as well as the State, subsequently told Robinson that "he believed he should establish his name among the epic poets of England; and it is a curious thing, considering his own views, that he thought the establishment of Christianity and the British Constitution very appropriate subjects for his poem."

The acquisition of a little money, and leisure coming with it, enabled Robinson to reside during five years in Germany. The history of the time, the sketches of character, and the personal narrative, are rendered with great ability. From lofty philosophy and sublime nature the autobiographer can stoop to the pleasantest trifles when they illustrate national manners and individual wit. Thus, he copies with glee an inscription on a house in Saxony which is to this effect: "This house is in the hand of God. In the year 1795 was the wall raised; and if God will turn my heart to it, and my father-in-law will advance the needful, I will cover it with tiles." While the Diary reflects German life, letters from London written by Crabb's brother, reflect English life. It was a sad life till the peace of 1801 came. In people's purses there was nothing but paper. Heaven knows what was in their stomachs, for the millers were encouraged to mix any grain that would help to fill them. Even this stuff fetched a high price; but after the peace, writes Thomas Robinson to his brother, "in the course of about eight or ten weeks wheat has fallen in our market from 92s. to 18s. the coomb, and it is expected to sink lower." Matters were not on so expensive a scale even in the war time in Germany as here. Robinson dined every day at one hotel for 5s. a week; and he does not complain of the quality of the dinners, but neither does he describe it. He appears to have known or to have met nearly all the great German spirits of that time; and his feelings on two occasions are well expressed when he says that he talked with Wieland and gazed at Goethe. In the latter case, he was struck not only with the intellect but with the "oppressive" beauty of the great poet at Weimar. Not that even all the Weimar folk themselves gave their first homage to the poets and scholars who were its true nobility. After the death of Schiller and other sons of song, Mr. Robinson unguardedly remarked that the glory of Weimar was gradually departing. One of the Gentlemen of the Chamber was offended. "All the poets might die," he said, angrily, "but the Court of Weimar would still remain!" Among others at that Court were Gall and Spurzheim, who were making people mad about "craniology," as it was called. The new "ology," however, attracted the Englishman, and Mr. Robinson introduced it into this country by means of a work published by him in 1807. This was some time after the author's return to England. The same packet brought him and the news that helped to kill Pitt,—of the battle won by Napoleon at Austerlitz.

Coming as Mr. Robinson did from ducal courts and aristocratic universities, and companionship with the legion of men who were kings and kaisers in the realms of intellect, one might expect that England would have seemed a little dull to him, especially as he was now a man without especial vocation, looking for employment, playing a little with literature, but not professionally, and longing to achieve some work of usefulness. England, however, was not dull. He found a certain garret in London as brilliant as the Court of Weimar, with all its intellectual glories and its dazzling Gentlemen of the Chamber. "I was introduced," he says, "to the Lambs by Mrs. Clarkson. . . . They were then living in a garret in Inner Temple Lane. In that humble apartment I spent many happy hours, and saw a greater number of excellent persons than I had ever seen collected together in one room." This is a sentiment at which the Weimar Gentlemen of the Chamber would have been ready to faint. As one reads it, the old garret where Charles and Mary tabernacled seems to light up into surprising brilliancy, and imagination peoples it again with all those choice and incomparable spirits who made the garret ring with laughter, turned it into a temple of wit, a school of philosophy, a home for the weary, — a sanctuary where every man was welcome who was a man, that is, had not only a head, but a good deal in it, and under whose ribs there was a heart which not only beat, but beat tunelessly in the great musical score of life. The smallest of the host's own scintillations might have given a reputation to inferior men. They were so spontaneous! For example: Lamb was once asked why the compartments in the Long Room of the East India House, with six clerks (Lamb being one) in each were called compartments. "What is the meaning of the word?" Lamb drily answered, "A collection of simples!"

Before Robinson went to the Bar, he was employed in various ways, at home and abroad, on the Times. Of his colleagues there, — among whom unexpectedly turns up Combe, the author of "Dr. Syntax," — there are interesting details. But it is when Mr. Robinson is sketching the outer world that he is most interesting. Society at that time, sixty years since, was anything but dull, and good things uttered by wits rattled about men's ears like hail. Some of them very much resembled the sayings of the Wise Men of Greece in their platitudes.

Even Coleridge could trip himself up over one of his own similitudes, — as, for instance, when he said that "Hume comprehended as much of Shakespeare as an apothecary's phial would place under the Falls of Niagara!" Allen, "Lady Holland's atheist," as good-natured friends called that scholar, made a worse trip in the Edinburgh, by abusing some Greek which turned out to be Pindar's! We learn, too, here, why Wordsworth was so mercilessly treated in that Review, "simply" (said Jeffrey, who privately admired what he publicly denounced) "because the errors of men of genius ought to be exposed!" Coleridge was there, and playful enough when he said that there were "wrongers of subjects as well as writers of them!" Of all the goodly company of men in these volumes, perhaps Coleridge is the most interesting. His account of his wonderful, pitiful boy — poor, sad Hartley — is enough to stir the fount of tears. Smiles come again when Lamb, who loved the man with reverent affection, pleasantly commented on the philosopher's ways.

"Thus, lecturing on 'Romeo and Juliet,' and Shakespeare's female characters, one of a course of Shakesperian lectures, Coleridge advocated school flogging, and ridiculed Mr. Lancaster's objections to such discipline. 'It's a pity,' whispered Lamb to Robinson, 'he did not leave this till he got to 'Henry VI,' for then he might say he could n't help taking part against the Lancastrians!' Coleridge continued to ramble on from topic to topic, and thereupon Lamb again whispered, 'This is not much amiss. He promised a lecture on the Nurse in 'Romeo and Juliet,' and in its place he has given us one in the manner of the Nurse.' There is much to be learned of Coleridge in these volumes; hardly less of Lamb, — of Lamb in his serious, earnest moods, — that is, of Lamb at his best and highest. With Lamb and Coleridge are, of course, all their surroundings; moving crowds, serried ranks, and now and then an amusing simpleton supervening. Among the latter may be reckoned Sir John Soane, whom Robinson heard lecture at the Royal Academy on Architecture. The conclusion was diverting. 'As the grammarian has his positive, comparative, and superlative, and as we say, 'My King, my Country, and my God,' so ought the lover of Fine Arts to say, 'Painting, Sculpture, Architecture.'"

In 1813, at the age of eight-and-thirty, Mr. Robinson was called to the Bar, from which he retired at the age of fifty-three. The going to it late, and withdrawing early, he considered "the two wisest acts" of his life. One of his first exploits was in procuring the acquittal of a client who had poisoned his wife. "My spirits were raised," he says, and so was the estimation of attorneys, by this unenviable triumph over justice. His cleverness, however, was always profitable to his clients. He was not like Henry Cooper, some of whose best hits told as much against as for those he had to defend. One day Cooper was entertaining the whole court, when Rolfe (then almost the junior, but who reached the woollack, and lately died under the title of Lord Cranworth) whispered to Robinson, "How clever that is! How I thank God I am not so clever!" In comparing the French with English methods of trial, Robinson was disposed to think that more innocent men were found guilty in England than in France, where, however, it always seems the object of the Judge to procure a conviction. Our author also approved of the French custom of strictly questioning the prisoner, and often forcing him to convict himself.

The studies of the French Bar are few: it is otherwise with the English. One of the most picturesque gives us sketches of Lord Ellenborough and Henry Brougham. The latter had been defending a man who was convicted of "a libel against Jesus Christ," and the man offered an affidavit in mitigation. The Judge remarked that there was nothing by which an infidel could swear; and as Brougham rose at this, Lord Ellenborough said,

"Mr. Brougham, if you are acquainted with this person's faith, you had better suggest some other sanction; you had better confer with him." Brougham, with manly spirit, replied, "It is very unpleasant to be thus mixed up with my client, of whom I know nothing but that I am his retained advocate. As a lawyer and a gentleman, I protest against such any insinuations." The Chief Justice was cowed, and faintly averred that he meant none. If there be less dignity there is more amusement in the sketch of Justice Willes, who had a bad habit of interrupting counsel. He once did this almost as soon as Mr. Blank commenced his case. "Your Lordship," said the barrister, "is a greater man than your father. The Chief Baron used to contradict me after I had done, but your Lordship understands me before I begin."

There is nothing singular in these illustrations of the Bar, but there is something uncommon in one illustration of the Bench. Baron Wood was distinguished for his "popular feelings." He hated the Game Laws; and Radicals loved him because he was "always against Church and King." Other men besides a solitary Judge shared in the first half, at least, of the latter feeling. Sir Montague Burgoyne was sued in 1817 by the Rev. Dr. Free, rector of Sutton, for the sum of £ 20 a month during all the months he was absent from church! This was on an old statute, and the Judge thought that it was of no effect since the Toleration Act; but Sir Montague had a horror of escaping as a dissenter; and he was ultimately acquitted on the merits, as he proved that during most of the time the church had been closed. The zealous rector himself was subsequently deprived of his living for immorality. Ellenborough was, as every one knows, the opposite of Wood. The deference paid to him by the Bar renders the incident of Brougham noticed above especially remarkable. When Hone was defending himself on a charge of blasphemy, he attacked the Bar, declaring that there was not a man who dared to contradict Lord Ellenborough for fear of losing the ear of the Court. "A most indecent, because a most true assertion," is the significant comment made by Mr. Robinson on this declaration. At this period, he was making £ 400 a year as a barrister, and was therewith (and literature for a crutch) content. Holding six Crown briefs at one assizes seems to have been considered good and substantial success. The author is not at all jealous at recording the fact of his friend, Charles Austin, making 40,000 guineas by pleading before Parliament in one session. When Robinson made 134 guineas during one circuit, he thought himself in a very promising way indeed. He records a curious fact of Judge Buller, told him by Judge Graham, with whom Robinson was then dining. "Graham said to-day that though Buller was a great lawyer, he was ignorant on every subject but law. He actually believed in the obsolete theory that our earth is the centre of the universe." Buller was of very old-fashioned Conservative principles, and was for moving nothing out of the groove in which it had been once set, or supposed to be set. On the other hand, we find Robinson unbelieving as to facts which are now established, but which forty years ago were only promises. At Covent Garden Theatre, he witnessed "a panoramic view of the projected improvement of the Thames, by the erection of a terrace on arches along the northern shore, — a pleasing anticipation of a splendid dream which not even in this projecting age can become a reality." The reality is now an established fact.

When the author withdrew from the Bar, that act which he described as one of great wisdom, was followed by one which he qualifies as an act of great folly, — his becoming a Fellow of the Society of Antiquaries, a society which Walpole himself did not hold cheaper than Crabb Robinson. It is probably rather owing to the increasing age of the latter than to the fact of his taking on him the burden of F. S. A. that from this period the entries in the Diary and the Reminiscences become somewhat more garrulous than previously; just as, if we remember rightly, Robinson himself, but in still later years, became somewhat "prosy" in his table-talk and on his side of controversies. Indeed, he was always a little given to lengthiness. At the bar he opened one of his cases by saying "This case will be short." "Do you speak in your professional or your personal character?" asked a brother lawyer, who is here pilloried as "that insolent fellow R——." Still, amid disquisitions on religion, poetry, politics, the drama, and on individuals, if the air be sometimes heavy, it is frequently moved by lively breezes and lightened by cheerful sunbursts. These often come suddenly upon the reader. We laugh at hearing Mr. Ferguson, an M. P., remark, "I never voted but once according to my own opinion, and that was the worst vote I ever gave." We smile at Flaxman quite agreeing with the King's messenger, who said, "Sir, Rome is all humbug. Rome is more like Wapping than any place I know." We rejoice at Dr. Parr being foiled by a lady whose opinion of his sermon he had been rash and vain enough to ask. "My opinion," she said, "is expressed in the first five words of the sermon itself, 'Enough, and more than enough.'" Again, walking through Rome with Goethe, we recognize the well-known spirit of the man in his outspokenness. "There is not a relic of primitive Christianity here; and if Jesus Christ was to return to see what his deputy was about, he would run a fair chance of being crucified again." And when we get back to Lamb's pleasant circle, and the character of Queen Caroline is being canvassed, we are struck by a phrase of Mary Lamb: "They talk about the Queen's innocence. I should n't think the better of her if she was what is called innocent." Robinson saw the true woman's wit in this. Mary Lamb "thought more of the mind and character than of a mere act, objectively considered." The truth is here as great as the wit is fine in Dr. Donaldson's remark on Robinson's difficulty to understand the meaning of "a sound divine." "It is a divine," said the Doctor, "who is l'ox et præterea nihil!" And the truth and wit of the above are both equalled by Talleyrand's remark to Madame de Staël on her "Delphine," in which she is said to have introduced him in the character of an old woman. The authoress had the courage to ask him what he thought of "Delphine." "'Delphine,' said Talleyrand; 'that is the work, is it not, in which you and I are exhibited in the disguise of females?'" This is Talleyrandesque in its utmost perfection.

Although the third volume * brings the reader in closer connection with persons still living, there is a goodly company of the departed, in whom and in whose doings a greater interest is generally taken. Mr. Robinson thus writes of Southey in 1841: —

"Instead of telling you of him (Southey) in this

* The American edition (Messrs. Fields, Osgood, & Co.) is in two volumes.

sad condition, I will copy a pleasant jeu d'esprit by him when pressed to write something in an album. There were on one side of the paper several names; the precise individuals I do not know. One was Dan O'Connell. Southey wrote on the other side to this effect. I cannot answer for the precise words:—

‘Birds of a feather
Flock together,
Vide the opposite page;
But do not thence gather
That I'm of like feather
With all the brave birds in this cage,’ &c.

Surely good-humor and gentle satire, which can offend no one, were never more gracefully brought together. This reminds me of another story. It is worth putting down. A lady once said to me, ‘Southey made a poem for me, and you shall hear it. I was, I believe, about three years old, and used to say, “I are.”’ He took me on his knee, fondled me, and would not let me go till I had learned and repeated these lines:—

“A cow's daughter is called a calf,
And a sheep's child, a lamb,
Little children must not say I are,
But should always say I am.”

Now a dunce or a common man would not throw off, even for children, such graceful levities. I repeated this poem to Southey. He laughed and said, ‘When my children were infants, I used to make such things daily. There have been hundreds such forgotten.’”

A glance at “the Duke” is highly characteristic. The year is 1844;—

“December 26th.—(Rydal.) Slept in the room in which, after my fall, I was nursed last year by that excellent servant, James. Last night heard Wordsworth read prayers from Thornton's collection with remarkable beauty and effect. He told me that the Duke of Wellington, being on a visit, was informed by his host that he had family prayers in the morning. Would he attend? ‘With great pleasure,’ said the Duke. The gentleman read out of this book. ‘What! you use fancy prayers?’ The Duke never came down again. He expected the Church prayers, which Wordsworth uses in the morning.”

But far excelling all other matters in interest in the third volume are the letters of Lady Byron, especially when they treat of her Lord. They make that noble woman seem still more noble, and they bring her husband closer than before to kindly human sympathies. Here is a sample:—

“Not merely from casual expressions, but from the whole tenor of Lord Byron's feelings, I could not but conclude he was a believer in the inspiration of the Bible, and had the gloomiest Calvinistic tenets. To that unhappy view of the relation of the creature to the Creator I have always ascribed the misery of his life. . . . It is enough for me to remember that he who thinks his transgressions beyond forgiveness (and such was his own deepest feeling) has righteousness beyond that of the self-satisfied sinner, or, perhaps, of the half-awakened. It was impossible for me to doubt that, could he have been at once assured of pardon, his living faith in a moral duty and love of virtue (‘I love the virtues which I cannot claim’) would have conquered every temptation. Judge, then, how I must hate the Creed which made him see God as an Avenger, not a Father. My own impressions were just the reverse, but could have little weight; and it was in vain to seek to turn his thoughts for long to that idée fixe, with which he connected his physical peculiarity as a stamp. Instead of being made happier by any apparent good, he felt convinced that every blessing would be ‘turned into a curse’ to him. Who, possessed by such ideas, could lead a life of love and service to God or man? They must, in a measure, realize themselves. ‘The worst of it is, I do believe,’ he said. I, like all connected with him, was broken against the rock of Predestination. I may be pardoned for referring to his frequent expression of the sentiment that I was only sent to show him the happiness he was forbidden to enjoy. You will now better understand why ‘The Deformed Transformed’ is too painful to me for discussion. Since writing the above I have read Dr. Granville's letter on the Emperor of Russia, some passages of which seem applicable to the prepossession I have described. I will not mix up less serious matters with these, which forty years have not made less than present still to me.”

Crabb Robinson died in February, 1867. Prof. De Morgan, in an admirable supplementary chapter, thus photographs the fine old man:—

“By the time he died the tablet of his memory had more than sixty years of literary recollections painted upon it; and painted with singular clearness. He had a comical habit of self-depreciation, which, though jocose in expression, took its rise in a real feeling that his life had been thrown away. It had, in fact, been of a miscellaneous character, and, save only in his legal career, had nothing to which a common and understood name could be attached. Accordingly, it was, ‘I speak to you with the respect with which a person like myself ought to speak to a great——.’ Here insert scholar, mathematician, physician, &c., as the case might be. Or, perhaps, ‘I am nothing, and never was anything, not even a lawyer.’ Sometimes, ‘Do not run away with the idea that I know that or anything else.’ But the climax was reached when, after giving an account of something which involved a chain of anecdotes running back with singular connection and clearness through two generations, he came at last to a loss about some name. It would then be, ‘You see that my memory is quite gone; though that is an absurd way of talking, for I never had any.’”

We must now leave these copious memorials to the public. They have been carefully edited by Dr. Sadler.

ROBERT'S CAPITAL HIT.

II.

“ABOUT a gold mine, Robert!” I said. “I don't think I like the idea much. Of course, I am very ignorant about things of the sort; but it does seem to me that if there's any thing good in the way of gold mines going, it would not be likely to come your way. I hardly think you are what you and Mr. Shaw call ‘big’ enough for that kind of thing. Are you, Robert?”

I said it timidly, for this was one of the few points on which it was rather easy to vex Robert, and I did not like vexing him on any. He took it very well, however, and gave my arm an affectionate little squeeze, which was very reassuring, as far as convincing me that he was not annoyed with me went, but which also made me feel that he was what his mother called “new-fangled” with the scheme, and that I should not find him easy to be persuaded.

"Not in the ordinary way, my dear, certainly," he answered. "You are quite right in supposing that really good things of this kind are not thrown in the way of little fish; but this is quite a special thing, and my having a chance of getting a pull out of it is entirely due to Wainwright."

"Who's Wainwright?" said I.

"Why, don't you know, — John's brother-in-law, or rather, John's sister-in-law's husband."

"Yes, yes. I remember now. But is he a safe person to have anything to do with, Robert? John and Mrs. John don't seem to like him."

"Did you ever know them seem to like anybody who was not prosperous and important? Did you ever hear John or his wife speak well of anybody who was so unlucky as to have been obliged at any time to ask them to do him a favor? Not that Wainwright ever wanted or got anything from John; but that Mary Anne's first husband, who married her, as Wainwright married her sister, without a shilling, and was a jolly, good-natured fellow, 'stood to' Wainwright when he had very hard lines of it; and Mary Anne looks upon every shilling given, lent to, or expended upon any other person as a direct injury to her. I believe there was some jealousy at the bottom of all this. I believe she took it into her head that poor Williams thought he had married the wrong sister, and Wainwright the right one, and the notion did not improve her temper."

"I can't wonder at that," I said, for the esprit de corps was aroused in me, and I could think it rather hard, even on Mrs. John, that her sister should be preferred to her. "I don't blame her for being angry at such a thing as that, — any woman would be, and ought to be, that's more."

"Don't be vehement," said Robert, laughing, "though it's decidedly becoming; and let's take a turn on the common. We need not go in yet; I want to tell you about this. It was all nonsense, all temper on Mary Anne's part; poor Williams had no such stuff in his thoughts; he restricted himself dutifully to making money, and keeping the peace with his wife. But Mary Anne can't bear Wainwright, — though it was through him she first knew John, — and she snubs him, and neglects her sister. However, Wainwright and I have become great friends lately, and he has got a good deal of business to do for Dorrisson, the contractor, speculator, — I hardly know what to call him."

"You mean the man who seems to be a director of everything, — extract of meat and patent stoves, ships' signals and tasteless medicines, street railways, humane chimney-sweeping, and gas that does not cost anything, and is warranted not to consume the air or smoke the ceiling."

"You seem to have followed Mr. Dorrisson's career pretty closely, Martha. Yes, that's the man. He is wonderfully clever; but his luck surprises me more than his ability. He goes at all sorts of things, and they all succeed, at least as long as he has anything to do with them. Wainwright has tacked himself on to Dorrisson's skirts; and though it was rather risky, it has turned out pretty well. There are very pretty pickings for a solicitor with nothing surprising in the way of practice, in the desultory business of a man of that kind. Wainwright is a very good fellow, has a great regard for me, and is inclined to help me, besides, as I believe, because John snubs us both."

"And how is he helping you in this matter of the gold mine?"

"Thus," he replied. "The gold mine in question, which has a very big name, no less than Campo de los Angeles, belongs to an eccentric sort of fellow, a man called Disney, who has seen life enough to fill a century, and gone through adventures enough to stock a circulating library. He is a very queer fellow, quite a character, and, I dare say, anything but a good one, — not in the least a gentleman; sometimes with heaps of money, which he spends with absurd recklessness; sometimes in great straits, or, as he elegantly calls it, 'up a tree.' He was in this last condition when Dorrisson got hold of him, through Wainwright, and discovered that the embarrassed Californian was the possessor of the gold mine of Campo de los Angeles, but had mortgaged it, and mismanaged it in all sorts of ways, — had, in fact, 'bedevilled it,' as people say of things which are brought into a mess by pure human stupidity. Thereupon Dorrisson proposed to buy the mine, on very advantageous terms, for himself, to get up a company to work it, and to free Disney from his present embarrassments. He has been living about in Paris, and Naples, and London, and now he wants to get off to New York, but cannot for want of money, and so Dorrisson has got hold of him. There's no doubt about the value of the mine; and I am convinced it will be a splendid thing; and Wainwright is going to give me a capital chance with it."

"In what way?" I asked. I confess I felt very uneasy; and I suppose that feeling made itself audible in the tone of my voice.

"Now I know you are frightened, little woman," said Robert, kindly, and giving my arm another squeeze so apparent that two school-boys, who were passing by, grinned expressively at one another, indicating derisively that they considered us as "keeping company." "But there's nothing to be afraid of. I have never had such a chance as this one. Wainwright has introduced me to Mr. Dorrisson; he is a curt, business-like man, with rather bad manners, but straightforward enough. And I rather think he has taken to me."

"I should think so, indeed!" I remarked, parenthetically.

"He cannot spare Wainwright to look after this affair, there is so much on hand just now in London, and he wants to settle it with Disney as far as he can on the quiet, — there are some men, in Dorrisson's own line, who would try to cut him out, if they knew how hard up Disney is, — and he is going to send me to Paris, to look into the state of his affairs there, ascertain what his debts really are, make the best arrangement I can with his creditors, and get him to conclude the sale of the mine off-hand. Disney's house and furniture in London have just been sold, and his creditors here are getting savage. Wainwright will buy up the debts here, and I hope to do the same in Paris."

Robert was so much elated, that I do not think he remembered what unpleasant news it was to me that he was going away, to leave me with his mother, in suspense and anxiety. I did not remind him of that aspect of the matter, however. But I did say: "I cannot think it quite a right thing, Robert, to speculate on the folly and embarrassments of people. If this Mr. Disney was n't in money troubles, Mr. Dorrisson would have to pay much more for the mine than he will now have to pay. Don't I understand you so?"

we compare these new city officers with the city magistracies of the republic, we find that they confer a greater amount of power because their term is not limited to a year, and also that they all bear a military character, since an armed guard was attached to each. Another office, still more characteristic of the empire, was that of the legatus Augusti; this was the title given to the governor of one of the great frontier provinces. He united the functions of civil governor with the command sometimes of two or three legions and as many allied troops, — that is, an army of twenty or thirty thousand men. He was appointed by the emperor, and, like every one else, responsible to him. It is true that the proconsuls and propraetors of the republic had often held power as great, and with less responsibility; but when the standing army was fully organized and the frontier of the empire finally determined, these great commands became permanent, and not merely occasional. The great legates of the Rhine were regularly appointed always with much the same range of power; and as they were not chosen by the haphazard system of popular election out of a few privileged families, but selected with tolerable impartiality, for the most part, out of those who had approved their powers of government in inferior positions, they appeared much more considerable personages than the provincial governors of the republic. This seems to me the fairest side of the imperial system. Essentially military, it was an incomparable school of great military officers. It produced in singular abundance men capable of great commands, and conducting themselves in such posts not merely with ability, but with justice and moderation, though generally also with the hardness of the military profession. Such men as Plautius, Corbulo, Vespasian, Agricola, Trajan, all held the post of legatus Augusti, and they are the glory of the empire.

Surrounded by this splendid staff of military officers, prefects, legates, and commanders of legions, appeared the Emperor. In modern history, only Napoleon has occupied a position at all similar, — absolute disposer of an army of 300,000 men, and keeping his eye at the same time on military operations as distant from each other as the Thames from the Euphrates. His power was from the beginning so great, and became so speedily unlimited, that we are apt to lose ourselves in generalities in describing it. But if we examine the process by which this power grew up, if we watch the genesis of Leviathan, we shall clearly see the special need which he was differentiated to meet, — we shall plainly discover that he sprang, not out of democracy, not out of any struggle for equality between rich and poor, or between citizen and provincial, but out of the demand for administrative, and especially military, centralization. That Julius Cæsar began life as a demagogue is a fact which tends to confuse our notions of the system which he introduced. Let us rather fix our attention on Augustus, who founded and organized the empire as it actually was and as it lasted till the time of Diocletian. He began as a professed Senatorian, he acquired the support of the army, he became ultimately emperor; but with the democracy he never had any connection. It was the object of his life to justify his own power by showing the necessity of it, and by not taking more power than he could show to be necessary. The profound tranquillity of his later years proved that he had satisfied the empire. The uneasiness and unrest which had filled the whole century that preceded the battle of Actium had shown that the empire wanted something which it could not find. The peace that filled the century which followed it, the general contentment which reigned, except among the representatives of the fallen republic, showed that the empire had found that of which it was in search. Yet assuredly no comprehensive enfranchisement, no democratic levelling of classes, had taken place. If the ancient boundaries had been overleaped in the times of disturbance, Augustus devoted himself as soon as peace was restored to punishing such transgressions, and preventing the recurrence of them. His legislation is a system of exclusions, a code of privilege and class jealousy. It consists of enactments to make the enfranchisement of slaves difficult, enactments to prevent freedmen from assuming the privileges of the free-born. He endeavored to revive the decaying order of the patriciate, the oligarchy of the oligarchy itself, — a clique which excluded Cato, and into which Augustus himself had gained admission only by adoption. He took pains to raise the character of the Senate, which was the representative of the aristocratic party, and to depress the Comitia, which represented the democracy. He bore, indeed, to his uncle a relation not unlike that which Sulla bore to Marius. Assuredly, any one who studies the Augustan age alone would conclude that in the long contest between aristocracy and democracy, aristocracy had come out victorious. Both parties, indeed, had sacrificed much, but in the Augustan age democracy was nowhere; aristocracy was on the lips of the prince and in his legislation; it was unfashionable to mention the name of Julius; the great historian of the age spoke with admiration, and nowhere with reproach, of his assassins, and earned from his master the epithet of the "Pompeian." Yet we are told this did not interrupt their friendship. The truth is Augustus was very much a Pompeian himself: an aristocrat to the core, and, sympathizing with the old republic in all things, he was yet the worthy and legitimate heir of his uncle, because he labored successfully to complete what his uncle had begun; and this an aristocrat could do as well as a democrat, namely, to give the Roman world centralization.

Monarchy has often been used in the interest of the people as a means of coercing an insolent aristocracy. The Greek ῥιπαῖοι of the sixth century B. C., were popular sovereigns of this kind. But monarchy can also be used in the interest of aristocracy itself. Thus the monarchy of Louis XIV. was oppressive to the people, and supported itself upon the loyalty and sympathy of the noblesse. Now the Roman world wanted monarchy for its own sake, that is, it wanted a strong and centralized government; whether the monarchy favored the democracy or the aristocracy was a matter comparatively of indifference. The first monarch was democratic, the second aristocratic, but both were equally successful, both equally satisfied the wants of the time. For, unlike in most respects as Augustus showed himself to Julius, he followed him closely in the one essential point. Though without much talent or taste for war, he jealously kept in his own hands the whole military administration of the empire. Here alone he showed no reserve and wore no disguise, though in assuming civil powers no monarch was ever more cautious, or showed more anxiety not to go further than public necessity forced him.

He became permanent commander-in-chief; and — what shows clearly the conception which was formed of his special function — all provinces which were in the neighborhood of an enemy, and in which a large military establishment was to be kept up, were committed to his care, and governed by his commissioners. He assumed, besides, the power of a pro-consul in every province, by which means he became a kind of Governor-General of all the conquests of Rome. If we examine the powers which were given to Pompey in the war with the pirates, we shall see that they were very similar to these, and that in fact the imperial system may be considered as a kind of permanent Gabinian Law, an arrangement by which a general was empowered to wield at his discretion all the military force of the empire, and to interfere in civil government so far as he might consider the military exigencies of the State demanded.

It confirms this view to find that the most serious embarrassment which Augustus met with, particularly in his later years, was the evident superiority in military ability of Agrippa to himself, for this superiority carried with it a sort of natural title to supersede Augustus as emperor, and the difficulty was only surmounted by a kind of tacit compact by which Augustus bound himself to deny Agrippa nothing, and Agrippa not to claim all, while in the mean while they placed themselves as much as possible in distant parts of the empire, and so avoided the danger of a collision. This view at the same time explains the infinite alarm with which Augustus received the news of the defeat of Varus in Germany, and the loss of three legions. Rome had weathered much worse storms than this. But what struck Augustus was that his system could not stand for a moment if it did not secure that for which it existed, the safety of the frontiers; that liberty and republican pride would be felt to have been sacrificed in vain, that Cato, and Pompey, and Cicero, and Brutus would seem to have been martyrs, if the empire was still liable to barbaric invasion.

Considered in this light, the imperial system will appear to have had for a long time a splendid success. Though the imperial period is inferior as a period of foreign conquest to the period of Marius, Sulla, Pompey, and Cæsar, this is not owing to any military superiority of republicanism, but to the fact that the imperial system had been practically introduced long before it was legally recognized. It was not by republicanism, but by a temporary suspension of republican principles that the great generals I have just mentioned achieved their conquests. Pompey in the East and Cæsar in Gaul were as absolute as Trajan, and it was because they were so that they had such great success. Their conquests, therefore, may be claimed for the imperial system, though not for the imperial period; and to estimate the military effectiveness of the republican system, we must look back to the disastrous years when general after general succumbed to Jugurtha's gold, and army after army to Cimbric hordes. It is true that the imperial system did not in the long run succeed, that the very evil which it was created to avert fell in the end upon the empire, that the frontier was passed at all points, and that the barbaric world overbore the Roman. But two centuries passed before the system showed any signs of inadequacy.

Such, then, in its design and in its direct working was the imperial system, simply a concentration of military force. But since it affected such a vast area, its indirect consequences are not less important than its direct ones. Of these the principal were two, the extinction of liberty, and the increase of material happiness. Of the first I have already spoken; it is displayed in a striking light throughout the history of the Senate in its relation to the emperors. The Senate had always been the vital institution of republican Rome. In it was embodied the force which had resisted Hannibal, which had made the Italians into a compact and homogeneous people, which had subjugated Sicily, Spain, Greece, and Carthage. Without this institution, this body of life-peers freely chosen by a people who liked neither self-government nor slavery, but liberty to choose their governors, — without the freedom of each senator with respect to the rest, and the freedom of the people in the election of the Senate, Rome could never have become great. The popular assemblies had always been insignificant by the side of the Senate, and Augustus was right to elevate the Senate rather than the popular assemblies when he wished to persuade the people that their venerated republic still existed. Henceforward the Senate and the Emperor confronted each other like the past and the present. The Senate was respected; it was replenished with the leading men of the time; trouble was even taken by the emperors to maintain its character; it was eloquent; its debates and the lives of its members preserved the tradition of old Roman virtues; it was allowed to talk republicanism, and to canonize the "Pharsalica turba," the martyrs who had fallen in resisting Cæsar; it was highly cultivated and fond of writing history, a dignified literary club. But it had not power, in truth it had not reality. It is a painful or a majestic phenomenon, according as it acts or refrains from action. When it acts it is like Lear with his hundred knights brawling in his daughter's palace. In a moment the wicked look comes upon Regan's face; the feeling of his helplessness returns upon the old man, and the hysterica passio shakes him. But so long as it remains passive it is an impressive symbol, and there is something touching in the respect with which the emperors treated it. Seldom has any State shown such a filial feeling towards its own past as the Romans showed in the tenderness with which they preserved through centuries a futile and impotent institution, because it represented the institutions of their ancestors. Like a portrait of the founder of the family in some nobleman's house, such was the Senate in the city of the Cæsars. It was not expected to move or act; nay, its moving seemed prodigious and ominous; it was expected "picture-like to hang by the wall"; and so long as it did this it was in no danger of being despised or thought superfluous, but on the contrary, was held precious and dear.

Meanwhile liberty was actually dead, and several centuries passed in which Europe resembled Asia. That effeminacy fell upon men which always infects them when they live for a long time under the rule of an all-powerful soldiery. But with effeminacy there came in process of time a development of the feminine virtues. Men ceased to be adventurous, patriotic, just, magnanimous; but, on the other hand, they became chaste, tender-hearted, loyal, religious, and capable of infinite endurance in a good cause.

The second indirect consequence was an increase of material happiness.

The want of system, which had exposed the empire to foreign enemies, had created at the same time much internal misery. Imperialism, intro-money Mr. Dorrisson will have paid? Mr. Disney is not likely to give it back; and if he does not buy the mine in the long run, it will all have been spent for nothing."

"My dear Martha," said Robert, "that little calculation of yours is remarkably feminine, and exceedingly wise. But the essence of speculation, and indeed of more regular business, more amenable to routine, is, that you must make up your mind to throw out sprats, if you would catch whales. Nothing venture, nothing have. If the mine of Campo de los Angeles is what Dorrisson believes it to be, he will never have made a better investment in his life than the money it will have cost him to do the thing quietly, keeping it away from public competition; and if it does not, why, such small losses are all in the day's work of a man like him."

"But, if the mine does not turn out as well as Mr. Dorrisson expects, what about you? Of course I cannot but think chiefly of you, Robert. In that case, all your trouble, and your journey to Paris, and going away from me, and — and — everything, will be all no use, won't it? And what does Mr. Shaw say to it?"

"O, never mind him. Shaw is a very good fellow, and thinks, with reason, that his best place is at the office, looking after the odd six-and-eightpences, — very odd they have been up to this time, I am sorry to say. He does not want to interfere in anything of this kind. And as for me, it cannot be a loss to me, for I shall have all my expenses and a liberal fee from Dorrisson, if nothing comes of it: and if it turns out well, I shall have made a capital hit."

Something certain was to come of it, then, at any rate. This explicit statement elicited from Robert, my spirits rose. I did not tell him so. I felt I must provoke him, however long-suffering he might be, by such an avowal; but in my heart I thought a great deal more of the liberal fee, which was a certainty, than of the capital hit which "might" be made.

Robert went off on his journey the next morning; and after our early dinner, my mother-in-law departed, in the lop-sided brougham, — the horse looking more than ever repulsive, in consequence of his having rubbed some hair off his tail, thereby establishing a bare patch to match that on his side; and the coachman more than usually sullen and odious. The day was beautiful, however; and as we lumbered heavily along, I enjoyed the summer weather, followed Robert mentally on his way, and felt extremely glad that one of Mrs. Heron's peculiarities was a dislike to talking in a carriage. The visit was not more than ordinarily tedious. Robert's trip to Paris was of course commented upon, and loftily pronounced by Mrs. John to be "very much calculated to unsettle a young professional man"; as if Robert were a naturally dissipated and unprincipled person, — not to be trusted away from the wholesome restraints of office hours and Clapham evenings. But she charitably hoped Robert had made a profitable business connection, as he was employed by a person who required him to go "abroad" in his service. I replied that I hoped so, that I believed Robert expected it would prove so, but said generally as little as possible, — a line of tactics, on my part, which did not please Mrs. John, who was insatiably curious, but induced her to remark, spitefully, that it was evident Robert adhered to the masculine belief that women were not to be trusted with business matters, and to the masculine practice of keeping his affairs to himself. I did not contend the point with her. If she chose to regard me in the light of a victim, — esteemed unworthy of my husband's confidence, in consequence of the inferiority of my understanding, — she might do so. I was perfectly satisfied with knowing better, and knowing also that nothing was less satisfactory to Mrs. John than my imperturbable calmness on such occasions. It was rather hard on John that I declined to lose my temper, for Mrs. John always lorded it over him frightfully, when she was more or less defeated in her little manoeuvres; and he not unfrequently had a bad time of it when my mother-in-law and I had been to Acanthus Lodge, Kingston-on-Thames.

FOREIGN NOTES.

THE Pall Mall Gazette has reduced its price to one penny.

AN English paper remarks, with a slight touch of sarcasm, that Goldwin Smith "appears to have become deeply attached to his own country."

A COMMITTEE of scientific men has been formed in England to raise a monument to Faraday, the Prince of Wales acting as president of the society.

THERE is a "Carlyle and Emerson Association" in London. Its object is not altogether plain to unanointed eyes, but "every admirer of Carlyle, Emerson, Matthew Arnold, &c., is earnestly engaged, whatever his position, to co-operate in the movement." The Association publish a magazine called "The Idealist." That this magazine is in want of subscribers is perhaps a sordid reflection.

It is well known that in many parts of Ireland and Scotland the natives prefer their ragged dirty one-pound notes to the brightest sovereign. Indeed, the more soiled and worn the paper the better it is liked, the theory being that it must be genuine since it has passed through the hands of so many different people; had there been anything wrong with it, it would have been discovered before.

A FRENCH doctor has discovered that turpentine is a sure antidote to phosphorus, and he commends this discovery most especially to parents whose children have been sucking lucifer matches. It appears that, in more than twenty cases of this kind he has employed turpentine (one teaspoonful neat) successfully; and his report on the subject of these cures has been favorably received by the Academy of Medicine.

THE new opera house at Vienna, the first stone of which was laid in 1862, has cost £600,000. There were two architects, one to superintend the construction, and the other the decorations, but neither lived to see the completion of the building; both died last year. The house is lighted by 4,000 jets of gas. The salle is decorated in white and gold, with red hangings, and illuminated with 420 jets of gas and numerous candelabra.

As Mr. Lecky's book has given a fresh stimulus to the old controversy on the genesis of morals, the following concise statement of French opinion on the subject (from the Vie Parisienne) may perhaps be interesting at this moment; at least, it is decided enough: "Il n'y a ni bien ni mal; ni vice, ni vertu; ni beauté, ni laideur; il y a des traditions reçues, des usages admis, et des appréciations relatives au temps et à la société dans laquelle on vit."

THE Rangoon Times describes a Burmese festival called the "Nga Thoob Pwai," — the fish-liberating feast, — which occurs every year. The Burmese believe it highly meritorious to save all kinds of life, and during the month of April they go through the bazaars and buy up all the live fish they can find, as well as fowls, ducks, goats, cows, turtles, and other animals. The fish are set free in a large lake in the neighborhood of Rangoon, and the birds and beasts are turned loose in the jungle.

It would appear that the business of printing and publishing is not without its unpleasantness in Paris. Here is a case in point: M. Schiller is a publisher in Paris; and for some time he printed two sheets, — the Rappel and the Pays. The Rappel is revolutionary; the Pays is ultra-Imperialist. When the elections were over the police began to lock up the editorial excitors of hatred, &c., and such was M. Schiller's alarm that he refused to continue publishing the Rappel. But when the offices of the Rappel were searched, and the last numbers of the paper found to be seditious, M. Schiller was prosecuted by the Minister of Justice. On the other hand, no sooner was one prosecution commenced than another was begun by the proprietor of the Rappel for breach of contract. In both instances the unhappy M. Schiller was found guilty; the verdicts costing him a month's imprisonment and 2,000 francs.

A PARISIAN journal points out with some grimness how it may be safer in France, under certain circumstances, to slay one's neighbor than to thrash him. An unfortunate man named Patry, having acquired proofs of his wife's infidelity, recently killed her and fired at her lover, a learned but gallant attorney. For this double crime, murder and intent to murder, he was tried at the assizes of Tours, and acquitted with honors. "Now," remarks the journal, "if instead of killing his wife, this man had merely given her a beating; and if, instead of shooting three slugs at the attorney, he had caught hold of that worthy by the neck and belabored him in the market-place the law would certainly have punished him with a fine of 100 francs on the first count, and two months' imprisonment on the second. Whence it ensues — such at least is the obviously French conclusion — that a double-barrelled gun is a more useful adjunct to a marital trousseau than a horsewhip.

The Count took an active part in the three days at Waterloo, and, unlike his chiefs, did not distinguish himself by betraying his sovereign. He had a servant, one Peter, who died lately, devoted in his attachment, which attachment, however, now and then proved somewhat inconvenient, owing to the persistence with which he manifested it. A heavy storm of rain, as well as of bullets, was pouring down on the field of Waterloo. The general absorbed by watching the movements of his brigade, suddenly perceived Peter following him. "Go back," he said; "I forbid your being with me," and, putting spurs to his charger, moved his position. An hour later a shriek of anguish uttered on his right made him turn his head, and he then saw Peter on the ground, his thigh-bone smashed by a splinter from a ball. Furious, and without reflecting on his words, "Serve you right," exclaimed the Count; "why did you not obey my orders?" "Well!" replied the devoted servant, "if these English had broken your thigh instead of mine, who would have carried you to the rear?"

ONE of the London theatres is playing an extraordinary drama, the scene of which is laid in America during the late war. The play is entitled "Edendale." The plot appears to be this: —

Edendale is a Virginian estate owned by one Colonel Vandeleur, a Southern gentleman, whose daughter Ada, the Juliet of the play, finds her Romeo in Esmond Fairholt, an officer in the United States army. Edendale is first exhibited while peace yet prevails, and the course of true love between Ada and Fairholt is running smoothly enough. Then come the news of the attack upon Fort Sumter. Fairholt has to join the forces of the North, and to take arms against the Vandeleurs and the South. The lovers, parted under these painful circumstances, do not meet again until Edendale has been ravaged by war and the Confederate cause has suffered terribly. Ada hardens her heart against her lover, and holds him in detestation as one of the oppressors of her country. Colonel Vandeleur is killed in action and his son is taken prisoner. An interval of eighteen months separates the events of the second and third acts. The war is over. Fairholt has become a general, and has received from the President a grant of the Edendale property as a reward for his services in the field. (1) He restores the estate to Mrs. Vandeleur, and obtains the release of her son from captivity. Ultimately Ada softens towards the generous conqueror, and the curtain falls upon her complete reconciliation with him.

THE Gaulois, it would appear, is in search of a theatrical critic, its own having married. The Gaulois bethought of a combination by which it could secure the popular name of Alexander Dumas fils as a substitute for that of its late critic, and accordingly wrote to beg of the author of "La Dame aux Camélias" to fix his own terms, select his own hours, write not ordinary feuilletons de théâtre, but a series of articles that might subsequently appear en volume, and thus add another leaf to his wreath of literary fame; in fact, the Gaulois clothed the suggestion in tempting attire, and gives us M. Dumas's reply, which, unfortunately for that most amusing paper, contains an unqualified refusal, chiefly grounded on the fact of the growing indifference of the present generation to any serious literary work. "The public," writes M. Dumas, "puts La Patti, Mdlle. Favart, Blanche d'Antigny, Thérèse, Schneider, Le Petit Faust, Julie, La Belle Hélène, les inutiles, rares émeutes, all in the same bag, considers them as on the same level, and weighs them all in the same balance. Whatever attracts the public from home is equally popular, because in truth, ils'embête at home; friends no longer meet on intimate terms, family ties are loosening, reflection terrifies, and solitude becomes unbearable. The public, therefore, rushes out, and goes wherever there is most excitement, and therefore wherever there is most chance of distraction. We may ask for applause and for money, but we shall not obtain attention. Talk of the work that has been the most frequently acted, applauded, or hissed, the public will not listen to you. What does it care for the art, the object, the merit, or the influence on society of a literary composition? All it asks for is the sensation of the moment." In these few lines Alexander Dumas fil's photographs the Parisian public of the year of grace 1869.

CLOSE upon the deaths of Rossini, Berlioz, and Molique has come that of Albert Grisar, a composer whose works will long have a place upon the French operatic stage. Grisar, born at Anvers in 1808 and apprenticed to a commercial house at Liverpool, did not devote himself entirely to music till 1830. His success, however, was rapid. In 1833 his first opera, "Le Mariage Impossible," was produced at the Théâtre de la Monnaie, Brussels, and proved so far successful that it encouraged him to try his fortune in Paris. Two years afterwards he wrote "Sarah" for the Opéra Comique, following it up by other works which successively added to his reputation. "Gilles Ravisseur" (1848) was the beginning of a series of triumphs. "Les Porcherons" (1850), "Bon soir, M. Pantalon" (1851), "Le Carillonneur de Bruges" (1852), and "Le Chien du Jardinier" (1855), were all received with acclamation. In the last-named year Grisar's fortune culminated. Afflicted with a long and serious illness, he did nothing till 1862, while his subsequent productions added little to his fame and attained but a moderate success. During the last few years his life seems to have been sadly embittered. He grew taciturn and morose. "A great beer-drinker," says M. Arthur Pougin in La France Musicale, "he went every evening to a café, cowered down in a corner, apart, wrapped in his large brown cloak, and there swallowed innumerable glasses without speaking a word." With this morbid condition his end was in keeping. More and more tormented by "un noir chagrin," apoplexy, it is said, brought him relief. He was found dead in his bed. As a composer Grisar was remarkable for the degree in which he illustrated the best of traits of the French school. Lively and graceful melody united to piquant and effective orchestration distinguish all his works.

FLO AND FIDO.

FLO is devoted to sketching,
 She's painting the slow-setting sun,
 But Fido, he fain would be stretching
 His legs in a walk or a run.
 Flo finds it ample enjoyment
 The beauties of nature to trace,
 While Fido — oh, pleasant employment! —
 Must gaze in his mistress's face,
 With a whine now and then,
 As if asking her when
 She will lay by her sketch-book and come for a race.

Of all save her picture forgetful,
 Flo finds the time rapidly go,
 While Fido — rude dog — has grown fretful,
 And weary of looking at Flo.
 He is longing like mad for a scamper,
 And wishing the picture were done;
 The waiting cools down, like a damper,
 His natural spirits and fun.
 So he makes this remark,
 In the form of a bark,
 "Pray leave off that drawing and let's have a run!"

O Fido! would I were your proxy,
 I'd sit there and worship all day!

I'd dream of no heterodoxy
 Like wishing to scamper away.
 You — fortunate dog — are permitted
 To contemplate Flora the fair;
 You may stare, but you'll never be twitted
 With hints that it's vulgar to stare.
 You ill-mannered cur,
 While you're sitting near her,
 What taste to be wishing that you were elsewhere!

Why Fred, Tom, Augustus, and Harry
 (The ground that she treads on they love)
 Would be proud, sir, to fetch or to carry,
 As you do, her kerchief or glove, —
 Would feel themselves amply rewarded
 By one of the smiles she gives you,
 They'd jump at the least chance afforded
 To lie at her feet as you do!
 O Fido, fie, fie
 You're more happy than I,
 If you only your exquisite happiness knew.

Come, leave off that fretting and whining;
 What numbers of fellows I know
 Would, their liberty gladly resigning,
 Like you, become servants of Flo!
 For to gaze on sweet Flora, unchidden,
 As long as her sketching endures,
 Is a bliss which to man is forbidden —
 Which your blest position insures.
 Ay, with Flo for my wife,
 I could lead "a dog's life" —
 Provided, of course, "a dog's life" is like yours!

THE RED BREAST OF THE ROBIN.

AN IRISH LEGEND.

Of all the merry little birds that live up in the tree,
 And carol from the sycamore and chestnut,
 The prettiest little gentleman that dearest is to me,
 Is the one in coat of brown and scarlet waistcoat.
 It's cockit little Robin!
 And his head he keeps a-bobbin'.

Of all the other pretty fowls I'd choose him;
 For he sings so sweetly still,
 Through his tiny slender bill,
 With a little patch of red upon his bosom.

When the frost is in the air, and the snow upon the ground,
 To other little birdies so bewilderin',
 Picking up the crumbs near the window he is found,
 "Singing Christmas stories to the children:
 Of how two tender babes
 Were left in woodland glades,
 By a cruel man who took 'em there to lose 'em;
 But Bobby saw the crime;
 (He was watching all the time!)
 And he blushed a perfect crimson on his bosom.

When the changing leaves of autumn around us thickly fall,
 And everything seems sorrowful and saddening,
 Robin may be heard on the corner of a wall
 Singing what is solacing and gladdening.
 And sure, from what I've heard,
 He's God's own little bird,
 And sings to those in grief just to amuse 'em;
 But once he sat forlorn
 On a cruel Crown of Thorn,
 And the blood it stained his pretty little bosom.

VICTOR HUGO: "L'HOMME QUI RIT."

BY ALGERNON CHARLES SWINBURNE.

ONCE only in my life I have seen the likeness of Victor Hugo's genius. Crossing over when a boy from Ostend, I had the fortune to be caught in mid-channel by a thunder-storm strong enough to delay the packet some three good hours over the due time. About midnight the thunder-cloud was right overhead, full of incessant sound and fire, lightening and darkening so rapidly that it seemed to have life, and a delight in its life. At the same hour the sky was clear to the west, and all along the sea-line there sprang and sank as to music a restless dance or chase of summer lightnings across the lower sky; a race and riot of lights, beautiful and rapid as a course of shining Oceanides along the tremulous floor of the sea. Eastward, at the same moment, the space of clear sky was higher and wider, a splendid semicircle of too intense purity to be called blue; it was of no color nameable by man; and midway in it, between the storm and the sea, hung the motionless full moon; Artemis watching with a serene splendor of scorn the battle of Titans and the revel of nymphs, from her stainless and Olympian summit of divine indifferent light. Underneath and about us the sea was paved with flame; the whole water trembled and hissed with phosphoric fire; even through the wind and thunder I could hear the crackling and sputtering of the water-sparks. In the same heaven and in the same hour there shone at once the three contrasted glories, golden and fiery and white, of moonlight and of the double lightnings, forked and sheet; and under all this miraculous heaven lay a flaming floor of water.

That, in a most close and exact symbol, is the best possible definition I can give of Victor Hugo's genius. And the impression of that hour was upon me the impression of his mind; physical, as it touched the nerves with a more vivid passion of pleasure than music or wine; spiritual, as it exalted the spirit with the senses, and above them, to the very summit of vision and delight. It is no fantastic similitude, but an accurate likeness of two causes working to the same effect. There is nothing but that delight like the delight given by some of his works. And it is because his recent book has not seldom given it me again, that I have anything here to say of it.

It is a book to be rightly read, not by the lamplight of realism, but by the sunlight of his imagination reflected upon ours. Only so shall we see it as it is, much less understand it. The beauty it has, and the meaning, are ideal; and therefore cannot be impaired by any want of realism. Error and violation of likelihood or fact, which would damn a work of Balzac's or of Thackeray's, cannot even lower or lessen the rank and value of a work like this. To put it away because it has not the great and precious qualities of their school, but those of a school quite different, is just as wise as it would be, on the other hand, to assault the fame of Bacon on the ground that he has not written in the manner of Shakespeare; or Newton's, because he has not written like Milton. This premised, I shall leave the dissection of names and the anatomy of probabilities to the things of chatter and chuckle, so well and scientifically defined long since by Mr. Charles Reade as "anonymuncles who go scribbling about"; there is never any lack of them; and it will not greatly hurt the master poet of an age that they should shriek and titter, cackle and hoot inaudibly behind his heel. It is not every demigod who is vulnerable there.

This book has in it, so to say, a certain elemental quality. It is great because it deals greatly with great emotion. It is a play played out not by human characters only; wind and sea, thunder and moonlight, have their parts too to fill. Nor is this all; for it is itself a thing like these things, living as it were an elemental life. It pierces and shakes the very roots of passion. It catches and bends the spirit as Pallas caught Achilles and bent him by the hair. Were it not so, this would be no child of the master's; but so, as always, it is. Here, too, the birthmark of the great race is visible.

It is not, whatever it may seem, a novel or a study, historical or social. What touches on life or manners, we see to be accidental byplay as soon as we see what the book is indeed; the story of the battle of a human spirit, first with Fate, then with the old three subordinate enemies: the World, the Flesh, and the Devil. And here I will say where the flaw, as I think, lies; for, like other great things, a great book must have a flaw. The Flesh and the Devil, Josiane and Barkilphedro, are perfect; the World is drawn wrong. And the reason is not far to seek. We all brush daily against the Flesh and the Devil, we must all rub shoulders and shake hands with them, and they are always much the same at root, only stronger and weaker with this man than with that; therefore it needs only the hand of a great poet to paint them greatly, after their true and very likeness. But the World is multiform. To paint one aright of its many faces you must have come close enough on that side to breathe the breath of its mouth and see by the light of its eyes. No accumulation of fact upon fact gleaned and laid up never so carefully will avail you instead. Titian himself cannot paint without colors. Here we have canvas and easel duly made ready but the colors are not to be had. In other words, here are, many curious and accurate details painfully studied and stored up for use, but, alas! it is not seldom for misuse. Here are many social facts rightly retailed and duly laid out side by side, but no likeness of social life.

Here are the Mohocks of the day for example, much as we find them in Swift; here is often visible even a vexatious excess of labor in the research of small things; useless, because the collector of them has never applied his spirit to the spirit of the time in which these small things played in passing their small parts. He cannot because that time has no attraction for him on any one side to temper the repulsion he feels from another side of it. Pure hate and scorn of an age or a people destroy the faculty of observation, much more of description, even in the historic mind; what, then, will they do in the poetic? Doubtless there has been, as doubtless there is now, much that is hateful and contemptible in social matters, English or other; much also, as certainly, that is admirable and thank-worthy. Doubtless, too, at one time and another there has been more visible of evil and shameful than of noble and good. But there can never have been a time of unmixed good or evil; and he only who has felt the pulse of an age can tell us how fast or slow its heart really beat towards evil or towards good. A man who writes of a nation or a time, however bad and base in the main, without any love for it, cannot write of it well. A great English poetess has admirably said that a poet's heart may be large enough to hold two nations.* Victor Hugo's, apart from its heroic love of man, a love matchless except by Shelley's, holds two nations especially close, two of the greatest. It has often been said he is French and Spanish; that is, he loves France and Spain, the spirit of them attracts his spirit; but he does not love England. There are great Englishmen whom no man has praised more nobly than he; but the spirit of historic England has no attraction for him. Hence, far more important than any passing errors of grotesque nomenclature or misplaced detail, the spiritual and ingrained error of the book, seen only from its social or historic side. We catch nowhere for a moment the note of English life in the reign of Anne.† Those for whom I write will know, and will see, that I do not write as a special pleader for a country or a class, as one who will see no spot in England or nobility. But indeed it is an abuse of words to say that England is governed or misgoverned by her aristocracy. A republican, studying where to strike, should read better the blazon on his enemy's shield. "England," I have heard it said, "is not 'a despotism tempered by epigrams,' but a plutocracy modified by accidents."

* I know not if it has been remarked how decisive a note of the English spirit there is in Molière, a Frenchman of the French: an English current, as recognizable as indefinable, passing under and through the tide-stream of his genius. There is a more northern flavor mixed into his mind, a more northern tone interlarded, than into any other of the great French writers, Rabelais excepted. Villon for instance, in so many ways so like them both, is nothing if not Parisian. And if I am not wrong, no third great Frenchman has ever found such acceptance and sympathy among Englishmen unimbued with the French spirit as Rabelais and Molière. For them instinct breaks down the bar of ignorance.

† For one instance, if a court lady had indeed insulted Swift, she would certainly have had, by way of answer, something (in De Quincey's phrase) "as monstrously Swiftian for quotation"; something so monstrous that the Dean might thenceforth have held the next place to Gwynplaine in her heart.

Enough now of the flaws and failures in this work, "enough, with over-measure." We have yet before us the splendor of its depth and heights. Entering the depths first, we come upon the evil spirit of the place. Barkilphedro, who plays here the part of devil, is a bastard begotten by Iago upon his sister, Madame de Merteuil: having something of both, but diminished and degraded; wanting, for instance, the deep dæmonic calm of their lifelong patience. He has too much inward heat of discontent, too much fever and fire, to know their perfect peace of spirit, the equable element of their souls, the quiet of mind in which they live and work out their work at leisure. He does not sin at rest: there is somewhat of fume and fret in his wickedness. Theirs is the peace of the devil, which passeth all understanding. He, though like them sinning for sin's sake, and hating for the love of hate, has yet a too distinct and positive quality of definable evil. He is actually ungrateful, envious, false. Of them we cannot say that they are thus or thus; in them there is a purity and simplicity of sin, which has no sensible components; which cannot be resolved by analysis into this evil quality and that. Barkilphedro, as his maker says with profound humor, "has his faults." We fear that a sufficient bribe might even tempt him into virtue for a moment, seduce him to soil by a passing slip the virginity of vice. Nevertheless, as the evil spirit of envy rather than the devil absolute, he is a strong spirit and worth study. The few chapters, full of fiery eloquence and a passion bitter as blood, in which his evil soul is stripped and submitted to vivisection, contain, if read aright, the best commentary ever written on Iago. We see now at last what no scholiast on Shakespeare could show us, how the seed may be sown and watered which in season shall bring forth so black a blossom, a poison so acrid and so sure.

In this poem, as in the old pictures, we see the serpent writhing, not fangless, under the foot of an angel, and in act to bruise as of old the heel that bruises his head. Only this time it is hardly an angel of light. Unconscious of her office as another St. Michael, the Angel of the Flesh treads under the unconquerable Devil. Seen but once in full, the naked glory of the Titaness irradiates all one side of the poem with excess and superflux of splendor.

Among the fields and gardens, the mountain heights and hollows of Victor Hugo's vast poetic kingdom, there are strange superb inmates, bird and beast of various fur and feather; but as yet there was nothing like this. Balzac, working with other means might have given us, by dint of anxious anatomy, some picture of the virgin harlot. A marvellous study we should have had, one to burn into the brain and brand the memory forever; but rather a thing to admire than desire.

The magnetism of beauty, the effluence of attraction, he would not have given us. But now we have her from the hands of a poet as well as student, new-blown and actual as a gathered flower, in warm bloom of blood and breath, clothed with live color, fair with significant flesh, passionately palpable. This we see first and feel, and after this the spirit. It is a strange beast that hides in this den of roses. Such have been, however, and must be. "We are all a little mad, beginning with Venus." Her maker's definition is complete,—"a possible Astarte latent in an actual Diana." She is not merely spotless in body; she is perverse, not unclean. There is nothing of foulness in the mystic rage of her desire. She is indeed "stainless and shameless"; to be unclean is common, and her "divine depravity" will touch nothing common or unclean. She has seven devils in her, and upon her not a fleck of filth. She has no more in common with the lewd, low hirelings of the baser school of realism than a creature of the brothel and the street has in common with the Mænads who rent in sunder the living limbs of Orpheus. We seem to hear about her the beat and clash of the terrible timbrels, the music that Æschylus set to verse, the music that made mad, the upper notes of the psalm, shrill and strong as a sea-wind, the "bull-voiced" bellowing under-song of these dread choristers from somewhere out of sight, the tempest of tambourines giving back thunder to the thunder,* the fury of divine lust that thickened with human blood the hill-streams of Cithæron.

It is no vain vaunt of the modern master's that he has given us in another guise one of those Æschylean women, a monstrous goddess, whose tone of voice "gave a sort of Promethean grandeur to her furious and amorous words," who had in her the tragic and Titanic passion of the women of the Eleusinian feasts "seeking the satyrs under the stars." And with all this fierce excess of imaginative color and tragic intonation, the woman is modern and possible; she might be now alive, and may be. Some of her words have the light of an apocalypse, the tone of a truth indubitable henceforth and sensible to all. "You were not born with that horrible laugh on your face, were you? No? It must be a penal mutilation. I do hope you have committed some crime.—No one has touched me, I give myself up to you as pure as burning fire, I see you do not believe me, but if you only knew how little I care!—Despise me, you that people despise. Degradation below degradation, what a pleasure! the double flower of ignominy! I am gathering it. Trample me underfoot. You will like me all the better. I know that.—Oh! I should like to be with you in the evening, while they were playing music, each of us leaning back against the same cushion, under the purple awning of a golden galley, in the midst of the infinite sweetnesses of the sea. Insult me. Beat me. Pay me. Treat me like a street-walker. I adore you."

The naturalism of all that is absolute; you hear the words pant and ring. Some might doubt whether her wild citations of old stories that matched her case, her sudden fantastic allusions to these at the very height of her frenzy, were as natural; I think they are. The great poet had a right if it pleased him to give his modern Mænad the thought and the tongue of a Sappho, with the place and the caprice of a Cleopatra. Such a pantheress might be such a poetess; then between fancy and fury we should have our Bassarid complete, only with silk for fox-skin. And this might be; for the type of spirit can hardly be rare in any luxurious age. Perversity is the fruit of weariness as weariness is the fruit of pleasure. Charles Bandelairo has often set that theme to mystic music, but in a minor key: his sweet and subtle lyrics were the prelude to this grand chorus of the master's.

We have seen the soft, fierce play of the incessant summer lightnings, between the deep sky full of passing lights and dreams, and the deep sea full of the salt seed of life; and between them Venus arising, the final and fatal flower of the mystic heaven and of the ravenous sea. Looking now from west to east, we may see the moon-rise, a tender tear-blinded moon, worn thin and pure, ardent and transparent.

A great poet can perfect his picture with strangely few touches. We see Virgilliar as clearly as Imogen; we see Dea as clearly as Esmeralda. Yet Imogen pervades the action of Cymbeline, Virgilia hardly speaks in crossing the stage of Coriolanus. It is not easy to write at all about the last chapters of the book; something divine is there, impalpable and indefinable. I must steal the word I want; they are "written as if in a star-fire and immortal tears." Or, to take Shakespeare's words after Carlyle's, they are "most dearly sweet and bitter." The pathos of Æschylus is no more like Dante's, Dante's no more like Shakespeare's, than any of these is like Hugo's. Every master of pathos has a key of his own to unlock the source of tears, or of that passionate and piteous pleasure which lies above and under the region of tears. Some, like Dante, condense the whole agony of a life into one exquisite and bitter drop of distilled pain. Others, like Shakespeare, translate it pang by pang into a complete cadence and symphony of suffering. Between Lear and Ugolino the balance can never be struck. Charles Lamb, we may remember, spent hours on the debate with a friend who upheld Dante's way of work against Shakespeare's. On which side we are to range the greatest poet of our own age, there can be no moment of question. I am not sure that he has ever touched the keys of sorrow with surer hand to deeper music than here.

There is nothing in his work of a more heavenly kind; yet, or it may be because, every word has in it the vibration of earthly emotion; but through it rather than above, there grows and pierces a note of divine tenderness, the very passion of pity that before this has made wise men mad. Even more than the pathos of this close, its purity and exaltation are to be noted; nothing of common is there, nothing of theatrical. And indeed it needed the supreme sweetness of Dea's reappearance, a figure translucent with divine death, a form of flesh that the light of heaven shines through more and more as the bodily veil wears thinner and consumes, to close with music and the luminous vision of a last comfort a book so full of the sound and shine of storm. With the clamor and horror yet in our ears of that raging eloquence in which the sufferer flings into the faces of prosperous men the very flame and hell-fire of his suffering, it needed no less than this to leave the mind exalted and reconciled. But this dew of heaven is enough to quench or allay the flames of any hell. There are words of a sweetness unsurpassable, as these: "Tout cela s'en va, et il n'y aura plus de chansons." And upon all these dwells the measureless and nameless peace of night upon a still sea. To this quiet we have been led through all the thunder and tumult of things fatal, from the tempestuous overture of storm and whirlwind; from sea again to sea. There is a divine and terrible harmony in this chorus of the play, secretly and strangely sustained, yet so that on a full reading we feel it, though at first sight or hearing it must be misread.

Of the master's unequalled power upon natural things, upon the elements we call inanimate, knowing even less the laws of their life than of ours, there is happily no need, as surely there are no words, to speak. Part of this power we may recognize as due to the subtle and deep admixture of moral emotion and of human sentiment with the mysterious motion and passion of nature. Thus, in "Les Travailleurs de la Mer," the wind and the sea gain strength and depth from the human figure set to fight them: from the depth and strength of the incarnate spirit so doing and suffering. Thus in this book there is a new sense and a new sublimity added to the tempest by the remorse of men sinking at once under sin and storm, drowned under a double weight of deeds and waves.

Not even in that other book is the supreme mastery of nature, the lordship of the forces of things, more admirable and wonderful than throughout the first part of this. He who could think to describe might think to rival it. But of one point I cannot but take note; there is nothing, even at the height of tragic horror, repellent, ugly, hateful. It has been said there is, and will be said again; for how should there not be distorted eyes and envious tongues in the world? Indeed a pieuvre is no pleasant playfellow; the "tree of man's making" bears a fearful fruit; the monstrous maidenhood of Josiane is no sister to the starry virginity of Dea; but how has the great poet handled these things? The mutilation of a child's face is a thing unbearable for thought to rest on; but have we not seen first the face of a heroic soul? Far elsewhere than in the work of our sovereign poet must we look for the horror which art will have none of, which nature flings back with loathing in the bringer's face. If not, we of this time who love and serve his art should indeed be in a bad case. But upon this matter we cannot permit the blind and nameless leaders of the nameless blind to decide for us. Let the serious and candid student look again for himself and see. That "fight of the dead with the dark," that swinging of carrion-birds with the swing of the gibbeted carrion, might have been so done into words as to betget in us mere loathing; but how is it done here? The mighty manner of Victor Hugo has given to this ghastly matter something even of a horrible charm, a shocking splendor of effect. The rhythmic horror of the thing penetrates us not with loathing, but with a tragic awe and terror as at a real piece of the wind's work, an actual caprice of the night's, a portion of the tempest of things. So it is always; handle what he may, the touch of a great poet will leave upon it a spell to consume and transmute whatever a weaker touch would leave in it of repulsion.

Whether or not we are now speaking of a great poet, of a name imperishable, is not a question which can be gravely deliberated. I have only to record my own poor conviction, based on some study and comparison of the men, that precisely as we now think of those judges who put Fletcher above Shakespeare, Cowley above Milton, the paid poets of Richelieu beside Corneille, and I know not whom beside Molière, will the future think of those judges who would place any poet of his age by the side of Victor Hugo. Nor has his age proved poor — it has rather been singularly rich — in men and in poets really and greatly admirable. But even had another done as well once and again as the master himself, who has done so well as much? Had he done but half, had he done but a tenth of his actual work, his supremacy, being less incontestable, would no doubt have been less contested. A parsimonious poet calculates well for his own time. Had Victor Hugo granted us but one great play, — say "Marion de Lorme," — but one great lyric work, — say "Les Contemplations," — but one great tragic story, — say any one you please, — the temptation to decry and denounce him by comparison would have been less; for with the tribe of Barkilphedro the strength of this temptation grows with the growth of the benefit conferred. And very potent is that tribe in the world of men and of letters.

As for me, I am not careful to praise or dispraise by comparison at all. I am not curious to inquire what of apparent or of actual truth there may be in any charge brought against the doer of the greatest things done, the giver of the greatest gifts given among men in our time. Goethe found his way of work mechanical and theatrical; Milton also lived to make oblique recantation of his early praise of Shakespeare; we may, and should, wish this otherwise: yet none the less are they all great men. It may be there is perceptible in Victor Hugo something too much of positive intention, of prepossession, application, of composition and forethought: what if there were? One question stands forth first and last; is the work done good work and great, or not? A lesser question is this; these that we find to be faults, are they qualities separable from the man's nature? could we have his work without them? If not, and if his work be great, what will it profit us to blame them or to regret? First, at all events, let us have the sense to enjoy it and the grace to give thanks. What, for example, if there be in this book we have spoken of errors of language, errors historical or social? Has it not throughout a mighty hold upon men and things, the godlike strength of grasp which only a great man can have of them? And for quiet power of hand, for scornful sureness of satiric truth, what can exceed his study of the queen of England (Anne)? Has it not been steeped in the tears and the fire of live emotion? If the style be overcharged and overshadowing with bright sharp strokes and points, these are no fireworks of any mechanic's fashion: these are the phosphoric flashes of the sea-fire moving on the depth of the limitless and living sea. Enough, that the book is great and heroic, tender and strong; full from end to end of divine and passionate love, of holy and ardent pity for men that suffer wrong at the hands of men; full, not less, of lyric loveliness and lyric force; and I for one am content to be simply glad and grateful: content in that simplicity of spirit to accept it as one more benefit at the hands of the supreme singer now living among us the beautiful and lofty life of one loving the race of men he serves, and of them in all time to be beloved.

BEHIND A SOFA.

I LIKE to creep away into corners and hide myself with the fold of a curtain, or half-open door, or behind one of the great painted fire-screens, or in the shadow of the tallest furniture. There I have odd little fancies all to myself, and wish things and dreams things which nobody knows anything about. For I am different from all the rest; my parents are tall and handsome, and Louise is the prettiest girl I ever saw. Then my brother Harry, who was killed in the Indian Mutiny, was like a prince in a fairy story, so brave and beautiful. But I! I am small and feeble. I cannot run or wrestle, and there is something growing on my shoulders which keeps me from standing straight, and they call me deformed. I shall never grow any more; strangers think me nine or ten years old, but when

I count the years from the date in the family Bible, I find I am sixteen. People always speak kindly to me, with a great pity in their eyes, and once in a while I pity myself, but not often. I like to be this queer little figure. Louise is like the lovely ladies in legends and ballads, and I am like the imps and dwarfs; when I read about them I look at myself in the mirror, and make grimaces, and whirl over on one hand and then on the other, till Louise looks distressed and begs me to stop. Being what I am, of course I don't often go anywhere, except in summer when we leave town; and nobody makes me do anything; so I roam all over the house, and read, and lie with my eyes shut for day-dreams, and am merry and happy almost all the time. I wish I were only six inches high, what fun I would have in the world! Then when we are in the country, I could ride on the birds' backs, and down in the woods I could sit astride of the great lush toad-stools, and drink from acorn-cups, — or by the sea-shore, I fancy I could launch a nautilus and sail away like any grim little sprite. However, to be four feet high has its advantages.

When Harry was wounded, and lay in the hospital, knowing he must die, he wrote a long letter to my father and mother, full of grief, and comfort, too; and then he told them a thing which surprised them greatly. How he was engaged to marry a girl in a town in which they had been quartered. How sweet and lovely she was, and how desolate she would be now: and he wanted them to send for her, and to love her like a daughter. I clapped my hands at that. I like to have people do things to interest me; and the idea of poor Harry having fallen in love! For I know very well what love is: I have read the "Faery Queen" all through, and a great many romances. And some time ago I began a sly watch over Louise, on account of a certain Philip Rayburn coming to the house very often.

But about Harry's lady-love. My mother does not like strangers very well, but being for Harry's sake made a difference, and my father urged the plan. As for Louise, it seemed as if she could not be eager enough for the coming of this Miss Emily Grey, she was so determined to cherish and love her. For my part, as home is all the real world there is for me, I like to have as many characters in it as possible. So when we heard that Emily Grey was coming to England, we invited her to stay with us.

She would not come at once. She was timid, it seemed; or perhaps, Harry being dead, she would rather avoid his household. But Louise pleaded for her, and wrote her a great many loving letters, and at last Emily came.

Emily came. That first evening when they brought her into the parlor, I was lying under the table with my head on a hassock, thinking about the Old Man of the Sea in the Arabian Nights, and wishing I had been one of the genii of those days. But when Emily entered, I forgot everything else, and peered out from under the table-cover at her. What a dainty little lady she was! so pale and slight, she made me think of frail, fluttering, yellow butterflies; partly, I suppose, because of her yellow curls, which fell all over her shoulders when Louise took away her hat and shawl. Her eyes were wide and pale and blue, her cheeks were colorless, and she had a frightened, deprecating way of looking up, even after my stately mamma had embraced her. But Louise kept about her, and cheered her, and talked to her, till she began to look brighter. Louise was so different, such a darling "nut-brown mayde," with honest, dark eyes and rosy cheeks, and lips always ready to smile. Louise is my beauty.

My father and mother went out after a while, and Louise still talked to her guest, while I lay very contentedly on the floor, all curled up just where I could see all that passed without turning my head. Louise went to an étagère at the other end of the room to get a little picture of Harry, and I idly kept watch of Emily. That moment she interested me; her wide, pale eyes narrowed and grew intense, she cast a quick, furtive glance after Louise, and around the room, curving her little white neck, and a strange, bright smile fitted over her lips. I thought instantly of Coleridge's Geraldine with the evil eye, and just for fun I lifted the table-cover and put my head and shoulders out so that she could see me. I am afraid I grinned at her. She shrieked and flung her hands before her face. Louise came running back, and asked what had frightened her.

"Oh!" she whispered, "such a dreadful face peered at me from under the table! There it is again!" And she shuddered.

"Charles!" exclaimed Louise, looking around, "come out, you naughty boy, and speak to Miss Grey. It's only my brother Charlie, our pet. He is full of freaks. One never knows where he is."

Emily Grey looked at me like the saddest and sweetest little creature that ever lived, as I went up to her, and she reached out her small white hand to me, and said, in a low, musical voice, "So this is dear Charlie. I have heard of him. We will be friends, won't we?"

"Will you tell me stories?" I asked. She laughed merrily.

"Yes, heaps of them, child."

"Did you love Harry?" I asked again.

She shivered at that, and looked imploringly at Louise.

"Charlie, you are unkind," said Louise, reproachfully.

"Well, then, I won't ask her if she loved Harry. I'll go off and read my book of hobgoblins."

"O no! don't be vexed, Charlie," said Emily, with great sweetness. "Stay by me, and I will tell you a story." So I stopped, and she told me a senseless story of two girls who went to school. When I saw it was not going to amount to anything, I started to leave her.

"I don't like that," I said. "I like witch stories."

"Ah!" she replied, smiling, "perhaps this will be better." And then she told me a story of an old witch who had a throne down in the slime of the sea, with a string of bones around her neck, and a toad perched on each shoulder. And this witch bought souls, and gave people power over hearts in exchange.

"That was a good story!" I said at the end.

"And now, dear Charlie, go to bed," Louise directed. So I kissed my pretty sister's hand and glided off.

Emily very soon learned to be perfectly at home with us. She seemed to wind herself about the hearts of my father and mother, and as for Louise, — Louise would have walked over burning ploughshares to do her service. I liked her about half the time, and the other half I felt like teasing her. She would grow so white and terrified when I sprang out at her from behind curtains or doors. More than ever I wished that I had fairy power, to change myself into all sorts of shapes, — a tiny flea to hop into her ear, a yellow snake to twine myself with her curls, a mouse to run over her pillow, or an elf in her desk to open her letters! She was such an absurd coward. But being four feet high and not a fairy, I could only find my wicked pleasure in annoying her by constant surveillance and sudden starts. She seemed afraid to be angry with me, and never exposed me. Perhaps her conscience made her uneasy, for my dear innocent-hearted Louise never was startled or terrified by her dwarf Charlie's tricks.

O, slender, willowy Emily, yellow-haired Emily, my brother's darling! why were you not all Louise dreamed you, pure-hearted and true, sorrowing and loving? My father treated her as another daughter, and declared she should never leave us; my mother gradually came to consult her exquisite taste in all little matters which Louise formerly decided. And at last they even insisted on her putting off the badge of her fidelity to Harry, — her mourning, — despite the sad little shake of her head in remonstrance.

"She shall not make a nun of herself," exclaimed my father.

"My heart will be in mourning all the time," she whispered to Louise; and Louise kissed her.

Spring came, and our mother commenced house-cleaning on a grand scale; every room was visited, scoured, and painted, and the furniture rearranged. How she made the servants fly about! Every one wished it well at an end; every one but me; I found too much fun in it. I rolled over on mattresses; made nests to curl myself up in among heaps of blankets; revelled in hidden relics brought to light; perched myself on cupboard shelves; read Gulliver's Travels undisturbed in the pantry by a jar of sweetmeats; and a dozen times nearly tripped up our portly butler as he was carrying loaded trays up stairs. When the raid extended to the sitting-rooms, I found unanticipated pleasure. The statuettes of bronze and marble had always looked at each other so unmoved from their different corners that it provoked me. I had read somewhere in a German story of a house where the China figures of a shepherdess and a chimney-sweep made love to each other when no one was in the room, and finally ran off together. I was always hoping something of the kind might happen in our art collection, and now, when all the casts and figures were set down in a crowd on the great centre-table, it really seemed as if they could not keep silence. At night, when every one had gone to their rooms, a whim seized me to creep softly down stairs, and peep into the drawing-room to see what was going on among the bronzes and marbles. The moonlight lay across the table, and Clytie unchanged never breathed or moved, though a bronze Pan made mute music on his pipes before her, as motionless as she. Faust did not kiss Marguerite; and Mercury, poised on one toe, did not catch at the chance to substitute the other foot. Altogether the assemblage was a failure. Have the fairies, then, never yet crossed the ocean from Germany?

There was a low hum of voices in the kitchen below; so, disappointed in my miracle-seeking, I thought I would slip down stairs, and see what was going on so late. The butler, the cook, and the chamber-maid, each stood, candle in hand, lingering over some dispute.

"Well, leastways," said the butler, "Miss Emily have a very sweet manner, and that's all I know."

"She have her own way, that's what she have!" said the cook.

"Hum!" interrupted Kitty, "she makes cold chills run over me. She's winding 'em all about her two little fingers, and she has the evil eye for certain. Mind you, she, brings no good!"

Next morning, as I met Emily on the staircase, I stopped her and looked straight up at her face.

"What's the matter now, Charlie?" she asked, with a toss of her yellow curls.

"I want to see your eyes; please look at me."

"What for?" she demanded, without meeting my glance.

"Kitty says you have the evil eye for certain. What does she mean, Emily?" I asked, mischievously.

"I should think, Charlie, you might know by this time that what servants mean is not of the slightest importance." And she moved haughtily by me.

A week after Kitty was dismissed. Louise pleaded for her in vain. She had lived with us for six years, and I asked my mother what fault she had committed.

"Emily has discovered her in some dishonesty," mother said, quietly. "I don't know what I should do without Emily."

Evidently Emily was quite usurping Louise's place, but Lou did n't seem to mind, and loved her just as well. One day I asked Lou if she was n't jealous. She blushed brightly, and said, with a shy smile, "Why, Charlie, if I should ever be leaving home, you know, I should feel so much better to have my place filled, so that they would not miss me!"

"I should miss you! I should miss you!" I exclaimed, clinging to her, and half crying. She bent and kissed me.

"My darling boy, do you think I should not take you with me? We will never be parted, Charlie. I could not bear any one to take my place in your heart!"

I suppose when she spoke of leaving home, she was thinking of Philip Rayburn, for I had heard several little hints and whispers lately, which made me pretty sure that some things were settled between them; and he came to the house oftener than ever.

When the reception-rooms were all arranged again, my mother disposed the furniture differently, moving chairs and tables and sofas to quite different positions, Emily advising her. One great, richly carved sofa, with a high antique back, she insisted should be placed transversely across a corner.

"It looks so much easier than to have it stiff and straight by the side of the wall," she said. I chuckled to myself, for I foresaw a rare hiding-place, which might remain unsuspected for a long time if I were careful; and the next chance I had, when no one was in the room, I collected a few things in that corner for private delectation. I put the softest hassock there, and a Scotch plaid to lie on, one of my little chloroform bottles which I keep to smell at when I am nervous, and some of my favorite books. Of course I could not read in there, but just the laying my hand or my cheek on a volume makes it seem like a companion, and brings its contents all into my mind. Such a snug little triangle as I made of it, shaded and secluded entirely by the high back of ancient carving, and the only light which could reach me there must crawl along the carpet, under the damask and fringe. It was very satisfactory, and all my own secret.

Emily began to be invited everywhere; under mamma's chaperonage society received her with open arms; bouquets and cards of invitation kept our little waitresses doing duty at all hours, and gentlemen made calls of an evening, inquiring especially for Miss Grey. My mother scolded her for receiving them so coolly; but, despite the coldness, Emily infused some nameless charm into her manner which made them call again and again.

It was during these days that Louise and Philip had a falling out; why, I did not know, but some trouble there evidently was. Louise grew sad and constrained, but made no confidant of any one unless it was Emily. I would have cut my right hand off at any time to serve Louise, but she never asked me to serve her.

One day I heard her say to Emily, "You must see him when he comes this afternoon. I cannot. And O make him understand that I never could have written those dreadful letters, and tell him that I cannot see him till he has faith in me again. It would break my heart to see distrust in his eyes. O Emily!" And my bonnie Louise bowed her head and wept.

It cut me to the heart, and I was so helpless to aid her! For the first time in my life I regretted my peculiar physique, for other brothers were expected to defend their sisters, and did it; but what could I, a poor dwarf, do to bold, athletic, handsome Philip Rayburn? I felt very ignominious, and crept away to my corner and my chloroform behind the sofa for consolation, and there fell asleep in my misery.

I awoke suddenly at last, hearing voices. I am always on the alert, and never startled into making a noise, so I lay perfectly still and quiet to hear what was going on. Emily Grey was talking to Philip Rayburn in her characteristic, low, sweet voice, and I could imagine just how her lovely pale face looked with its great, sad blue eyes, and her yellow curls floating over her shoulders.

"It puzzles me so," she said, hesitatingly; "I cannot bear to believe that Louise wrote them: and yet—what can I believe, Mr. Rayburn? O do not say you are sure of her guilt!"

"Miss Grey," said Philip, sternly, "your affection must not mislead you. The letters were sent from this house, and the writing is undeniably that of Louise. She is afraid to meet the one she has so deceived and injured. Do not let your kind heart excuse her too far, Miss Grey!"

Emily's voice trembled as she replied: "O Mr. Rayburn, I cannot bear it! To deceive you—you who are so true and noble! She could not, indeed, she could not!"

Philip spoke in softer tones,—"You pity me, Emily? The world is not all false, then."

A moment's silence ensued. O, if I could only have peeped out at them unseen, for I certainly believe that Emily bent her graceful head over Philip's hand and wept upon it. I was fierce with indignation, but perfectly collected. Perhaps the dwarf could help his darling, after all.

Presently Philip rose to go.

"I suppose, then, we shall not see you any more?" murmured Emily, plaintively. How I hated that false, plaintive murmur!

"Hardly again," he said, gloomily. "And yet, Emily, I shall not wish to lose your friendship. In ten days I will call and inquire for you, and give into your hands the letters which I have received from Louise, and you can return them to her."

Then he went. As the street-door closed after him, Emily threw herself down upon the sofa, and with her face in the pillows, muttered very low, "I love him, and I shall win him now. And yet, and yet, his heart will never be really mine. O cruel fate! Why was Louise ever born to spoil the only love I care for?"

And she writhed upon the sofa in her malice, till she seemed to me like some creature of olden time possessed by a demon within, which raved and tore. I lay hidden away in my corner, thinking deeply, with a volume pressed to my cheek.

What was Emily plotting against my sister? I began to believe her capable of any Borgia scheme and resolved to spy upon her unremittingly, and foil her where I could. How low I breathed, lest she, so near me, should catch a sound. Twilight shadows crept into the room at length, and in them she floated away, and I presently emerged from my lurking-place. How I wished I were an invisible gnome to chase her, and haunt her, and find out all her dark deeds! But I had to content myself with smearing phosphorus all over my face, and meeting her with a horrible grin in the unlighted upper hall when she came out at the ringing of the tea-bell. It did my very heart good to see the white terror in her face as she crouched back in a corner to escape me. I had appointed myself a Nemesis to punish her, but she did not know that.

I had noticed that when Emily went out alone to walk without naming her destination, she was always absent three or four hours. And the next day bringing an occasion of this kind, as soon as she was safely down the steps I went straight to her room and looked all about it. The white bed, dainty and pure, the drooping curtains, the flowers, the books, were all correct and maidenly enough, but I was a detective for the nonce, and passed them carelessly by. A small desk-table fastened my attention; I attempted to lift the lid, but in vain; it was locked. Still, the key, with a blue ribbon attached, rested in the key-hole, and I tried to turn it to unlock the desk, but it would not move,—the wards did not fit. The key evidently was not put there to help prying fingers. The next thing to do was to find the right key, and to that end I glanced curiously about. The recent reading of some of Edgar Poe's strange analytical stories sharpened my perceptions to painful keenness. I threw myself down in Emily's easy-chair, and leaned my head back in a position I had often seen her adopt. Then I narrowed my eyes and compressed my lips as she did when thoughtful, thinking that so, perhaps, my mind might momentarily take the turn of hers, and give me some insight into the mode of concealment she would be likely to practise. With my head thus thrown back, my eyes naturally fell upon the cornice above the long lace window curtains, and I distinctly saw, half hid by a projecting gilded grape-leaf, a bit of blue ribbon. Still keeping my features after Emily's fashion, the thought suggested itself to me how natural it would be to put blue ribbon on each of the two keys, that a spectator might never know that more than one was used. Full of excitement, I sprang from the chair, and taking the long gas-lighting rod which stood in the corner, I reached up and dislodged the bit of blue ribbon. As I expected, a key fell with it to the floor. With trembling fingers I tried it in the lock; it turned easily, and I lifted the lid. That way at last I discovered Emily's treachery! There on sheets of paper were words and sentences carefully written and rewritten dozens of times, in evident imitation of my sister's hand. Cleverly done too. I looked them over hastily, and found beneath copies of two letters purporting to be from Louise to Philip Rayburn. I read them in a sort of delirious glee, for now I held the clew to the whole labyrinth in my hand. But what base letters! In them Louise was made to avow her falseness to Philip, — to confess that she never really loved him, — that all had been a pretty farce to conceal her passion for another; that remorse had seized her, and a determination to be honest at length; so now these letters begged him to set her free and to keep her secret.

A shallow plot indeed, which a few straightforward words between the two would have set right at once; but Louise was proud and Philip pitiless. Emily hazarded much, and had so far won, depending on the pride and the pitilessness. Then the handwriting! It would have deceived my own parents; but I — I, the cunning dwarf — had fathomed the whole, and held the proofs in my hand. Then came the question, what to do with them? If I took them away with me, she would discover the loss at once, and take measures accordingly. Was the hour arrived for exposure? I thought not. I determined to leave the papers, trusting to that fatuous blindness which so often leads criminals to retain the damning proof of their guilt. The justice of romances suggested itself to my mind; you know the true will is always hidden somewhere undestroyed, the fatal letter always found, the deed or certificate lost for years, but not forever; and I felt sure these letters would wait for me. Was I not the servant of Nemesis? So I unlocked the desk lifted the true key with its bit of blue ribbon to its hiding-place behind the gilt grape-leaf again, and placed the false key with its bit of blue ribbon also in the lock. Then I crept away to think it all over.

In the hall I met my sweet, sad Louise, with that new look of desolateness in her face. I kissed my hand to her. She stopped instantly, and winding her dear arms about my neck said, softly, "You will always love me, won't you, Charlie?"

"Yes, I will, and every one else shall too!" I answered, stoutly, at which her smile was sadder than tears could have been, and she passed on.

You may be very sure I kept close watch of the yellow-haired Emily during the days which followed. Many a lone reverie of hers had me for spectator, peering through a key-hole or the crack of a door, or with one eye bent on her from behind a curtain. I knew her reveries meant mischief. One afternoon my vigilance had its reward. My mother asked Emily if she would get her some violet silk when she went out, and Emily answered, sweetly, "I thought I should not go out this afternoon. I have a headache; but rather than disappoint you —"

Of course my mother interrupted her with an assurance that she should not think of letting her go. A little after, I asked, just to see what she would say, "Will you buy me a little ivory skull this afternoon, Emily, if I give you the money? There's a man down an alley two streets off who carves such things."

"I'm not going out, Charlie," she answered shortly.

Under these circumstances I thought it best to be on guard in the drawing-room, so went quietly down, climbed over the back of the antique sofa, and so down into my lurking place. There, with that horrible, fascinating book, "Frankenstein," under my head, I lay dreaming and waiting. Presently the door-bell rang, and Philip came, inquiring for Emily: only Emily. I heard her quick step on the staircase, and she glided into his arms, — could it be that it was into his arms? A subtle instinct told me it was so. Philip's voice was changed from the old light tones, and there was no tenderness in it, though he called her "darling."

"Here is this package," he said, "which I wish you to return to Louise with my forgiveness. She will soon see her heartlessness has not destroyed my happiness!" and he laughed bitterly.

"Dear Philip!" murmured Emily's false, sweet voice.

"Emily, you are the only true woman I know, after all. My life shall be devoted to you."

"And you love me, Philip?" she asked, longingly.

"You know my love's not worth much; such as it is now you may have it, Emily," and his tones were reckless. "Let us have it over at once. Can you be ready to-night at eleven?"

"Yes," she answered, breathlessly.

"I will have a carriage here at that hour. When the clock strikes, you must come down to the door all ready. You will find me there, and I will carry you away at once. A pleasant surprise to Louise, to-morrow morning, to find her lover so easily consoled! She hardly knows how frequently we have met."

"Do not marry me only from pique!" said Emily, with a touch of sadness which was real, I think.

"I simply ask you, Will you marry me, Emily?" was all his answer; and Emily said "Yes," without hesitation.

I did not want to come out and denounce them then and there; I had a better plan: so Philip went at last no wiser than he came, and Emily fled to her room, full of her plots; whilst I climbed up out of my ambush, and lay down as any one else might on the sofa, thinking my own thoughts. I wanted those letters now, quick too, — how could I secure them? I could think of no opportunity till tea-time, unless fortune favored. Fortune did favor about an hour after, for a young lady in silk and velvet came to call on Miss Grey. As the servant hesitated, not having received instructions, I called out from the drawing-room, "Emily is at home; she is up in her room. I'll call her."

So the young lady swept in and took a seat. In high glee I went up to Emily's room and rapped on the door.

"Emily, there's Flora McFlimsey down in the drawing-room to see you!"

"Tell her I'm not at home, Charlie."

"O, but I can't, Emily; I have already told her you were up-stairs, and I would call you."

"Then I suppose I must go down!" she said, in a tone of vexation, and came out, carefully closing and locking her door after her. So much the better! I knew another way to reach her room, — by going through my mother's, and my mother had gone herself for her violet silk, so there was no danger of being waylaid. This plan succeeded, and I stepped boldly into the pretty chamber, where a subtle perfume of heliotrope pervaded the air. Emily had laid out all her dresses on the bed, and her trunk was open. I wondered if she would have the effrontery to send for it some time. But my business was with letters, not dresses, so I sought the little desk-table; the true key was in the lock this time, and in a moment I possessed myself of the fatal documents. How fortunate that Flora came just at that time, for it might be that Emily was about unlocking that desk to destroy the papers! My heart beat fast with excitement as I left the room again, by the same way that I entered, and hastened to my own little den, a flight above, bolting my door after me.

Then I sat down and wrote a letter to Philip Rayburn, telling him all I had heard, and all I had done, enclosing the sheets of paper as proofs. I felt very manly at last, so to vindicate my sister's truth; and it made me smile to be able to write that I expected him to apologize fully to Louise, and after that never to darken our doors again. I finished the letter, sealed it, coaxed the butler to deliver it at once into Mr. Rayburn's hands, and had ten minutes to compose myself before Emily politely attended her visitor to the door. Then she flew up to her room again.

My spirits ran so high I could hardly keep from shouting my secret aloud. I found Louise sitting lonesomely in her chamber, like "Mariana in the moated grange," and I kissed her hand again and again, telling her I would set everything right, while she looked at me half-frightened, and wholly puzzled. Then I imitated an Indian war-whoop at Emily's keyhole, and as it grew darker lay in wait for her behind an open door, and sprang out at her when at last I heard her gliding step. I liked to see her shrink and shudder. At tea she was pale and thoughtful, while my father and mother and Louise grew kinder than ever, heaping her plate with delicacies, and delighting to pet her. But I took no trouble to pass her anything but strawberry jam, which I knew she hated.

The night was clear,—there were stars in the heavens. After tea we all went into the parlor; Emily played, and sang, and chatted, with now and then a restless glance at the clock on the mantel-piece. At ten she said she would retire, and bade us all "good-night." That was the signal for a general departing, and before long I was going up stairs noisily, so that Emily might hear me and think all were out of her way at last. But no sooner had I slammed my door than I turned again, and crept down stairs quieter than any mouse, past all the sleeping-rooms, down to the drawing-room, and there I waited in the dark. I always liked to stay in the dark, imagining grotesque creatures in every corner unseen, and there I lay on the sofa very contentedly, hearing the clock tick and my heart beat.

At last I became conscious by some instinct finer than hearing, that Emily was coming down from her room. The clock chimed eleven, and I began to fear my plot would fail, for why was there no word to me from Philip? How softly Emily glided down, like some impalpable presence! She stood hesitating an instant on the lower stair, when the door-bell rang a peal which startled all the sleepers.

I ran out with a shout. Emily would have fled from me, but I caught her hand and dragged her to the door, which I opened. There stood Philip Rayburn, his eyes ablaze with fierce indignation, grasping the fatal letters in his hand. He held them up before Emily; he compelled her to recognize their meaning; then casting them at her feet with a gesture of utter scorn, he strode into the parlor, drawing me with him.

I was proud then, as I collected all my four-foot-high dignity, and called him to account. He did not notice my manner though, he was too full of wrath and grief and contrite love. I almost began to pity him at last, but remembered that would never do, so I told him that I accepted his apologies, but he must never insult us by his presence again. That moment Louise came in hurriedly, looking terrified and perplexed.

"Where is Emily, Charlie? Who rang the bell, and why is the door open? O Philip!"

"I will go and find Emily," I said. "I will leave you with Mr. Rayburn. He has a confession to make to you, Louise, and after that you will forbid him the house!"

Emily was not to be found; I hunted for her above and below, but she was gone. The hall-door still stood open. She had fled away with her guilty conscience under the keen-eyed stars. So I went back to the parlor without her; Louise and Philip were at the door.

"I will come early to-morrow," he said, smiling brightly, and Louise smiled brightly too.

"What! have you not forbidden him the house?" I exclaimed.

"No, Charlie! That I cannot do!" And with an astonishing lack of spirit she let him fold her in his arms.

I have decided to have nothing more to do with my sister's love-affairs or the family dignity. My little part is played, and now I will hide away behind the curtain with my dreams of fairies and elfs.

MARTIN FÉREOL.

A TIRED poet might sigh to rest, his bones within the little churchyard of St. Cyril. It lies alone, at some distance from the village, on the borders of a pathless common, inclining gently from the forest to the sea. All day the sea-bird wheels and screams around its rude stone Crucifix, and at night the timid rabbit sports amidst its graves and flower-beds.

At low water the listener hears nothing of the sea, beyond a distant murmur from the Gulf of Gascony; but at full tide the waves grate noisily through the bed of silex that divides the churchyard from the level sands, recalling the poet's picture of the dying tempest, when the wind lulls into reluctant peace, and the angry waves retiring,—

"With harsh concussion rake the flinty beach."

The inscriptions on the tombstones are, some of them, simple and touching, but mostly short and quaint. One of them informs the reader that the deceased, Jean Pomex, lived a smuggler and died of an œdematous leg. On reference to a dictionary of medical terms, it appears the word œdematous comes from the Greek verb oîdēai, "I swell," and signifies the being in a state of tumefaction. The village doctor states further, that an œdematous affection arises when abnormal fat collects beneath the skin in any particular part, and that if you impress the part with your finger, the hole remains just as you made it, precisely as it would in a bladder of lard. At the same time he knows of nothing in such an affection necessarily to determine dissolution, and he does not know why Jean Pomex died of it.

The same tombstone bears testimony to a fact which it was probably not designed to perpetuate, — namely, that the statuary who cut the inscription must have very nearly forgotten their Latin. Most of the tablets have the statuary's name engraved on them in a corner thus: "Messier, fecit; Pascant, fecit," &c.; but that of Jean Pomet appears to have been got up by a firm of statuary, and the word "fecit" is pluralized accordingly to meet the case; thus: "Poutis and Dindo, fecits."

But the thoughtful stranger, compelled to smile at the rustic blunder, or offended at the ill-timed humor of the funereal vagary, may flatter his pensive mood without reserve by turning to the northwest corner of the little cemetery, where, on a stone which spans a double grave, may be read the following inscription: —

"Ci-git un centenaire: —

MARTIN FÉREOL,

Naturaliste distingué, né à St. Cyrille (Landes),
Le 12 Août, 1749,

Mort en Bourgogne, au Château-la-Garenne,
Au même jour de l'année 1849;
Agé par conséquent, de cent ans juste.

Zoologiste passionné, comme fiévreux misanthrope,
Autant recherchait-il l'amitié des bêtes,
Qu'il dédaignait celle des hommes,
Oubliant que le Christ est mort pour ceux-ci.

A ses côtés on a depuis déposé
Le squelette de sa sœur Babotte;
Le reste a été mangé par les fourmis.
Elle ne l'eût pas voulu autrement."

The term "naturaliste," as used in the epitaph, expresses simply the vocation of an animal and bird-stuffer. Martin Féreol, though personally little known, was perhaps, in this sense, the most distinguished naturalist of his age. In a scientific sense, his want of education and solitary life precluded him from excellence; but he was unsurpassed in the practical knowledge of native zoology, and more than once he had had to decline the duty of arbitrament offered to him by critical and learned disputants.

From his earliest infancy the passion of his life made itself manifest. Disdaining the companionship of children, he spent his leisure hours in exclusive communion with the animals of the village; and one of the few occasions which induced him in after life to relax his taciturnity was the temptation to relate how his mother seriously feared the gift of speech had been refused to him, from the fact of his being unable, at three years old, to articulate a single word, whilst able at the same time to bark with significant and ominous correctness.

At ten years old he had mastered the local ornithology, and was employed by trappers as an adept at calling. At twelve he deceived the parish with a wren's nest of his own construction, and had earned at sixteen the reputation of an accomplished bird-stuffer.

The first half-century of his life was passed in his native village, where the conscription and the levy, joined to the military vexations of the period, and the entire loss of his savings, through an elaborate fraud, contributed to foster in his heart misanthropic tendencies, which ultimately ripened into settled hatred under the smart of an aggravated slight.

Though averse to notoriety, and though sullenly repelling the advances of friendship, he was courted by the admirers of his art, and consulted by its leading members. It was he who classed the Egyptian waders for the Museum of Prague, who restored the specimens of the Royal Cabinet at Athens, and who mounted, with Kempfen, of Maestricht, the eleven egrets of the Duke of Parma.

At the age of sixty he accepted an engagement as conservator of a private museum. The proprietor, the Baron Raoul de Lermuzeau, a man of large fortune and scientific tastes, invited him to take up his abode at the château, offering to lodge and entertain him, without deducting anything from his stipend. This generous proposition Féreol, dreading to compromise his independence, declined without thanks, preferring to reside in an isolated cottage at the extremity of the village, where he was afterwards joined by his sister Babotte, who there lived with him till the day of his death, surviving him by thirteen weeks.

His engagement at the château procured Féreol, for the rest of his life, an occupation congenial to his tastes. The museum was as extensive as the design of its proprietor, which was to render it a complete cabinet of European zoology. Commenced by the baron's father, under the auspices of Buffon himself, the collection had been enriched by successive additions, till, during an interval of confiscation, the museum had been ravaged and disorganized by wanton or sacrilegious hands.

When confided to Féreol's care, the museum was an assemblage of confusion. Scientific distinctions had been effaced by neglect and insects, dust and exposure had obliterated color, and scarcely a vestige remained of the artistic labor bestowed on the original arrangement.

Féreol entered on his work with passion, and, after restoring the few specimens not hopelessly disfigured, he presented the baron with an endless catalogue of deficiencies, the gradual supply of which was to be thenceforth the pride and labor of his life. Ten years of diligence sufficed, however, to complete his task. With unlimited means at his disposal, and in a position, through the baron's influence, to command effective co-operation, he was able, at the expiration of that period, to regard the collection as fairly representing the science of the age in respect of European zoology.

From that time forth he became the exclusive guardian of his trust, never absenting himself during the day, and never departing at night without retaining the custody of the keys. The baron treated him as a spoilt child, encouraged his eccentric genius, and humored his belief in the sovereign importance of his art. It followed that he regarded as paramount whatever concerned the museum; and when the baron, summoned suddenly to Paris to take part in the deliberations of the Royalist coalition, was about to depart in haste, Féreol reproachfully reminded him that he had forgotten to write for a duplicate skin to the ambassador of France in London.

Into all his arrangements he imported the most inexorable order. Nothing offended him more than even a momentary displacement of any article under his care. Attached to the library was a cabinet devoted to specimens of foreign ornithology, and the presence of one of these in the European gallery threw him, on one occasion, into a fit of nervous anguish, which lasted till the impropriety was removed. The baron's grandson had entered the room with a florican, which he was stuffing under Féreol's directions, and came to show what he had done and to receive advice. Féreol for a while suppressed his uneasiness, till compelled at length by the force of his displeasure, he expressed it thus to his astonished pupil: "Emportez-moi donc d'ici cet oiseau de la zone torride; nous ferons mieux la leçon chez lui." What would he have thought of the great national Museum of London, where the saurians of Egypt are deliberately exposed to view in the cabinet expressly and designedly consecrated to the productions of the British Islands!

Subject to a certain reserve, Féreol entertained a feeling of friendship for the baron and his family, including the Abbé Gassendi, the baron's chaplain, and a serving youth, by name Désiré. For all other persons, with the one exception of his sister Babotte, he evinced unmingled and inveterate aversion. Gassendi solemnly reproached him with his hatred to men, condemning his exclusive sympathy with brutes as a bestial charity maintained at the expense of Christian love. Féreol retorted that long study of nature had redressed his intellectual perception, and that, for him, the moral type was not in man. When pressed home by the uncompromising abbé, he took refuge in a sneering generality, expressed in a motto of his own devising, and engraved on the collars of his dogs: "La pire viande, c'est l'homme."

He was not the less a true man at heart; his misanthropy was negative, and it would have cost him no effort to forbear a tempting vengeance. He clung grimly to his opinions, but would not suffer himself to be dragged by prejudice beyond the limits of good faith. He scrutinized with eager spite a new proposition in natural history, but accepted it with resignation if he found it true. The burden of his life had been the necessity of giving up strict classification. He would have classified even the intermediate links; but nature revealed herself in the course of his discoveries, and he found her absolutely independent where he and his predecessors had assigned her the bondage of a system.

Gratuitous speculations offended him, and he was especially shocked with the views of certain naturalists which lead the mind to deism. He had purchased the treatise of Bolitho, and, when read, had burnt it lest it should fall into weaker hands. He knew by heart his Buffon. The grand old count was his saint and hero. Eloquence came to him with the bare mention of Buffon's name; he was now the Druid of Montbar, enshrined in yearning memories, and canonized with tears of love; he was now the true knight who entered the lists without flourish, not to do battle for the high-born lady, but to assert the rights of the oppressed ass. For Buffon's sake he pardoned man. He was, nevertheless, not blind to the errors of Buffon. He even deemed him impious in his theory of the promiscuous propagation of birds.

He had paid during his life but one visit to Paris, and the impression he retained of it was of the most dismal kind. He had gone there to feed his pride, counting on the status of his art in the great metropolis of European science. He returned abased and humiliated, fuming with resentment, and irrevocably settled in his estimate of man. What first annoyed him were the "charges," or grotesque imitations of human groups by stuffed frogs and other creatures so common in Paris shops; but these he ended by tolerating as mere trivial offences to a low taste. More painful still to his mind were the permanent lies and stuffed libels upon God's creation he saw in the windows of the capital, such as animals represented in combinations unwarranted by their kind, and associations unknown in nature. Strange-looking creatures, for example, he beheld, perverted or disguised, and presented to a staring public as "inhabitants of the moon, discovered on the coast of Normandy after a heavy storm." These, and the like, roused his professional wrath, and he forthwith wrote to the Minister of Public Instruction imploring his paternal interference to prevent the misleading of the ignorant by the publication of such impostures. The Minister's secretary replied that the publication in question, though decidedly regrettable, did not amount to a contravention of any existing law, and that there were, therefore, no grounds for official interference.

Thus repulsed, Féreol resolved, for the reputation of the cloth, to expostulate personally with the offending brotherhood. His first attempt was with a naturalist of the Rue Graffigny, who received him with politeness, but gave him to know that in Paris the honor of the profession took rank after the success of the business, and that a successful "charge" was an excellent advertisement.

In despair at this result, Féreol stationed himself outside the establishment. The object of his anger was a glass case containing the representation of a northern landscape, with rocks and icebergs, amongst which latter several small animals, ingeniously mutilated, personated tiny white bears in divers attitudes. Féreol watched with agony the admiring multitude, earnestly assuring them there were no such bears in creation, and that the animals in the glass case were ermines with their tails cut off. But, finding at length that his exposure of the fraud served only to increase their admiration, he gave up his mission in disgust, much marvelling that Sudom and Gomorrah should be destroyed by fire, and Paris be allowed to stand.

He nevertheless repaired next day to the Rue Quincampoix. Here he found represented a white owl pursued by a goshawk. Féreol affected to suppose the proprietor was himself under an erroneous impression as to the authenticity of the facts represented. He informed him apologetically that a peregrine of his own had killed a brown owl, confined with it in a root-house; but that in a state of liberty, and free to follow its instincts, neither a falcon nor a goshawk would molest an owl. The man replied he had no doubt monsieur was quite correct, but that the group, as represented, was attractive and imposing, which sufficed for the purposes of the trade. Féreol thereupon immediately left Paris, to whose deceitful bird-stuffers he ascribed the calamities of France.

The most charming images of Buffon are most often those which are the least truthful. The captivated votary refuses to be undeceived. For him the lion will be ever lofty, generous, compassionate; the buzzard mean, cruel, and sneaking. Féreol struggled for a compromise, but his friend the abbé refused to leave him the shadow of an illusion.

"Brutes, sir, differ only by their constitution, their powers, and their necessities; they are essentially alike in their unscrupulous pursuit of the expedient. Their moral qualities are determined by their incentives, and both the lion and the eagle, to advance their ends, would be as ruthless and as horrible as the rat."

Féreol assented with reluctance to this disenchanting doctrine. Were all brutes to be thus levelled to the standard of man? Might he not claim speak. Part of this power we may recognize as due to the subtle and deep admixture of moral emotion and of human sentiment with the mysterious motion and passion of nature. Thus, in "Les Travailleurs de la Mer," the wind and the sea gain strength and depth from the human figure set to fight them: from the depth and strength of the incarnate spirit so doing and suffering. Thus in this book there is a new sense and a new sublimity added to the tempest by the remorse of men sinking at once under sin and storm, drowned under a double weight of deeds and waves.

Not even in that other book is the supreme mastery of nature, the lordship of the forces of things, more admirable and wonderful than throughout the first part of this. He who could think to describe might think to rival it. But of one point I cannot but take note; there is nothing, even at the height of tragic horror, repellent, ugly, hateful. It has been said there is, and will be said again; for how should there not be distorted eyes and envious tongues in the world? Indeed a pieuvre is no pleasant playfellow; the "tree of man's making" bears a fearful fruit; the monstrous maidenhood of Josiane is no sister to the starry virginity of Dea; but how has the great poet handled these things? The mutilation of a child's face is a thing unbearable for thought to rest on; but have we not seen first the face of a heroic soul? Far elsewhere than in the work of our sovereign poet must we look for the horror which art will have none of, which nature flings back with loathing in the bringer's face. If not, we of this time who love and serve his art should indeed be in a bad case. But upon this matter we cannot permit the blind and nameless leaders of the nameless blind to decide for us. Let the serious and candid student look again for himself and see. That "fight of the dead with the dark," that swinging of carrion-birds with the swing of the gibbeted carrion, might have been so done into words as to begot in us mere loathing; but how is it done here? The mighty manner of Victor Hugo has given to this ghastly matter something even of a horrible charm, a shocking splendor of effect. The rhythmic horror of the thing penetrates us not with loathing, but with a tragic awe and terror as at a real piece of the wind's work, an actual caprice of the night's, a portion of the tempest of things. So it is always; handle what he may, the touch of a great poet will leave upon it a spell to consume and transmute whatever a weaker touch would leave in it of repulsion.

Whether or not we are now speaking of a great poet, of a name imperishable, is not a question which can be gravely deliberated. I have only to record my own poor conviction, based on some study and comparison of the men, that precisely as we now think of those judges who put Fletcher above Shakespeare, Cowley above Milton, the paid poets of Richelieu beside Corneille, and I know not whom beside Molière, will the future think of those judges who would place any poet of his age by the side of Victor Hugo. Nor has his age proved poor — it has rather been singularly rich — in men and in poets really and greatly admirable. But even had another done as well once and again as the master himself, who has done so well as much? Had he done but half, had he done but a tenth of his actual work, his supremacy, being less incontestable, would no doubt have been less contested. A parsimonious poet calculates well for his own time. Had Victor Hugo granted us but one great play, — say "Marion de Lorme," — but one great lyric work, — say "Les Contemplations," — but one great tragic story, — say any one you please, — the temptation to decry and denounce him by comparison would have been less; for with the tribe of Barkilphedro the strength of this temptation grows with the growth of the benefit conferred. And very potent is that tribe in the world of men and of letters.

As for me, I am not careful to praise or dispraise by comparison at all. I am not curious to inquire what of apparent or of actual truth there may be in any charge brought against the doer of the greatest things done, the giver of the greatest gifts given among men in our time. Goethe found his way of work mechanical and theatrical; Milton also lived to make oblique recantation of his early praise of Shakespeare; we may, and should, wish this otherwise: yet none the less are they all great men. It may be there is perceptible in Victor Hugo something too much of positive intention, of prepossession, application, of composition and forethought: what if there were? One question stands forth first and last; is the work done good work and great, or not? A lesser question is this; these that we find to be faults, are they qualities separable from the man's nature? could we have his work without them? If not, and if his work be great, what will it profit us to blame them or to regret? First, at all events, let us have the sense to enjoy it and the grace to give thanks. What, for example, if there be in this book we have spoken of errors of language, errors historical or social? Has it not throughout a mighty hold upon men and things, the godlike strength of grasp which only a great man can have of them? And for quiet power of hand, for scornful sureness of satiric truth, what can exceed his study of the queen of England (Anne)? Has it not been steeped in the tears and the fire of live emotion? If the style be overcharged and overshadowing with bright sharp strokes and points, these are no fireworks of any mechanic's fashion: these are the phosphoric flashes of the sea-fire moving on the depth of the limitless and living sea. Enough, that the book is great and heroic, tender and strong; full from end to end of divine and passionate love, of holy and ardent pity for men that suffer wrong at the hands of men; full, not less, of lyric loveliness and lyric force; and I for one am content to be simply glad and grateful: content in that simplicity of spirit to accept it as one more benefit at the hands of the supreme singer now living among us the beautiful and lofty life of one loving the race of men he serves, and of them in all time to be beloved.

BEHIND A SOFA.

I LIKE to creep away into corners and hide myself with the fold of a curtain, or half-open door, or behind one of the great painted fire-screens, or in the shadow of the tallest furniture. There I have odd little fancies all to myself, and wish things and dreams things which nobody knows anything about. For I am different from all the rest; my parents are tall and handsome, and Louise is the prettiest girl I ever saw. Then my brother Harry, who was killed in the Indian Mutiny, was like a prince in a fairy story, so brave and beautiful. But I! I am small and feeble. I cannot run or wrestle, and there is something growing on my shoulders which keeps me from standing straight, and they call me deformed. I shall never grow any more; strangers think me nine or ten years old, but when

I count the years from the date in the family Bible, I find I am sixteen. People always speak kindly to me, with a great pity in their eyes, and once in a while I pity myself, but not often. I like to be this queer little figure. Louise is like the lovely ladies in legends and ballads, and I am like the imps and dwarfs; when I read about them I look at myself in the mirror, and make grimaces, and whirl over on one hand and then on the other, till Louise looks distressed and begs me to stop. Being what I am, of course I don't often go anywhere, except in summer when we leave town; and nobody makes me do anything; so I roam all over the house, and read, and lie with my eyes shut for day-dreams, and am merry and happy almost all the time. I wish I were only six inches high, what fun I would have in the world! Then when we are in the country, I could ride on the birds' backs, and down in the woods I could sit astride of the great lush toad-stools, and drink from acorn-cups, — or by the sea-shore, I fancy I could launch a nautilus and sail away like any grim little sprite. However, to be four feet high has its advantages.

When Harry was wounded, and lay in the hospital, knowing he must die, he wrote a long letter to my father and mother, full of grief, and comfort, too; and then he told them a thing which surprised them greatly. How he was engaged to marry a girl in a town in which they had been quartered. How sweet and lovely she was, and how desolate she would be now: and he wanted them to send for her, and to love her like a daughter. I clapped my hands at that. I like to have people do things to interest me; and the idea of poor Harry having fallen in love! For I know very well what love is: I have read the "Faery Queen" all through, and a great many romances. And some time ago I began a sly watch over Louise, on account of a certain Philip Rayburn coming to the house very often.

But about Harry's lady-love. My mother does not like strangers very well, but being for Harry's sake made a difference, and my father urged the plan. As for Louise, it seemed as if she could not be eager enough for the coming of this Miss Emily Grey, she was so determined to cherish and love her. For my part, as home is all the real world there is for me, I like to have as many characters in it as possible. So when we heard that Emily Grey was coming to England, we invited her to stay with us.

She would not come at once. She was timid, it seemed; or perhaps, Harry being dead, she would rather avoid his household. But Louise pleaded for her, and wrote her a great many loving letters, and at last Emily came.

Emily came. That first evening when they brought her into the parlor, I was lying under the table with my head on a hassock, thinking about the Old Man of the Sea in the Arabian Nights, and wishing I had been one of the genii of those days. But when Emily entered, I forgot everything else, and peered out from under the table-cover at her. What a dainty little lady she was! so pale and slight, she made me think of frail, fluttering, yellow butterflies; partly, I suppose, because of her yellow curls, which fell all over her shoulders when Louise took away her hat and shawl. Her eyes were wide and pale and blue, her cheeks were colorless, and she had a frightened, deprecating way of looking up, even after my stately mamma had embraced her. But Louise kept about her, and cheered her, and talked to her, till she began to look brighter. Louise was so different, such a darling "nut-brown mayde," with honest, dark eyes and rosy cheeks, and lips always ready to smile. Louise is my beauty.

My father and mother went out after a while, and Louise still talked to her guest, while I lay very contentedly on the floor, all curled up just where I could see all that passed without turning my head. Louise went to an étagère at the other end of the room to get a little picture of Harry, and I idly kept watch of Emily. That moment she interested me; her wide, pale eyes narrowed and grew intense, she cast a quick, furtive glance after Louise, and around the room, curving her little white neck, and a strange, bright smile flitted over her lips. I thought instantly of Coleridge's Geraldine with the evil eye, and just for fun I lifted the table-cover and put my head and shoulders out so that she could see me. I am afraid I grinned at her. She shrieked and flung her hands before her face. Louise came running back, and asked what had frightened her.

"Oh!" she whispered, "such a dreadful face peered at me from under the table! There it is again!" And she shuddered.

"Charles!" exclaimed Louise, looking around, "come out, you naughty boy, and speak to Miss Grey. It's only my brother Charlie, our pet. He is full of freaks. One never knows where he is.

Emily Grey looked at me like the saddest and sweetest little creature that ever lived, as I went up to her, and she reached out her small white hand to me, and said, in a low, musical voice, "So this is dear Charlie. I have heard of him. We will be friends, won't we?"

"Will you tell me stories?" I asked. She laughed merrily.

"Yes, heaps of them, child."

"Did you love Harry?" I asked again.

She shivered at that, and looked imploringly at Louise.

"Charlie, you are unkind," said Louise, reproachfully.

"Well, then, I won't ask her if she loved Harry. I'll go off and read my book of hobgoblins."

"O no! don't be vexed, Charlie," said Emily, with great sweetness. "Stay by me, and I will tell you a story." So I stopped, and she told me a senseless story of two girls who went to school. When I saw it was n't going to amount to anything, I started to leave her.

"I don't like that," I said. "I like witch stories."

"Ah!" she replied, smiling, "perhaps this will be better." And then she told me a story of an old witch who had a throne down in the slime of the sea, with a string of bones around her neck, and a toad perched on each shoulder. And this witch bought souls, and gave people power over hearts in exchange.

"That was a good story!" I said at the end.

"And now, dear Charlie, go to bed," Louise directed. So I kissed my pretty sister's hand and glided off.

Emily very soon learned to be perfectly at home with us. She seemed to wind herself about the hearts of my father and mother, and as for Louise, — Louise would have walked over burning ploughshares to do her service. I liked her about half the time, and the other half I felt like teasing her. She would grow so white and terrified when I sprang out at her from behind curtains or doors. More

Tame owls have nevertheless been known to take bats without any symptoms of aversion.

Désiré's veneration for Martin was tempered with a kind of awe. His regard for the aged Babotte was a feeling of unmingled love. Babotte was no less a character than her brother Martin, but of an originality quite distinct from his. What in him was acrimonious bile, in her was indiscriminating goodness, and her sole wrong to man was an uncompromising preference for brutes. Her intellectual faculties were of the lowest grade, and the reputation of her childhood had been that of a hopeless idiot. She was unable to read or write, and had never learnt to tell the clock. But she needed neither books nor time-piece. She knew the hours from the dial that needs no repairing, and she read from the statute-book of Nature, in no ambiguous characters, that order, thrift, and cleanliness are God's first law. She lived in uninterrupted conversation with the dumb beings around her, and possessed means of intelligence which were secrets between herself and her correspondents. She could ascertain from the cat what ailed her kitten, and understood an application from the cow for change of pasture. Her parallel has been imagined by Victor Hugo in his romance of "Conscience l'Innocent." The legion tongues of nature, whether expressed in cries, in squeaks, or croaks, were as familiar to her as the voice of her own brother. The birds and frogs gave her warning of the approach of rain and sunshine, and she prepared for change with all the certainty of unerring instinct. She lived amongst the dumb natives of the field, unfear'd and unavoids. No bird suspected her of wrong, no reptile fled at her approach. In the meadow, the magpie refused to move out of her path; on the plain, the skylark flew to its nest before her eyes; and in the wood, the squirrel remained in sight upon the tree which sheltered her. With Hugo's Innocent she had brought home clustered bees from forest hives; and with Legouvé's Mélicerte had nursed and cured a dying duckling, which had been seized and partly devoured by a hog.

Had Babotte been free and friendless, she might well have smiled on society and passed her way.

Her home was ready found in some secluded wood, her food the roots and berries, and her companions the birds and beasts. But Martin, her sole relative and guardian by law, had charge of her person and estate. She had for some time pined under restraint, but had, taken strength from habit, and was for many years her brother's only house-keeper. She ordered his cottage with superstitious minuteness, deferred to him with conviction, and revered his profession with a religious awe. Her aversion to flesh was invincible, and her brother's taste was so little carnivorous that he abstained habitually. Babotte's resources provided ample compensation. Her larder was the open field, and the forest her kitchen-garden. She had wild salads for all seasons, and fragrant herbs in endless and refreshing variety. Martin took all his sister presented him, relying on her instinct with blind faith. Désiré affirms he would have eaten a furze-bush, if Babotte had set it before him.

Martin's affection for his sister was profound, but contained in it a leaven of grimness. He accepted her submissiveness as his due, and notwithstanding her rare talent as a herbalist, he conceived himself removed above her by a gulf of intellectual distance. He nevertheless admitted the reality of her mysterious sympathy with birds and animals, and he held her unrivalled in the preparation of coffee.

He had had with her but one serious quarrel during the course of their companionship, and that one was on the subject of spiders. Babotte objected to disturb the spiders after they had once spun their webs and become fairly domiciled in the apartment. She argued they were not like foul parasites that attack your substance or annoy your person, and that to remove them without motive was a selfish abuse of power. To the plea of cleanliness she replied that the spiders themselves were not inherently dirty, and that she kept the webs clean by dusting them with the parlor bellows. Refuted by Martin, she submitted her defence to the abbé, who treated it as a perverse whim, and the spiders were condemned accordingly.

It was not that Martin at all shared the repugnance shown in general to those most repulsive insects. Spiders made no exception to the universality of his taste for animals, and his apology for their life and usefulness was a point of standing issue between himself and the Abbé Gassendi. The abbé admitted much, but confessed he could imagine a Paradise complete without spiders. It was true, he said, they had their merits like all created beings. Though it was quite false that they exhaled noxious vapors, it was certain they destroyed great quantities of flies in places where birds had no access. They were invaluable in sultry summers when flies greatly plagued the poor, infecting their dwellings, spoiling their food, and buzzing them out of their senses. He recognized further in spiders three distinct qualities, — two positive and one negative; they were diligent and patient, and not bloodthirsty. They killed for hunger, but did not massacre for rage, like stoats and martens. It might be said the spiders were less destructive than their webs, which were often filled with flies untouched; and these webs supplied the swallows when insects in the air were scarce. Sometimes, also, the fly struggled through the net, and, falling to the ground, became food for beetles; for nothing is lost in nature's careful system.

Still, it was difficult to be human and not detest the spider. He passed by common consent as the emblem of a cruel fatality. Poets used him as the extreme term of an odious contrast, and the most impartial writers said unpleasant things of him. Voltaire assigned him the standing epithet of execrable. The English poet, Thomson, described him as a villain, and Boileau denounced him as the assassin with six legs. Solomon, it was true, refers to him advantageously; but this is apparently by way of apology for his being found in king's palaces, which Solomon does not pretend are any the better for his presence. It was true also that entomologists wrote of spiders with great complacency, but with them the eulogy was professional, and passed for nothing; there were also men who wrote complacently on virulent pustules, or described with rapture a well-developed pimple on the nose. In fact, no doctrine was too untenable for desperate or eccentric apologists.

Babotte's latest wish was to be eaten by ants, and she had secretly enjoined Désiré to convey her corpse immediately after her death into the forest, and lay it between two ant-hills in a particular spot. Martin had at this time lost all consciousness, and was being gradually extinguished by extreme old age. He died in his hundredth year, and was buried in his native village, conformably to a wish to that effect he had expressed some years before to the baron's family. Babotte, though twenty years younger, survived him only by a few weeks. On the day following that on which she died her body was nowhere to be found. An inquiry was forthwith instituted to unravel the mystery, but the commission, after a searching quest, was compelled to separate without result. Some weeks afterwards, the skeleton was discovered in the forest, perfectly white and dry, every particle of the flesh having been cleanly extracted by the ants. Désiré had meanwhile confessed his pious outrage, but the matter was hushed up through the baron's influence.

The remains of Babotte were afterwards interred with those of her brother in the little churchyard of St. Cyril, where the legend on the tombstone describes in comprehensive terms her singular but characteristic destiny.

A STORY OF THE MOSCOW RAILWAY.

I WAS at Moscow in the winter of 186-, and had exhausted the programme of "sights" which every true believer in the British system of travelling is bound to go through. I had traversed the glittering halls of the Imperial Palace, and made the circuit of the red turret-crowned wall which girdles the Kremlin; I had looked down upon the frozen Moskva from the summit of the Iván Veliki tower, and marvelled at the fantastic coloring of the pineapple-shaped church of Vassili the Blessed. I had stood within the voiceless lips of the Mammoth Bell, and peered into the muzzle of the Monster Cannon. I had bought photographs in the Kouznetski Most, and sipped tea in the Troitski Trakteer, and I was now awaiting the arrival of a friend from St. Petersburg, in whose company I proposed extending my travels eastward as far as Nijni.

An eminent authority has said, "In travelling through a romantic country, select a practical companion; in a flat country, select a romantic one." Strictly speaking, the scenery of Central Russia can hardly be called romantic, the best way to form an idea of it being to multiply a billiard board by five millions, and subtract the cushions; but my proposed companion was one who would have neutralized the effect of a tropical sunset or a moonlight view from Mount Olivet. A more thoroughly practical man than Fred Allfact never breathed; and I would confidently have prescribed him as a corrective to an imagination as luxuriant as that of Victor Hugo or the author of "Phantastes." No play of fancy had a moment's chance with that remorseless Manchester intellect, and we had a joke against him on that score at Rugby which is hardly forgotten yet. One of the inmates of our dormitory was telling a story (horresco referens) of a phantom ship, the crew whereof had perished in mutual conflict, and were thenceforth doomed to remain lifeless on the deck during the day, while at midnight they acted again the butchery which had been the closing scene of their mortal career. Just at this moment, while the indrawn breath of the audience testified their emotion, Fred's slow, sententious tones were heard: "Well, I really don't see why the poor fellows might n't have gone and amused themselves during the day, and then come back in time for the fight in the evening!"

I had got a good breakfast ready for Fred, for the practical man has a practical appetite, likely to be doubled after such a journey. To go from St. Petersburg to Moscow in winter is no light matter; in the first class you are stewed alive; in the second you are frozen to death; and in both smothered with smoke by your fellow-passengers; and although in point of speed a great advance has recently been made (the time of transit being reduced from twenty hours to nineteen and a half), yet this, under such circumstances, is quite long enough. Ten A. M. being the usual hour of arrival, I had a plentiful repast on the table by 10.30, concluding that (as the train stops only nine times for refreshment), my friend would probably stand in need of it. The half-hour struck, and he did not appear. I went to the window, in the hope of speedily beholding a sledge come jolting into the snow-heaped courtyard, bearing Fred and all his fortunes, but nothing was to be seen. The three-quarters struck; then the hour, — and I was beginning to feel surprised, for these creeping trains are usually punctual, — when the long-expected guest made his appearance. But instead of bursting into the room with a loud laugh and a boisterous greeting, according to custom, he entered with the uncertain step of a sleep-walker, and without uttering a sound. It needed but one glance at his face to tell me that something extraordinary must have befallen him. The jovial, rubicund visage was now deadly pale; the firm lips quivered convulsively; the clear bright eye was dilated with horror. Few men who had seen Fred Allfact on the brink of an Alpine precipice, or in the midst of an Atlantic hurricane, would have recognized him now.

"What on earth's the matter with you, man?" asked I. "Why, you look as if you had seen a ghost."

"I've seen worse," replied he, in a tremulous voice. "Good Heavens! I've often heard of such things, but I never believed in them before. By Jove! it's too horrible!"

"What is it? what's it all about?"

"Give me some breakfast, and then I'll tell you. Perhaps I'll be able to eat now. I have n't touched a morsel all the way."

"What, not for twenty hours? You ought to be hungry, then. Well, eat first, and talk afterwards."

He made the attempt, but it was a miserable pretence. To me, who remembered his breakfast before ascending Mont Blanc, and his supper after swimming across the Vistula, there was something portentous in this sudden loss of appetite; and I eagerly awaited the recital of his adventures, which he commenced as follows:—

"We left Petersburg at the usual time yesterday, and I, wishing to make myself comfortable (for it was desperately cold), got into a first-class compartment, where I found an officer, a lady, and a man who might have been anything, for his fur collar and cap hid his face completely. The train was just going to start, and that was perhaps the reason why no more people got in; though, indeed, there would not have been much room for them anyhow, for each of us had a good deal of baggage, except, to be sure, the wrapped-up man, who seemed to have nothing with him but a large bundle. Well, off went the train, and for the first fifteen or twenty versts I was as silent as poor Albert Smith used to say the English always are in foreign society; but by and by I got to exchanging a few words with the officer, and presently the lady, who was with him, joined in. They spoke in French, at which I'm pretty fluent, as you know" (Fred could never "be bothered" to learn Russian), "so in a little time we rattled away famously, and by the time we got to Luban, where the first twenty minutes' halt is made, we were all as thick as thieves. Here my two friends got out to take a snack, but I, having made a big dinner just before leaving, did n't think it worth while eating again so soon, and just strolled up and down the platform, till, noticing that the muffled man did n't get out, I went to see what he was doing.

"All the time we had been talking this man never said a word, but sat in his corner like a wax figure; and when I looked in and saw him still sitting there motionless with his bundle beside him, it reminded me somehow of a picture I saw long ago where a murderer was sitting watching beside the body of his victim."

"What!" cried L. "Fred Allfact turning imaginative! Wonders will never cease."

"Ah, it's all very well for you to chaff," retorted Fred, rather acrimoniously; "you think that because a fellow knows how to take care of himself he's got no more imagination than a codfish, but I've got as much as you, anyhow."

"My dear fellow," replied I, "I'll concede you the imagination of Shakespeare if you like; only go on with your story, for I'm rather anxious to hear the dénouement."

"Perhaps you won't like it so much when you do hear it," said Fred, gloomily; "but to continue. The man looked up in a quick, suspicious way as I got in, exposing a part of his face for the first time. He was so coarsely dressed that I wondered how he came to travel first-class at all; but in that moment I caught a glimpse of a face which never belonged to one of the bourgeoisie since the world began."

"Miracle upon miracle!" exclaimed L. "Can this be Fred Allfact, whose favorite maxim used to be that one man is as good as another?"

"Ah, you may laugh," responded my friend; "but wait till I get to the end of my story, and then laugh if you can. Well, presently the officer and the lady got in again, and we resumed our conversation. I don't know how it was, but somehow our talk turned upon murders, and one horrible story succeeded another, till at last I got quite sick of it, and said, rather excitedly, 'There is one thing to comfort one over all these horrors, — that the villains who cause them are certain to be found out and punished.'

"I had scarcely uttered the words when a low, chuckling laugh came from under the wrappings of the unknown, which made me start as if I had been stung. There was something in the sound so positively infernal that I really felt as if it had been the devil himself. But before I could speak, the stranger joined in the conversation for the first time.

"'Montieur is of opinion, then,' said he, in the most perfect French, 'that it is impossible to commit a murder without being detected?'

"'Just so,' replied I, rather curtly, for there was a latent sarcasm in his tone which made me think he was laughing at me, though I could not tell how nor why.

"'Then I fear I must take the liberty of differing from Monsieur on that point,' returned he, in a smooth, slippery kind-of voice, that gave me the same feeling one has in looking at a snake. 'I have known many cases where all investigation proved fruitless, and where the murderer is probably at large still.'

"'Were these cases of which you speak in Russia?' asked I.

"'In Russia and elsewhere,' he rejoined. 'But it strikes me that even in England murderers are not always brought to justice. I have some remembrance of a story called the "Waterloo Bridge Murder," which seemed to end in nothing. Messieurs de la Police are very clever, but they are not omniscient.'

"'They're cleverer than people think them, perhaps,' said I, rather sharply, for I already felt an unaccountable aversion to the man, although I had hardly spoken with him for two minutes.

"'Perhaps!' he returned, with a slight sneer; 'but for all that I would not mind laying a wager that you might sit opposite to a murderer, and talk with him — ay, just after the deed was done — without finding him out.'

"He pronounced the last words in a tone almost of triumph, which made me tingle from head to foot. Had I followed my impulse at that moment, I should have collared him and cried out, Seize this man! he's a murderer.

"And you'd have been right, I suppose," interrupted I, beginning to feel interested.

"You'll find out about that later on," returned Fred, who never likes to be hurried in a story. "I saw that my two companions had their suspicions of him likewise, and no wonder; for to hear a man dressed like a porter talking pure French, and expressing himself as this fellow had done, was enough to set any one a-thinking. Whether they had an idea of anything wrong, or merely took him for some young swell out on a frolic, I can't say; but just as I was going to hint my suspicions to them, the train stopped at Volkhoff, and my two friends got out to eat as before. Directly they were gone the stranger got out too, saying to me, very politely, 'Will you kindly see that no one takes my place while I get some dinner?' Of course I agreed, and away he went. You'd hardly believe that even I, unimaginative as you call me, felt a sort of horror at being left alone there, just as if some evil presence were with me in the carriage; though (excepting our baggage and the stranger's bundle) there was nothing there but myself. And the feeling gained so upon me that at last I got out and stood by the door.

"My two companions were soon back again, but when the train started the stranger was still missing. I noticed this to the officer, who replied that he had probably got into another carriage by mistake, and that we should see him at the next station. However, he did n't appear, and as station after station passed without any sign of him, we at last called the guard (I forget what station it was) and told him the whole story. The guard laughed and said something in Russ, and then got out; when the officer turned to me and said, 'He tells me that this man is probably a rogue who has left his package on purpose, intending by and by to claim some one else's luggage instead of his own; and so, to make all safe, he means to open the bundle at once, and we are to go with him and see it done.' So we all went into the guard-room, and the man undid the bundle, which seemed to contain nothing but a fine velvet cloak tightly rolled up. He unrolled it, and instantly jumped back with a loud 'Ach!' as if he had trodden upon a serpent; and no wonder, for when I stepped forward to look, what should I see but a woman's head!"

"A woman's head!" echoed I, incredulously.

"Pooh! it must have been a wax model, or the head of a lay figure."

"Not a bit; it was a real head, if ever I saw one, and not very long cut off, either. The face was the most beautiful I ever saw, looking quite like ivory upon the black velvet, and not the least distorted; she must have been killed sleeping. There was a jewelled tiara in the hair, as if for a ball; but the strangest thing was a small piece of paper fixed on the forehead, inscribed, 'The jewels for Moscow; the head for St. Petersburg.'"

"What did that mean?" asked I.

"I can't imagine; but the man who wrote it was most likely half mad at the time. Well, you may fancy what a to-do there was; the news soon got abroad, and a whole crowd came flocking in, and we had to tell all we knew, and to leave our addresses, in case our evidence should be required. Altogether it was nearly an hour before we got off, and that's why I arrived so late. What do you think of that now?"

"It's a frightful story, certainly," said I; "but there must be some explanation shortly. The murder must have been done in St. Petersburg, and will soon be known there. Let us see what to-day's paper says when it arrives. It ought to be in to-morrow."

The next day Fred pounced upon the first attainable copy of the Petersburg news, and hastily casting his eye over it, exclaimed, suddenly, "This must be it. Listen!

"Shocking and Mysterious Occurrence.—The whole capital has just been thrown into consternation by one of those atrocious murders which from time to time seem to recall the crimes of the Dark Ages. The victim, as all will grieve to learn, is the well-known and charming Princess Hedzoff.*

"It appears that yesterday morning the Princess's maid, on taking a cup of chocolate to her mistress (who had graced a ball with her presence the evening before), was horrified to find the latter stretched lifeless on the floor bathed in blood. Frightful to relate, the head had been completely severed from the body, and was nowhere to be found. . . . We regret to add that there is reason to fear that this appalling bereavement has driven to self-destruction the unfortunate Prince, her husband, who has not been heard of since the night of the murder."

"Very neatly smoothed over, that last bit," remarked Fred, significantly. "But it's not to self-destruction that he's been driven, anyhow. Well! who would believe this, I wonder, if they were to see it in a book?"

"L'impossible est toujours vrai, you know," observed I. "It seems there are white Othellos as well as black. Well done the nineteenth century! Let us go and get a mouthful of fresh air."

And out we went accordingly.

THE TWO BREATHS.

A LECTURE TO LADIES.

BY CHARLES KINGSLEY.

I HAVE been honored by a second invitation to address you here, from the lady to whose public spirit the establishment of these lectures is due. I dare not refuse it, because it gives me an opportunity of speaking on a matter, knowledge and ignorance about which may seriously affect your health and happiness, and that of the children with whom you may have to do. I must apologize if I say many things which are well known to many persons in this room: they ought to be well known to all; and it is generally best to assume total ignorance in one's hearers, and to begin from the beginning.

I shall try to be as simple as possible; to trouble you as little as possible with scientific terms; to be practical; and at the same time, if possible, interesting.

I should wish to call this lecture "The Two Breaths"—not merely "The Breath," and for this reason: Every time you breathe, you breathe two different breaths; you take in one, you give out another. The composition of those two breaths is different. Their effects are different. The breath which has been breathed out must not be breathed in again. To tell you why it must not would lead me into anatomical details, not quite in place here as yet: though the day will come, I trust, when every woman intrusted with the care of children, will be expected to know something about them. But this I may say: Those who habitually take in fresh breath, will probably grow up large, strong, ruddy, cheerful, active, clear-headed, fit for their work. Those who habitually take in the breath which has been breathed out by themselves, or any other living creature, will certainly grow up, if they grow up at all, small, weak, pale, nervous, depressed, unfit for work, and tempted continually to resort to stimulants, and become drunkards. If you want to see how different the breath breathed out is from the breath taken in, you have only to try a somewhat cruel experiment, but one which people too often try upon themselves, their children, and their work-people.

If you take any small animal with lungs like your own,—a mouse, for instance,—and force it to breathe no air but what you have breathed already; if you put it in a close box, and while you take in breath from the outer air, send out your breath, through a tube, into that box, the animal will soon faint; if you go on long with this process, it will die.

Take a second instance, which I beg to press most seriously on the notice of mothers, governesses, and nurses: If you allow a child to get into the habit of sleeping with its head under the bed-clothes, and thereby breathing its own breath over and over again, that child will assuredly grow pale, weak, and ill. Medical men have cases on record of scrofula appearing in children previously healthy, which could only be accounted for from this habit, and which ceased when the habit stopped. Let me again entreat your attention to this undoubted fact.

Take another instance, which is only too common: If you are in a crowded room, with plenty of fire and lights and company, doors and windows all shut tight, how often you feel faint,—so faint, that you may require smelling-salts or some other stimulant. The cause of your faintness is just the same as that of the mouse's fainting in the box: you and your friends, and, as I shall show you presently, the fire and the candles likewise, having been all breathing each other's breaths, over and over again, till the air has become unfit to support life. You are doing your best to enact over again the Highland tragedy, of which Sir James Simpson tells in his lectures to the working-classes of Edinburgh, when at a Christmas meeting, thirty-six persons danced all night in a small room with a low ceiling, keeping the doors and windows shut. The atmosphere of the room was noxious beyond description; and the effect was, that seven of the party were soon after seized with typhus fever, of which two died. You are inflicting on yourselves the torments of the poor dog, who is kept at the Grotto del Cane, near Naples, — to be stupefied, for the amusement of visitors, by the carbonic acid gas of the Grotto, and brought to life again by being dragged into the fresh air: nay, you are inflicting upon yourselves the torments of the famous Black Hole of Calcutta; and, if there was no chimney in the room, by which some fresh air could enter, the candles would soon burn blue (as they do, you know, when ghosts appear), your brains become disturbed, and you yourselves run the risk of becoming ghosts, and the candles of actually going out.

Of this last fact there is no doubt; for if, instead of putting a mouse into the box, you will put a lighted candle, and breathe into the tube as before, however gently, you will in a short time put the candle out.

Now, how is this? First, what is the difference between the breath you take in, and the breath you give out? And next, why has it a similar effect on animal life and a lighted candle?

The difference is this. The breath which you take in is, or ought to be, pure air, composed, on the whole, of oxygen and nitrogen, with a minute portion of carbonic acid.

The breath which you give out is an impure air, to which has been added, among other matters which will not support life, an excess of carbonic acid.

That this is the fact you can prove for yourselves by a simple experiment. Get a little lime-water at the chemist's, and breathe into it through a glass tube; your breath will at once make the lime-water milky. The carbonic acid of your breath has laid hold of the lime and made it visible as white carbonate of lime, — in plain English, as common chalk.

Now I do not wish, as I said, to load your memories with scientific terms: but I beseech you to remember at least these two — oxygen gas and carbonic acid gas; and to remember that as surely as oxygen feeds the fire of life, so surely does carbonic acid put it out.

I say "the fire of life." In that expression lies the answer to our second question: Why does our breath produce a similar effect upon the mouse and the lighted candle? Every one of us is, as it were, a living fire. Were we not, how could we be always warmer than the air outside us? There is a process going on perpetually in each of us, similar to that by which coals are burnt in the fire, oil in a lamp, wax in a candle, and the earth itself in a volcano. To keep each of those fires alight oxygen is needed; and the products of combustion, as they are called, are more or less the same in each case, — carbonic acid and steam.

These facts justify the expression I just made use of (and which may have seemed to some of you fantastical), that the fire and the candles in the crowded room were breathing the same breath as you were. It is but too true. An average fire in the grate requires, I believe, to keep it burning as much oxygen as three human beings do; each candle or lamp must have its share of oxygen likewise, and that a very considerable one; and an average gas-burner — pray attend to this, you who live in rooms lighted with gas — consumes as much oxygen as six candles or eleven men. All alike are making carbonic acid. The carbonic acid of the fire happily escapes up the chimney in the smoke; but the carbonic acid from the human beings and the candles remains to poison the room, unless it be ventilated.

Now, I think you may understand one of the simplest, and yet most terrible, cases of want of ventilation, — death by the fumes of charcoal. A human being shut up in a room, of which every crack is closed, with a pan of burning charcoal, falls asleep, never to wake again. His inward fire is competing with the fire of the charcoal for the oxygen of the room; both are making carbonic acid out of it; but the charcoal, being the stronger of the two, gets all the oxygen to itself, and leaves the human being nothing to inhale but the carbonic acid which it has made. The human being, being the weaker, dies first; but the charcoal dies also. When it has exhausted all the oxygen of the room it cools, goes out, and is found in the morning half consumed beside its victim. If you put a giant or an elephant, I should conceive, into that room, instead of a human being, the case would be reversed for a time; the elephant would put out the burning charcoal by the carbonic acid from its mighty lungs; and then, when it had exhausted all the air in the room, die likewise of its own carbonic acid.

Now, too, I think we may see what ventilation means, and why it is needed.

Ventilation means simply letting out the foul air, and letting in the fresh air: letting out the air which has been breathed by men or by candles, letting in the air which has not. And, to understand how to do that, we must remember a most simple chemical law, that a gas, as it is warmed, expands, and therefore becomes lighter; as it cools, it contracts, and becomes heavier.

Now the carbonic acid in the breath which comes out of our mouths is warm, lighter than the air, and rises to the ceiling; and therefore in any unventilated room full of people, there is a layer of foul air along the ceiling. You might soon test that for yourselves, if you could mount a ladder and put your heads there aloft. You do test it for yourselves when you sit in the galleries of churches and theatres, where the air is provably more foul, and therefore more injurious than down below.

Where, again, work-people are employed in a crowded house of many stories the health of those who work on the upper floors always suffers most.

In the old monkey-house at the Zoölogical Gardens, when the cages were on the old plan, tier upon tier, the poor little fellows in the uppermost tier (so I have been told), always died first of the monkey's constitutional complaint, consumption, simply from breathing the warm breath of their friends below. But since the cages have been altered, and made to range side by side from top to bottom, consumption (I understand) has vastly diminished among them.

The first question in ventilation, therefore, is to get this carbonic acid safe out of the room, while it is warm and light, and close to the ceiling; for if you do not this happens. The carbonic acid gas cools and becomes heavier; for carbonic acid gas, at the same temperature as common air, is so much heavier than common air that you may actually

(if you are handy enough) turn it from one vessel to another, and pour out for your enemy a glass of invisible poison. So down to the floor this heavy carbonic acid comes, and lies along it, just as it lies often in the bottom of old wells, or old brewers' vats, as a stratum of poison, killing occasionally the men who descend into it. Hence, as foolish a practice as I know is that of sleeping on the floor; for, towards the small hours, when the room gets cold, the sleeper on the floor is breathing carbonic acid.

And here one word to those ladies who interest themselves with the poor. The poor are too apt in times of distress to pawn their bedsteads and keep their beds. Never, if you have influence, let that happen. Keep the bedstead, whatever else may go, to save the sleeper from the carbonic acid on the floor.

How, then, shall we get rid of the foul air on the top of the room? After all that has been written and tried on ventilation, I know no simpler method than putting into the chimney one of Arnott's ventilators, which may be bought and fixed for a few shillings, always remembering that it must be fixed into the chimney as near the ceiling as possible. I can speak of these ventilators from twenty-five years' experience. Living in a house with low ceilings, liable to become overcharged with carbonic acid, which produces sleepiness in the evening, I have found that these ventilators keep the air fresh and pure; and I consider the presence of one of these ventilators in a room more valuable than three or four feet additional height of ceiling. I have found, too, that their working proves how necessary they are, from this simple fact, — you would suppose that as the ventilator opens freely into the chimney, the smoke would be blown down through it in high winds, and blacken the ceiling; but this is just what does not happen. If the ventilator be at all properly poised, so as to shut with a violent gust of wind, it will at all other moments keep itself permanently open, proving thereby that there is an up-draught of heated air continually escaping from the ceiling up the chimney.

Another very simple method of ventilation is employed in those excellent cottages which her Majesty has built for her laborers round Windsor. Over each door a sheet of perforated zinc some eighteen inches square is fixed, allowing the foul air to escape into the passage, and in the ceiling of the passage a similar sheet of zinc, allowing it to escape into the roof. Fresh air, meanwhile, should be obtained from outside, by piercing the windows or otherwise. And here let me give one hint to all builders of houses, — if possible let bedroom windows open at the top as well as at the bottom.

Let me impress the necessity of using some such contrivances, not only on parents and educators, but on those who employ work-people, and above all on those who employ young women in shops or in workrooms. What their condition may be in this city I know not; but most painful it has been to me in other places, when passing through warehouses or workrooms, to see the pale, sodden, and as the French would say, "etiolated" countenances of the girls who were passing the greater part of the day in them; and painful, also, to breathe an atmosphere of which habit had, alas, made them unconscious, but which to one coming out of the open air was altogether noxious, and shocking also; for it was fostering the seeds of death, not only in the present but in future generations.

Why should this be? Every one will agree that good ventilation is necessary in a hospital because people cannot get well without fresh air. Do they not see that by the same reasoning good ventilation is necessary everywhere because people cannot remain well without fresh air? Let me entreat those who employ women in workrooms, if they have no time to read through such books as Dr. Andrew Combe's "Physiology applied to Health and Education," and Madame de Wahl's "Practical Hints on the Moral, Mental, and Physical Training of Girls," to procure certain tracts, published by Messrs. Jarrold, Paternoster Row, for the Ladies' Sanitary Association; especially one which bears on this subject, "The Black Hole in our own Bedrooms"; Dr. Lankester's "School Manual of Health," or a manual on ventilation, published by the Metropolitan Working Classes Association for the Improvement of Public Health.

I look forward — I say it openly — to some period of higher civilization, when the acts of parliament for the ventilation of factories and workshops shall be largely extended, and made far more stringent; when officers of public health shall be empowered to enforce the ventilation of every room in which persons are employed for hire; and empowered also to demand a proper system of ventilation for every new house, whether in country or in town. To that, I believe, we must come; but I had sooner far see these improvements carried out, as befits the citizens of a free country, in the spirit of the Gospel rather than in that of the law, — carried out, not compulsorily and from fear of fines, but voluntarily, from a sense of duty, honor, and humanity. I appeal, therefore, to the good feeling of all whom it may concern, whether the health of those whom they employ, and therefore the supply of fresh air which they absolutely need, are not matters for which they are not more or less responsible to their country and their God.

And if any excellent person of the old school should answer me, "Why make all this fuss about ventilation? Our forefathers got on very well without it," I must answer that, begging their pardons, our ancestors did nothing of the kind. Our ancestors got on usually very ill in these matters: and when they got on well, it was because they had good ventilation in spite of themselves.

First they got on very ill. To quote a few remarkable instances of longevity, or to tell me that men were larger and stronger on the average in old times, is to yield to the old fallacy of fancying that savages were peculiarly healthy because those who were seen were active and strong. The simple answer is, that the strong alone survived, while the majority died from the severity of the training. Savages do not increase in number; and our ancestors increased but very slowly for many centuries. I am not going to disgust my audience with statistics of disease; but knowing something, as I happen to do, of the social state and of the health of the Middle and Elizabethan Ages, I have no hesitation in saying that the average of disease and death was far greater then than it is now. Epidemics of many kinds, typhus, ague, plague, — all diseases which were caused more or less by bad air, devastated this land and Europe in those days with a horrible intensity, to which even the choleras of our times are mild. The back streets, the hospitals, the jails, the barracks, the camps, — every place in which any large number of persons congregated, were so many nests of pestilence, engendered by uncleanness, which defiled alike the water which was drank and the air which was breathed; and as a single fact, of which the tables of insurance companies assure us, the average of human life in England has increased twenty five per cent since the reign of George I., owing simply to our more rational and cleanly habits of life.

But secondly, I said that when our ancestors got on well, they did so because they got ventilation in spite of themselves. Luckily for them, their houses were ill-built, their doors and windows would not shut. They had lattice-windowed houses too, to live in one of which, as I can testify from long experience, is as thoroughly ventilating as living in a lantern with the glass broken out. It was because their houses were full of draughts, and still more, in the early middle age, because they had no glass, and stopped out the air only by a shutter at night, that they sought for shelter rather than for fresh air, of which they sometimes had too much; and to escape the wind, built their houses in holes, such as that in which the old city of Winchester stands. Shelter, I believe, as much as the desire to be near fish in Lent, and to occupy the rich alluvium of the valleys, made the monks of old England choose the river-banks for the sites of their abbeys. They made a mistake therein, which, like most mistakes, did not go unpunished. These low situations, especially while the forests were yet thick on the hills around, were the perennial haunts of fever and ague, produced by subtle vegetable poisons, carried in the carbonic acid given off by rotting vegetation. So there again they fell in with man's old enemy, bad air. Still, as long as the doors and windows did not shut, some free circulation of air remained. But now our doors and windows shut only too tight. We have plate-glass instead of lattices; and we have replaced the draughty and smoky but really wholesome open chimney, with its wide corners and settles, by narrow registers, and even by stoves. We have done all we can, in fact, to seal ourselves up hermetically from the outer air, and to breathe our own breaths over and over again; and we pay the penalty of it in a thousand ways unknown to our ancestors, through whose rooms all the winds of heaven whistled, and who were glad enough to shelter themselves from draughts in the sitting-room by the high screen round the fire, and in the sleeping-room by the thick curtains of the four-post bedstead, which is now rapidly disappearing before a higher civilization. We, therefore, absolutely require to make for ourselves the very ventilation from which our ancestors tried to escape.

But, ladies, there is an old and true proverb, that you may bring a horse to the water, but you cannot make him drink. And in likewise it is too true that you may bring people to the fresh air, but you cannot make them breathe it. Their own folly, or the folly of their parents and educators, prevents their lungs being duly filled and duly emptied. Therefore, the blood is not duly oxygenated, and the whole system goes wrong. Paleness, weakness, consumption, scrofula, and too many other ailments are the consequences of ill-filled lungs. For without well-filled lungs robust health is impossible.

And if any one shall answer, "We do not want robust health so much as intellectual attainment. The mortal body, being the lower organ, must take its chance, and be even sacrificed, if need be, to the higher organ, the immortal mind," to such

I reply, You cannot do it. The laws of nature, which are the express will of God, laugh such attempts to scorn. Every organ of the body is formed out of the blood; and if the blood be vitiated, every organ suffers in proportion to its delicacy; and the brain, being the most delicate and highly specialized of all organs, suffers most of all and soonest of all, as every one knows who has tried to work his brain when his digestion was the least out of order. Nay, the very morals will suffer. From ill-filled lungs, which signify ill-repaired blood, arise year by year an amount not merely of disease, but of folly, temper, laziness, intemperance, madness, and, let me tell you fairly, crime, — the sum of which will never be known till that great day when men shall be called to account for all deeds done in the body, whether they be good or evil.

I must refer you on this subject again to Andrew Combe's "Physiology," especially chapters iv. and vii.; and also to chapter x. of Madame de Wahl's excellent book. I will only say this shortly, that the three most common causes of ill-filled lungs, in children and in young ladies, are stillness, silence, and stays.

First, stillness; a sedentary life and want of exercise. A girl is kept for hours sitting on a form writing or reading, to do which she must lean forward; and if her mistress cruelly attempts to make her sit upright, and thereby keep the spine in an attitude for which Nature did not intend it, she is thereby doing her best to bring on that disease so fearfully common in girls' schools, lateral curvature of the spine. But practically the girl will stoop forward. And what happens?

The lower ribs are pressed into the body, thereby displacing more or less something inside. The diaphragm in the mean time, which is the very bellows of the lungs remains loose; the lungs are never properly filled or emptied; and an excess of carbonic acid accumulates at the bottom of them. What follows? Frequent sighing to get rid of it; heaviness of head; depression of the whole nervous system under the influence of the poison of the lungs; and when the poor child gets up from her weary work, what is the first thing she probably does? She lifts up her chest, stretches, yawns, and breathes deeply, — Nature's voice, Nature's instinctive cure, which is probably regarded as ungraceful, as what is called "lolling" is. As if sitting upright was not an attitude in itself essentially ungraceful and such as no artist would care to draw. As if "lolling," which means putting the body in the attitude of the most perfect ease compatible with a fully expanded chest, was not in itself essentially graceful, and to be seen in every reposing figure in Greek bas-reliefs and vases; graceful and like all graceful actions, healthful at the same time. The only wholesome attitude of repose which I see allowed in average school-rooms is lying on the back on the floor, or on a sloping board, in which case the lungs must be fully expanded. I have seen that plan work much good, not only with girls, but with delicate boys, especially when combined with moderate reading aloud.

This last word brings me to the second mistake, enforced silence. I said moderate reading aloud, because where there is any tendency to irritability of throat or lungs, too much moderation cannot be used. You may as well try to cure a diseased lung by working it as to cure a lame horse by galloping him. But where the breathing organs are of average health, let it be said once and for all, that children and young people cannot make too much noise. The parents who cannot bear the noise of their children have no right to have brought them into the world. The schoolmistress who enforces silence on her pupils is committing — unintentionally no doubt, but still committing — an offence against reason, worthy only of a convent. Every shout, every burst of laughter, every song; nay, in the case of infants, as physiologists well know, every moderate fit of crying, conduces to health by rapidly filling and emptying the lung, and changing the blood more rapidly from black to red, — that is, from death to life.

Andrew Combe tells a story of a large charity school, in which the young girls were, for the sake of their health, shut up in the hall and school-room during play hours, from November till March, and no romping or noise allowed. The natural consequences were, the great majority of them fell ill; and I am afraid that a great deal of illness has been from time to time contracted in certain school-rooms, simply through this one cause of enforced silence. Some cause or other there must be for the amount of ill-health and weakness which prevails especially among girls of the middle classes in towns, who have not, poor things, the opportunities which richer girls have, of keeping themselves in strong health by riding, skating, archery (that last quite an admirable exercise for the chest and lungs, and far preferable to croquet, which involves too much unwholesome stooping). Even playing at ball, which has been popular ever since the time of old Homer, who makes the Princess Nausicaa and her maidens play it on the sea-shore, after they have washed the garments of the royal household, — even a game of ball, I say, — if milliners and shop-girls had room to indulge in one after their sedentary work, — might bring fresh spirits to many a heart, and fresh color to many a cheek.

I spoke just now of the Greeks. I suppose you will all allow that the Greeks were, as far as we know, the most beautiful race which the world ever saw. Every educated man knows that they were also the cleverest of all races; and, next to his Bible, thanks God for Greek literature.

Now these people had made physical as well as intellectual education a science as well as a study. Their women practised graceful (in some cases even athletic) exercises. They developed, by a free and healthy life, those figures which remain everlasting and unapproachable models of human beauty; but (to come to my third point) they wore no stays. The first mention of stays that I have ever found is in the letters of dear old Synesius, Bishop of Cyrene, on the Greek coast of Africa, about four hundred years after the Christian era. He tells us how, when he was shipwrecked on a remote part of the coast, and he and the rest of the passengers were starving on cockles and limpets, there was among them a slave girl out of the far East, who had a pinched wasp-waist, such as you may see on the old Hindoo sculptures, and such as you may see in any street in a British town.

And when the Greek ladies of the neighborhood found her out, they sent for her from house to house, to behold with astonishment and laughter this new and prodigious waist, with which it seemed to them it was impossible for a human being to breathe or live; and they petted the poor girl and fed her, as they might a dwarf or a giantess, till she got quite fat and comfortable, while her owners had not enough to eat. So strange and ridiculous seemed our present fashion to the descendants of those who, centuries before, had imagined, because they had seen living and moving, those glorious statues which we pretend to admire, but refuse to imitate.

It seems to me that a few centuries hence, when mankind has learnt to fear God more, and therefore to obey more strictly those laws of nature and of science which are the will of God, — it seems to me, I say, that in those days the present fashion of tight-lacing will be looked back upon as a contemptible and barbarous superstition, denoting a very low level of civilization in the peoples which have practised it. That for generations past, women should have been in the habit, — not to please men, who do not care about the matter as a point of beauty, — but simply to vie with each other in obedience to something called fashion, — that they should, I say, have been in the habit of deliberately crushing that part of the body which should be specially left free, contracting and displacing their lungs, their heart, and all the most vital and important organs, and entailing thereby disease, not only on themselves, but on their children after them, — that for forty years past physicians should have been telling them of the folly of what they have been doing; — and that they should as yet, in the great majority of cases, not only turn a deaf ear to all warnings, but actually deny the offence, of which one glance of the physician or the sculptor, who know what shape the human body ought to be, brings them in guilty, — this, I say, is an instance of — what shall I call it? which deserves at once the lash, not merely of the satirist, but of any theologian who really believes that God made the physical universe. Let me, I pray you, appeal to your common sense for a moment. When any one chooses a horse or a dog, whether for strength, for speed, or for any other useful purpose, the first thing almost to be looked at is the girth round the lower ribs, the room for heart and lungs. Exactly in proportion to that will be the animal's general healthiness, power of endurance, and value in many other ways. If you will look at eminent lawyers and famous orators, who have attained a healthy old age, you will see that in every case they are men (like the late Lord Palmerston, and others whom I could mention) of remarkable size, not merely in the upper, but in the lower part of the chest; men who had, therefore, a peculiar power of using the diaphragm to fill and to clear the lungs, and therefore to oxygenate the blood of the whole body. Now it is just these lower ribs, across which the diaphragm is stretched like the head of a drum, which stays contract to a minimum. If you advised owners of horses and hounds to put their horses or their hounds into stays, and lace them up tight, in order to increase their beauty, you would receive, I doubt not, a very courteous, but certainly a very decided refusal to do that which would spoil not merely the animals themselves, but the whole stud or the whole kennel for years to come. And if you advised an orator to put himself into tight stays, he, no doubt, again would give a courteous answer; but he would reply (if he was a really educated man) that to comply with your request would involve his giving up public work, under the probable penalty of being dead within the twelvemonth.

And how much work of every kind, intellectual as well as physical, is spoiled or hindered — how many deaths occur from consumption and other complaints which are the result of this habit of tight lacing, is known partly to the medical men, who lift up their voices in vain, and known fully to Him who will not interfere with the least of his own physical laws to save human beings from the consequences of their own wilful folly.

And now — to end this lecture with more pleasing thoughts — What becomes of this breath which passes from your lips? Is it merely harmful, merely waste? God forbid! God has forbidden that anything should be merely harmful or merely waste in this so wise and well-made world. The carbonic acid which passes from your lips at every breath — ay, even that which oozes from the volcano crater when the eruption is past — is a precious boon to thousands of things of which you have daily need. Indeed, there is a sort of hint at physical truth in the old fairy tale of the girl, from whose lips, as she spoke, fell pearls and diamonds; for the carbonic acid of your breath may help hereafter to make the pure carbonate of lime of a pearl, or the still purer carbon of a diamond. Nay, it may go (in such a world of transformations do we live) to make atoms of coal strata, which shall lie buried for ages beneath deep seas, shall be upheaved in continents which are yet unborn, and there be burnt for the use of a future race of men, and resolved into their original elements.

Coal, wise men tell us, is on the whole breath and sunlight, — the breath of living creatures who have lived in the vast swamps and forests of some primeval world, and the sunlight which transmuted that breath into the leaves and stems of trees, magically locked up for ages in that black stone, to become, when it is burnt at last, light and carbonic acid, as it was at first. For though you must not breathe your breath again, you may at least eat your breath, if you will allow the sun to transmute it for you into vegetables; or you may enjoy its fragrance and its color in the shape of a lily or a rose. When you walk in a sunlit garden, every word you speak, every breath you breathe, is feeding the plants and flowers around. The delicate surface of the green leaves absorbs the carbonic acid, and parts it into its elements, retaining the carbon to make woody fibre, and courteously returning you the oxygen to mingle with the fresh air, and be inhaled by your lungs once more. Thus do you feed the plants, just as the plants feed you, while the great life-giving sun feeds both; and the geranium standing in the sick child's window does not merely rejoice his eye and mind by its beauty and freshness, but repays honestly the trouble spent on it, absorbing the breath which the child needs not, and giving to him the breath which he needs.

So are the services of all things constituted according to a divine and wonderful order, and knit together in mutual dependence and mutual helpfulness. A fact to be remembered with hope and comfort, but also with awe and fear. For as in that which is above nature, so in nature itself; he that breaks one physical law is guilty of all. The whole universe, as it were, takes up arms against him; and all Nature, with her numberless and unseen powers, is ready to avenge herself on him, and on his children after him, he knows not when nor where. He, on the other hand, who obeys the laws of nature with his whole heart and mind will find all things working together to him for good. He is at peace with the physical universe. He is helped and befriended alike by the sun above his head and the dust beneath his feet; because he is obeying the will and mind of Him who made sun, and dust, and all things, and who has given them a law which cannot be broken.

ROBERT'S CAPITAL HIT.

III.

I DID not expect to hear from Robert for two days, and I expected that his first letter would contain little more than the announcement of his arrival at Paris. In order to make things as little unpleasant for me as possible, he had promised to write such letters as I could show to his mother, and to put all the private intelligence about the "little bit of a venture" on a separate sheet. The first letter came, and merely announced his arrival, and that he had put himself in communication with the person with whom his client's business was to be transacted. This letter had no enclosure, and its vagueness made no impression upon my mother-in-law. It was quite in keeping with Mrs. John's theory respecting the degree of confidence in matters of business of which I was held by Robert to be intellectually worthy. But the third envelope had a tiny sheet of very thin paper, closely covered with waiting, inside the ostensible contents; and I escaped as soon as I could from the breakfast-table to my own room, to peruse this document in peace.

I had not read six lines of it before I saw that Robert was disheartened. He had found Mr. Disney more unmanageable, more flighty, more unreasonable than he had expected. He could not get him to settle anything definitely, — he would, and he would not. He acknowledged that he must sell the mine, but it had been so badly managed as to have decreased seriously in value, and that he had been going on in so reckless a fashion that he could not hope to set his affairs right at any less cost than the immediate sale.

"All this," Robert wrote, "I have told Dorrisson, who, by the way, has gone off to Scotland about some tremendously weighty undertaking in iron ship-building in the Clyde, — and also that I am sure, from Disney's manner, that some one else has got hold of him, and he is shuffling in this way in order to see which of the two offers is the better. I have very little of the detective faculty, but I have scented so much, at all events; and I strongly suspect that when he kept me waiting an hour for him yesterday at one of his two addresses, he was seeing somebody else on similar business at the other. He is a reckless being, but at the same time slippery and uncertain. However, Wainwright knows all about his liabilities in London, and I am getting to know about them here; and if we can arrange them on decent terms, and get him to take a reasonable sum, and sign the agreement for the sale, all will be well. By one of those accidents, which I dare say are not so very uncommon, if one only knew, I met yesterday, as he stood staring up in wonder at the demolitions and reconstructions here, which are sufficiently astounding to strangers already, — but are, they say, the merest faint outline of what is to be done in that way, — our old acquaintance Thaddeus Flynn. Don't you remember his being at our wedding, and going to California immediately afterwards? Well, he made a fortune there, and he seems inclined to spend a fair share of it in Paris; than which there is no more convenient sphere for such an operation. The bearing of these particulars is, that Flynn is able to give me important information about the mine of Campo de los Angeles. He knows it well, says it is of immense value, and needs only honest and intelligent management to be a splendid concern,—a 'safe fortune,' says Flynn, to every one concerned in it. With this additional motive for believing in my purpose, it is not a little vexatious to be balked and puzzled by Disney's queer, unsatisfactory, shuffling ways, and to feel sure that some one is countermining me. I must have patience and prudence, I suppose, but I confess I am rather tired of this uncertainty already. I am to see him this afternoon, and will report progress. I am quite sure that there is some one in the field, whose tactics are of the same nature as ours, and I am almost sure that some one has got at his information through an inadvertence of Walnwright's."

Robert's letter worried me a good deal. I found I had been cherishing much more hope in this case than I usually felt in anything speculative. I hated the idea of his being disappointed, after all his toil and anxiety, and was not adequately consoled by the remembrance of the certainly liberal fee, and the presumably valuable connection. I was very dull all day; I could not rouse myself; I could not try to be companionable with my mother-in-law; and when the evening post brought an announcement from Mrs. John, that she intended to honor us with her company on the following day, and would have the pleasure of bringing her "two toddlers," who were two extremely odious spoiled children, to see their dear grandmamma, but begged we would not "put ourselves out," or introduce unwholesome pastry at tea,—then I felt I could not endure it; I must get away, I must bear the next day's anxiety somewhere away from Clapham.

"I'm sorry I shall not be able to see Mrs. John, ma'am," I said, when my mother-in-law had read out the note; "but I am going to Sydenham tomorrow, to see my cousin, Miss Eccles."

"Indeed!" said Mrs. Heron, with a perfect performance of the sniff condemnatory. "I wonder you did not mention the engagement before. But, I dare say, Mrs. John will not mind."

I felt quite sure she would not, and that the two ladies would have a comfortable talk over me during my absence, so I did not make any apology. The next morning, the weather being still serenely beautiful, I set off, in a chocolate-colored omnibus, to perform the first stage of my journey to London Bridge, from whence alone, in those days, Sydenham was attainable by railway.

If there be such a thing in England as a cheerful waiting-room, which I do not believe, it certainly was not to be found at the London Bridge Railway Station ten years ago. It is almost that time since I have seen the dingy apartment, with the deplorable, high-silled windows; the shabby floor-clothed floors; the ingeniously uncomfortable benches; the heavy, dust-laden tables; the leather-bound Testaments; the dumpy bottle of stale, undrinkable water; the muggy glass; and the out-of-date timetable, which rendered a sojourn in the precincts of the London Bridge railway a penitential exercise. Everything may be changed now, for aught I know, and the general first-class waiting-room may be as handsome, cheerful, refined, and habitable an apartment as those assigned to a similar purpose on the other side of the Channel, where the railways belong to the government, and the government best secures its own interests by consulting the convenience and the tastes of the people. I only know that waiting-room was a fearsome place on that fine summer forenoon, when I, finding I had missed a train for Sydenham, and should have an hour to wait for the next, seated myself despondently on one of the benches, on the surface of whose leather covering dust and grease contended for the supremacy, and made up my mind, ruefully, that this was almost as bad as putting up with Mrs. John at Acanthus Villa.

A woman, whose face wore an expression of chronic discontent and fatigue, and two tired children, were in the dreary waiting-room; the former leaning her head forlornly in an angle of the wall; while the latter kicked the panels under the high-silled windows, and drummed upon the dirty lower panes, which they could hardly reach. I had bought a morning paper, but I did not feel inclined to read it. I am not a sufficiently large-minded woman to find solace for private trouble in public affairs, and my own small sphere occupies me to the exclusion of nobler themes. If the philosopher who defined the difference between the male and female intellect as integral, consisting in the incapacity of women to entertain abstract ideas, had known me, I am sure he might have cited me triumphantly in support of his theory. I remember one day when we were talking on this very subject of speculations, Robert said to me: "Martha, my dear, you are a true woman as to your brain; you have no faculty of generalization." And I replied: "I dare say not. I have not the least notion what you mean; but I don't want to have the notion or the faculty either." I found out afterwards what he meant, and I know he is right. If Robert were an officer in the army, I know I could not understand or care about war or peace, except as his safety and welfare should be concerned in them; and so it would be in every other case; so it was in this particular case. The Campo de los Angeles, with all its public and private interests, resolved itself for me into Robert's being mortified or pleased by the result of his undertaking and journey. Of all the unheroic, unambitious, narrow-minded women in the world, I do believe I am the most unheroic, unambitious, and narrow-minded.

No, I could not read the morning paper; and I took to gazing listlessly out at the large, intricate, dirty, comfortless station, where trains were arriving, departing, or standing about, having their doors slurred with water, and their windows pulled violently up to be imperfectly rubbed with dirty cloths. The time passed heavily, and I had just ascertained that only a quarter of an hour of waiting had gone over, when I saw a man, whose appearance seemed familiar to me, coming along the platform from a train which had stopped at some distance, and approaching the waiting-room. In a few moments he had reached the threshold, followed by a porter, to whom he was speaking, and carrying a black bag. This person was Mr. Sloane, of whom Robert had spoken, whom we had met occasionally at Acanthus Lodge; and the porter seemed to know him, and his infirmity, for he roared his replies to the questions which were put to him.

"You're sure you have n't seen him?"

"Yes, sir, quite sure," shouted the porter.

By this time they were both in the room, and Mr. Sloane had placed his black bag on the huge dusty table. He sat down with his back to the window at which I was standing.

"Very extraordinary," he said, in a voice almost as loud as that in which the porter had spoken, and which, together with his frowning and forbidding appearance, sent the children to their mother's side, whence they directed alarmed looks at the large gentleman who made himself so very much at home,—"very extraordinary. I never knew him to be late before—never."

"Perhaps the message did not reach him soon enough, sir," the porter said, and evidently wished to get away, for he looked fussily out of the window, as if he saw a train coming.

"Nonsense, nonsense!" and Mr. Sloane roared, more loudly than before. "The message was in plenty of time. However, I must wait. Do you look sharp out there; you'll be on the platform, I suppose?"

"Yes, sir," answered the man.

"I can't stand about there; and if he isn't watched, he may go away without seeing me. Look out for him. I'll wait a quarter of an hour or so; and if you see him, send him in here."

He gave the man a shilling; and turning sulkily to the table, undid the spring fastening of his bag, and took out several papers tied together with red tape. The porter passed the window the next moment with one of his fellows, nodding his head and jerking his thumb in the direction of the unconscious Mr. Sloane, who was mumbling and growling over his papers like a discontented bear. He had not seen me, and I had no wish to attract his attention. He would probably think it a great nuisance to have to talk to me during our common durance, and I found it always very fatiguing to talk to him, for he was uninteresting, deaf, rude, and irritable. He had just come up from Sydenham, I supposed, and had made an appointment with some individual, who had not kept it, to meet him at the station. I continued my unobservant lookout upon the platform, and Mr. Sloane sat with his back to me, but not far from me as I stood, still growling over his papers, while the tired children continued to watch him with round, alarmed eyes.

Presently I heard him scrabbling among the papers still in his bag, and muttering, "Now where the deuce is it? Where can I have put it? I certainly had it this morning, and I did not take it out in the train. Let me see. Did I?—No, certainly not." Then he clicked his tongue against his teeth, with that sound unrenderable in words which signifies vexation, and searched through the papers again. I turned half round, and watched the search, but he did not notice me. He grew more and more angry and impatient; turned his bag up with the open mouth downwards; shook all its contents out upon the table; turned them over unavailingly, muttering all the time, sometimes inaudibly, but at others so that I could catch his words: "There, if I've come without that, he might as well have stayed away as not. What the deuce have I done with it? If I could even remember the address.—Hôtel de l'Univers, was it? Hôtel de Rouen? Hôtel de Calais? Hôtel de something or other. What was it?" Now he was frantically searching his pockets, of which—as he was wrapped up as if in mid-winter on this fine afternoon in May—he had several; and presently he pulled out a white silk muffler, and with it a letter, which fell to the ground, and on which he pounced with a grunt of satisfaction, muttering, "How the deuce did it get there?"

"Your train, ma'am," said the porter, to whom

Mr. Sloane had given the shilling, "just starting. Come along, little uns"; and he good-naturedly took the smaller child in his arms, while the mother led the other away, who went with a backward glance at the gruff old gentleman, with whom I now found myself alone.

He unfolded the letter, which was written on large business-like paper, and spreading it out on the table, set his elbows on either side of it, and holding his head between his hands began to mutter and mumble more continuously and loudly than before. My position was not pleasant; he was evidently skimming the letter in order to find out some particular passage,—probably the name of the hotel he had been trying to recall. I could distinctly hear what he said where I stood, and I could not change my position without attracting his attention, which I particularly wished to avoid. I was thinking that I must do this unpleasant thing, however, when Mr. Sloane said, quite aloud: "Hôtel d'Espagne! That's it, of course. That's where Dorrisson's man found him!" and proceeded to make a memorandum in his pocket-book. The words so startled me, that I turned quite round, and then and there proved myself incapable of entertaining, or at least of acting on the abstract idea of honor, for I felt instinctively that if I listened to this deaf gentleman's communing with himself, I should learn something which it might be of importance to Robert to know, and it never occurred to me not to listen. Indeed,—so confused are the feminine "moral ideas,"—I had a notion that there was something "providential" in the circumstances. At any rate, I stood quite still, and sideways, at a few feet from Mr. Sloane, who presently began to read the letter before him in an audible voice, and almost consecutively. The earlier passages of the letter were of no importance; but soon I heard this: "Disney is playing an artful game; but I dare say as much for the fun as for the profit of it. But to prolong this kind of fun does not suit us, so I have determined to bring the matter to a conclusion. I have not happened to meet Dorrisson's man, though I know he is in Paris; indeed, Disney has said" as much, and almost acknowledged the game he is playing; so I suppose he has given him a rendezvous somewhere else. Of course, if it were worth our while we could ascertain that very easily, but it is not. I am resolved now to use the five hundred pounds assigned debt, which Colvill prepared as a last resource, in case Disney was unmanageable, or Dorrisson's man was treading too closely on our heels. Fortunately, the method of procedure here, in matters of the kind, is very summary; and I know, as a fact, that it would not be possible for Disney to lay his hands on five hundred pounds. Indeed, living the life he does, I am surprised he has five pounds in his pocket. I have just now given instructions to Fayolle's people. The five hundred pounds debt to Roberts and Smith is safely assigned to them, as you are aware, and they will take immediate action. Disney will find himself in a very short time lodged at Clichy; and the man who brings him the ready money to get him out will be the successful candidate for Campo de los Angeles. It is fortunate there is such an effectual screw ready to be put on, for he really is the most tiresome fellow, the most slippery customer, I ever had to deal with. But we have him now. Yesterday, he was so cool upon our bargain, had so much the air of a man who was going to slip through my fingers, I made up my mind this must be done at once. Fayolle's people will act to-morrow, so don't let any time be lost on your side. Let me have a draft on Lafitte for five hundred and fifty pounds by the tenth. I will report progress to-morrow." Then came a pause, and some mumbled sentences which I did not catch. I had listened with painful intensity, I had heard with perfect distinctness, but my mind was not clear enough to take note, in any practical sense, of its own impressions. I knew I should not forget a word that I had heard, though some portions of the letter came back to me with more force than the others. I knew my memory was quite trustworthy, but there might be more for me to hear. After a little, I should be able to collect my thoughts, and decide on what was to be done. I remained motionless, and still intently listening; but Mr. Sloane thrust the letter, with a final impatient grunt, into his bag, snapped the lock, and rose. I turned my face to the window, and leaned my forehead against the glass. It would have been unfortunate that he should recognize me just then, as he probably knew who was "Dorrison's man," whom his correspondent was so very certain about outwitting. Mr. Sloane was walking heavily to the door, when the porter again made his appearance, and said; "Mr. Colvill's a comin' in, sir"; and in the next breath; "Your train now, ma'am."

Mr. Sloane hurried out, and I caught sight of a slight dark man, whom he met a few paces from the door of the waiting-room, and with whom he walked away.

"Your train, ma'am," repeated the waiter.

"Thank you," I answered; "I have changed my mind; I am not going."

The man looked a little surprised, but I suppose railway porters see a good many eccentric and foolish people in the course of their lives; and this one said nothing to indicate that to have waited nearly an hour for a particular train, in such an uninviting place, and then change one's mind about travelling by it, was not the most orderly and rational of proceedings. I left the station and crossed over to the enclosed passage, which led, in arcade fashion, in those days, to the Tooley Street side, but which no longer exists. In that passage there were queer little shops, where the railway passenger could rush in and purchase fruit, cakes, confectionery, dolls, writing-desks, railway-rugs, spectacles, paper-knives, slippers, and other useful commodities.

I entered the cake-shop near the entrance, bought some pastry, which gave me an excuse for asking for a seat; and then, opening my pocket-book on the counter, I wrote down every word of the letter I had heard read out by Mr. Sloane. I had no doubt of the entire correctness with which I reproduced it; the sentences arranged themselves in my memory with unerring exactness: "Disney will find himself in a very short time lodged at Clichy; and the man who brings him the ready money to get him out will be the successful candidate for Campo de los Angeles."

I tried to recall what it was I had heard Robert telling John about the summary action of French law in cases of debt, and how creditors in England could assign their debtors' obligations to French holders, and so bring them under the action of the law; but I had no very clear notion of it all. It did not matter, however. No doubt, the writer of that letter knew what he was about, and my business was to act on the information I had obtained.

I had Robert's letter with me, and now read it carefully again. The other formed a startling commentary upon it. Mr. Dorrison was not in town, so that I could not go to him, tell him what I had found out, and leave him to circumvent the designs of the other party. I retraced my steps to the London Bridge Railway Station, and entering the continental department, ascertained the hour at which the mail-train for Paris, via Dover and Calais, would be despatched. Six o'clock P. M. It was now half past eleven. There was time enough, but none to spare, for what I had to do.

Mr. John Hackett had his place of business, and also his place of abode, at No. 800 Lincoln's Inn Fields. He was the quietest and most business-like of men, and held Lincoln's Inn, out of whose precincts he rarely stirred, in reverence and admiration worthy of Tim Linkinwater. He had been an old friend of my parents, and took a kindly interest in myself and Gerty. He had not approved of my marriage, not on particular, but on general grounds. He did not see the good of it. Let people keep to themselves, and spend their little or much money, as the case might be, on themselves, — that was his doctrine. He was very consistent; he had never married, or been suspected of the remotest notion of paying attention to any woman in his life. I don't know what his exact connection with the legal profession was; I believe he had some, though not "a lawyer," in the precise sense of the term; but, whatever his business was, he stuck to it pertinaciously, never went out, or had company at home, and cherished nothing except his cat and his cough. I believe to have lost either would have grieved him sorely.

The first thing I had to do was to see Mr. John Hackett. That was easy; but I was not so sure about what was to come after, and had plenty of time to become very uncertain and uncomfortable about it, before a dreadful jingling, jolting "four-wheeler" deposited me at his door. What a fool I was not to have gone in a hansom, but I am as inconsistent as most women. I had made up my mind to do rather a daring thing, but I had not the courage to get into a hansom by myself! It is ten years ago, you must remember.

Mr. Hackett was at home, and could see me; and in a short time I found myself in his private office, — a gloomy room, with a very oppressive smell of parchment and mouldy ink about it, — and explaining to him, while he maintained profound silence, that I had come to ask him for my five hundred pounds. I am sure my stammering speech and confused countenance would have justified Mr. Hackett in suspecting me of the most nefarious designs in making this application. If he had thought I wanted the money in order to run away from Robert, and endow a gay Lothario with all my worldly goods, I should not have blamed him. This suspicion did not present itself to him, but I saw at once that which did.

"It is very odd that you should come in this way, and ask me for this sum, without giving me any notice," said Mr. Hackett, severely.

"I know it is," I replied; "but Mr. Heron told me he had explained to you that I had the right to claim it, of my own accord, at any time, and I am sure you will not make any difficulty about letting me have it. It is of immense importance to me, to Mr. Heron, that there should not be an hour's delay."

"Soh!" said Mr. Hackett, slowly; "this is to follow the rest, I suppose. Well, well, it is of a piece with the folly of all you women. I thought the nest-egg would not be left long."

How angry I felt with him! Afterwards, when Robert explained that Mr. Hackett, who did not know any of the circumstances, had taken a perfectly correct and sensible view of the case, and had been very right and very kind in deploring his inability to prevent my committing what it was impossible for him to regard otherwise than as an act of arrant folly, I pretended to be convinced, but I was not. More want of generalization, I suppose, another instance of inability to take in "abstract ideas!"

"I cannot explain myself fully, Mr. Hackett," I said; "and of course I cannot make you give me the money, if you won't; I can only assure you that if you do not give it to me, you will do me an irreparable injury."

"Don't excite yourself," said Mr. Hackett; "you shall have the money, — not with my free will, remember; and I hope you will never regret having insisted upon it. I hold your husband's letter of instructions; you are quite right about that; but I am sorry to have to act on it. I hoped your husband would have had more wisdom and self-control."

"My husband has plenty of wisdom and plenty of self-control," I answered, sharply; "but the money is wanted for a matter in which the need could not have been foreseen."

"Ay, ay, I know, — the old story. No one ever foresees. However, it's no business of mine."

"You shall know all about it afterwards, Mr. Hackett," I said, imploringly; "only believe me now that I want the money for a good purpose. Indeed, it shall be replaced in your hands in a few days."

He shook his head, but said nothing; then turned his chair round to his desk, and opened a long drawer, from whence he took a check-book and a slip of paper with a stamp upon it. Slowly and deliberately he made out the check. I watched the writing of every letter of it. Then he wrote something on the oblong slip of stamped paper, and telling me that it was a receipt for five hundred pounds, directed me to sign it. I did so, and he then handed me the precious check.

"Shall I send and get it cashed for you?" he asked me.

"No, thank you," I said, eagerly; "I am going to the neighborhood of the Bank, and will cash it myself."

"Take care where you put it," he said; "and look sharp after your purse as you come out of the Bank."

"Good-by, Mr. Hackett, and a thousand thanks."

"Good-by, Mrs. Heron: you are a very foolish woman, and I hope you may not yet be very sorry for this day's work."

He came with me to the cab, for all that, and shook hands with me when I was seated in it, and said, "Tell Heron I should be glad to see him."

"I will, when he returns from Paris."

The cab moved on, and I left Mr. Hackett looking surprised. It had not occurred to me that he did not know Robert was away. He must have wondered more than ever what I wanted with the money.

It was just one o'clock when I reached the Bank of England. I cashed my precious check, taking the money in five notes of a hundred pounds each; and having fastened my purse securely into the bosom of my dress, I drove once more to the London Bridge Railway Station, and found a train, in which I took my place, just about to start for Sydenham.

My cousin, Mrs. Eccles, lived close to the station at Sydenham, in a small house, with the prettiest of gardens, and the greenest of palings. She was a widow, neither young nor handsome, but both clever and sensible, and I enjoyed her society very much. I did not see her often, because nothing would induce her to encounter the best-parlor régime of Clapham, and my mother-in-law regarded her as an eccentric person, a dubious companion for a well-regulated young woman. If Mrs. Heron did not "hold with" speculators, she held still less with clever women. She did not see the good of it, for her part; literary women never made good wives, or housekeepers, and they had much better leave "such things" — by which my mother-in-law meant the writing of books — to men, who had sense. One of the trials, then, that had attended my removal to Clapham, and the relinquishment of our own happy little house, was the decrease in my opportunities of seeing my cousin. Mrs. Eccles was writing in her tiny drawing-room, and was surprised and pleased to see me. I told her at once what had happened, and was much reassured by her composed acquiescence in my own plan of proceeding.

"Yes, of course," she said. "You must go to Paris by to-night's mail, and take the money to your husband. Whether this Mr. Disney is in Clichy or out of it, this will secure Mr. Heron's success; and equally, of course, your mother-in-law, and that detestable British matron, Mrs. John Heron, must not know anything about it."

"That was my chief difficulty; I felt it ought to be avoided, if possible: I could not explain things to them; and if they thought I had merely gone off to Paris, to join Robert, for a freak! oh, my goodness, I am sure I don't know what they would say of me, or when I should hear the end of it!"

"I should think not, indeed. No, they must not know. You must do this little bit of business quietly — just going to Paris to-night, and coming back by the mail to-morrow night. When you have put the money and the information into your husband's hands, you have nothing more to do in the matter; leave him to make use of them."

"I understand all that," I replied; "but the difficulty is to account for my absence. My mother-in-law will be so surprised and alarmed, if I don't return. I came down to ask you how I should explain my going, for I did not see how I could by any ingenuity conceal it."

Mrs. Eccles thought for a moment, then said briskly, "She would never think of coming here to look for you, would she, if you told her you would remain with me for a couple of days?"

"No, I don't think she would; but I am sure she would make my staying here, during Robert's absence, a cause of offence, and harp upon it for many a day."

"Never mind that; something must be encountered in a case like this; and it is better you should be blamed for staying here than subjected to the frightful accusation of being a clever woman, who is doing a sensible thing to help her husband in a difficulty. You'll get over the one, — but the other? Think of the inconsistency, my dear! It would never do. You must write a note from here, —Mrs. Heron will get it to-night, just when she will be expecting you home — and in that note you must tell a fib or two. You must say I have prevailed upon you to remain here for a couple of days, and that you will return to Clapham on Saturday afternoon."

"Well — but — if she should ever find it out?"

("Moral ideas" again.)

"I don't think she will; but if she ever does lay the blame on Robert. My belief is you will succeed in managing this affair, and your share in it will never be suspected: and Robert's capital hit will elevate him in the opinion of his mother, — success always does elevate people in every one's opinion, you know; and all will go on much better for the future."

"You will have to lend me the money for my travelling expenses," I said; "I have only ten shillings, beside my five hundred pounds."

"I'll do that," replied my cousin; "and also I will lend you a little bag and a brush and comb; and those, with a collar and a couple of pocket-handkerchiefs, will be all the luggage there can be any occasion for you to take with you. And now, you are going to lie down and rest, until your dinner is ready, and to put all care and anxiety off your mind, for I will undertake that you shall be at London Bridge in time for the mail-train to Dover."

She was a very cheering, helpful sort of woman; a capital person to have with one in any trouble, or when one was nervous or undecided. There was no indecision about her. I wrote the note, which I made as vague as possible, with a cowardly kind of notion that thereby I reduced the magnitude of the fibs which I had to resort to. There was clearly no alternative but to keep my mother-in-law in ignorance of my audacious act in taking the last money I possessed to Robert, on such an errand. I had a good rest, though I could not sleep, and a good dinner, during which Mrs. Eccles talked to me in her cheery, bright, encouraging way, and made fun of my first appearance in the character of an unprotected female. She kept her word in every particular. She came with me to London Bridge; she bought my ticket, and selected a corner seat for me in a comfortable carriage; and as the train moved out of the station, I saw her bright, plain, sensible face to the last, and felt as if she were still patting me on the back.

I shall never forget Robert's face when he came to the door of the carriage in which I sat, at the porte-cochère of the Hôtel de Calais, and saw who was the "lady" who had requested to see him; and I shall never forget what he said to me, when he had heard my story, told with the utmost incoherence and nervousness, for I broke down the moment I saw him, and felt that I need not be strong-minded any longer. But I made him understand it somehow, and put the money into his hands. What he said was very precious to me, and might have been dangerous, as provocative of self-conceit, had I not had the counterpoise of my mother-in-law and Mrs. John to any risk of my thinking myself ready-witted. I asked him only one thing, in return for what he was pleased to call a service of incalculable importance: it was that he would never tell any one, if he succeeded, that I had had any part in the transaction. He promised; and I think he has kept his word pretty well. But Mr. Dorrisson asked to be introduced to me not long after, when everything had succeeded, and took an early opportunity of presenting me with some beautiful ornaments, and has ever since evinced a livelier interest in me than is to be quite accounted for by the business relations between him and Robert.

I had a long rest, while Robert hurried away to see what had befallen Mr. Disney. In some hours he returned, and told me his adventures. They are easily summed up, in the words of Mr. Sloane's discomfited correspondent, who narrowly escaped being thrown out of window the next day by the enraged colonial, — in the words which Robert quoted from my notes of the letter: "The man who brought him the money to get him out of Clichy is the successful candidate for Campo de los Angeles." The bargain was concluded that very day, and the triumphant result telegraphed to Dorrisson. Then Robert and I drove about Paris for a while, and dined in a wonderful room, so full of velvet and flowers, and gilding and looking-glasses, that I could hardly eat my dinner for bewilderment. It was on that occasion that we sketched out the scheme of a future visit to Paris; and I am afraid we were as much pleased and amused as a pair of naughty children at the escapade I had effected, and the little secret he and I and my cousin, Mrs. Eccles, possessed in common. He put me into the train, and we parted quite gayly, laughing at the idea of my having made a journey which would have been talked about for a month at Clapham with perfect ease. He did not mean to lose sight of Mr. Disney until the final signing and sealing had been done. His last words to me were, "I wonder if our dear old house at Hampstead is to be had?" And then I knew that Robert thought the turn in the long lane of our troubles had been reached, and this "little bit of a venture" was to be the broad way out of them.

When I made my appearance at Clapham I was very coldly received, and my conciliatory attempts were received with a long series of sniffs. I was not afraid of questions; Mrs. Eccles was a person concerning whom my mother-in-law would not condescend even to be curious.

Robert came home a few days after, and called on Mr. Hackett within a few hours of his return. My five hundred pounds were safely lodged in his cautious keeping again; and I suppose Robert made a satisfactory apology for me, as, when I next saw Mr. John Hackett, he told me he had believed me to be a much more foolish woman than I had turned out to be, and he congratulated Robert on having made a less fatal blunder in his marriage than almost any man of his acquaintance.

Campo de los Angeles was a brilliant success, and did prove to be the turning-point in our fortunes. "The very clever way in which Robert managed a critical and difficult affair for Mr. Dorrisson, and the confidential and profitable relations resulting therefrom," is a favorite theme with my mother-in-law, who likes us almost as well as she likes John and Mrs. John, now that we have a finer house than Acanthus Lodge, and Heron and Shaw are no longer "rising" young men, but in an assured and prosperous position. She is not, however, altogether inconsistent; she still declares, on occasion, that she does not "hold with" speculations; though in that mine affair, somewhere in America, a place with a name which she would not pronounce if she could, regarding it as Spanish and impious, Robert had certainly made a Capital Hit.

CHILDREN'S LITERATURE OF THE LAST CENTURY.

BY MISS YONGE.

"Books for children,"—the press groans with their multitude, and their illustrations have absolutely become exquisite works of art. Each risen generation repeats to the rising one that there was nothing like it in its departed childhood, and each mourns over the dissipation of mind created by the profusion of reading, till we are sometimes startled to find that the same things were said of us that we are now saying of our children.

The fact is, that infantine literature, as indeed all sorts of class-literature, is a recent production. Up to the Georgian era, there were no books at all either for children or the poor, excepting the class-books containing old ballads, such as "Chevy Chase," "Fair Rosamond," "Jane Shore," "The Children in the Wood," and short tales such as "The King and the Cobbler," "Whittington and his Cat," "Robin Goodfellow," "The History of the Seven Champions," "The Seven Wise Masters," "The Nine Worthies," all told without any endeavor to simplify the language, but rather dealing in grandiloquence. Little gilt books, the covers clouded with scarlet and blue, with a running pattern of gold creeping over all, and probably representing the last tradition of illumination, appeared at fairs in company with gilt gingerbread equally gaudy, and, when the gentlefolk paced through the booths in stately graciousness, were often bought and conned by the young people, pleased to exercise the powers painfully acquired upon horn-book or primer.

Nor did their elders trouble themselves with scruples as to the ideas they might derive from their studies, nor think that they would be corrupted by the tears plentifully bestowed on Rosamond in her bower or Jane in her white sheet. A book was a book, in the eyes of squire and dame, let it be what it might; and Master Jacky's "bookish turn" was thought to mark him as a scholar and parson, whether he read "Tom Jones," "Robinson Crusoe," or "The Pilgrim's Progress."

For after the gilt-book stage, or indeed during it, the child, if he read at all, read the books provided for the grown-up part of the family. Evelyn's wonderful boy, "Master Clench," read history and classics in their ponderous folios, and even later than this, children still depended on the odd worn volumes of the "Spectator," or any other book that chance consigned to their hands. Hannah More's father repeated the lines of Homer and Virgil in the original to please his own ear and hers, and then translated them; and Mrs. Trimmer (then Sarah Kirby), when only fourteen years old, carried about "Paradise Lost," in her pocket as well as in her head, and was presented by Dr. Johnson with the "Rambler," in testimony of approbation. Some years later the solace of Walter Scott's long illness was acting over the sieges and battles in Orme's "War in Hindoostan." There can be little doubt that those who read at all in those days must have done so from genuine taste for literature, and that though an idle child could not be safely disposed of by setting it down to a baby book, yet that real power was cultivated, and the memory provided with substantial stores, at the time when it is most retentive; and as there was no harassing the young mind by examinations, and requirements of all being comprehended and immediately reproduced in words, the brain was not overwrought, but left free to assimilate what it could or would.

Already, however, these days of comparative neglect—shall we call it wholesome?—were fast waning.

The spontaneous manufacture of the little books of mere amusement had received a great impulse from France, by the translations of the Comtesse d'Aulnoy's and M. Perrault's adaptations of the old mythic lore common to all nations. A queer book, indeed, is Mme. d'Aulnoy's, where the immortal fairy tales stand imbedded in a course of lengthy romances of the Italian or Spanish order, but where predicaments occur in which the heroes and heroines sit still to tell and hear their tales with exemplary patience, or use them to lull the jealous guardian till the elopement is ready. Some unknown caterer for English readers imported the choicest of these tales separately into their little books, and the "Contes de Commère l'Oie" alone seem to have continued in their unbroken condition. "The White Cat,"—her previous and subsequent history judiciously shorn away—"The Sleeping Beauty," "Beauty and the Beast," and "Puss in Boots," "Cinderella," and "Fortunio," then took possession of the British mind in their present shape,—the more completely, perhaps, for meeting with some old more homely forms of the same tradition which it must have since absorbed. Poor authors were employed by the booksellers in the translation of these or in original composition, and thus "Goody Two Shoes" came forth as a bit of hack-work, but sparkling all over with brilliancy, a true grain of gold among the sand around her, and winning tender remembrances from many an admirer who never suspected her of being a chip from the wheel of a veritable Goldsmith (if the pun be allowed us). Do the present generation know Margery Two Shoes and Tommy her brother? How well we remember our own old copy, a small square paper book, with a frontispiece in which Margery elaborately displayed her new shod feet in the first position, and where the eagerness of the parish to receive her instructions must have been taken from Irish eagerness rather than English stolidity. Then there is a chapter fully worthy, in its quiet humor, of "The Vicar of Wakefield," entitled "How the whole Parish was Frightened."

"Who does not know Lady Ducklington, or who does not know how she was buried at this parish church?" Alas! in the last edition that fell into our hands, the ghost had been exorcised as a concession to the theory that children are never to hear of ghosts. Margery is by chance shut up in the church, and rings the bell to procure her release, but the disturbance is taken to be "Lady Ducklington's ghost dancing among the bells." "A ghost, you blockhead," says Mr. Long in a pet, "did either of you ever see a ghost, or know anybody that did?" "Yes," says the clerk, "my father did once, in the shape of a windmill; and it walked all around the church in a white sheet, with jack-boots on, and had a gun by its side instead of a sword."

Margery's own account of her sensations is very simple and sweet, and stamps the authorship upon the tale.

Mr. Marshall, "at the corner of St. Paul's Churchyard," commenced a manufacture of little books of which some have a real merit, independent of the curious pictures they give of manners. We knew a few of them in a reprint already forty years old, and confess to still loving them much.

There was the "Village School," to which the clergyman's, farmers', and laborers' sons and daughters all came on terms of perfect equality. Good Mrs. Bell does not scruple to put Miss Polly Right into a corner with a surreptitiously introduced doll's tea-chest suspended from her neck, though Mr. Right marches through the playground in shovel hat, wig, gown, and bands, looking the picture of ancient orthodoxy; and Roger Riot, the squire's son, is always far subordinate to the pattern Frank West, child of a cobbler, whose companion in perfection is a young lady called Miss Jenny Meek, in long gloves, and a little flat shepherdess's hat. Was this a Utopia, or were village schools thus really universal and impartial? We suspect that they did in truth collect all those capable of payment, and that the children of the better classes frequented them, while the lowest class of all ran utterly wild.

The "Perambulations of a Mouse" was another favorite, in spite of language such as might be anticipated from the name. To say the truth, it is the only impossible autobiography we ever really relished. There was an exceeding charm in the first start in life of the four brother mice, Nimble, Longtail, Brighteyes, and Softdown, and considerable pathos (at least to the infant mind) in the gradual diminution of the brotherhood, until Nimble remained to the last, alone to tell his tale. And the conversations he overhears are related with such spirit, that one only longs to hear more of such interesting people. There is a dialogue between two little girls in bed on imaginary terrors of robbers, which is as good as anything we ever read; and another about fears of mice, which we did not appreciate the less because it is carried on between a nurse, in the act of undressing the baby, and the footman whom she has called in to destroy poor Softdown, already caught in a trap. We should like to know who was the author of the "Perambulations," for it certainly obtained the sort of lodgement in our mind that has generally been unconsciously taken possession of by works of real inherent talent. "Jemima Placid" had more renown, but we doubt if it were as good as the mouse. In recalling it the old nurse's injunction always to pin up the hole at the top of a nightcap for fear of catching cold at it, is the prominent recollection; together with a story of a spur which was applied by the Mentor of a family in every case of ill-manners or awkwardness. These three, and "Keeper's Travels," were, we believe, the élite of the St. Paul's Churchyard literature,—with, perhaps, the addition of "Mrs. Teachem," a most grotesque picture of a young ladies' boarding-school; but, to judge by their advertising lists, and by the notices in Mrs. Trimmer's "Guardian of Education," there must have been many more.

For the didactic age of youthful literature was fast setting in. Mrs. Trimmer was its parent in England, and her impulse probably came far more than she knew from Rousseau. Or it may be true that the religious woman, as well as the original thinker, both felt that tools were wanting to them in forming the young mind, and simultaneously set the forge to work. Rousseau, indeed, did not personally write for the young, but his "Emile" set many pens going in France, Germany, and England, such as Berquin, Madame de Genlis, Kampe, and the Aikin, Day, and Edgeworth school, while Mrs. Trimmer was soberly and earnestly working at her didactic works for the young. "The Rational Dame" is to modern eyes intolerably dull and dreary, and we are sensible of the famine that must have prevailed when we find that it was regarded with enthusiastic delight by the children of the last century, whose next step was into Goldsmith's "Animated Nature." Her "Fabulous Histories" have quite another kind of charm: Robin, Dicky, Flapsy, and Peckay have real character, quite enough to carry the reader over all the long words in which the parent robins and their patrons indulge, and all the rigid "delicacy" that makes Mrs. Benson hesitate to allow her eleven years' old daughter to ascend three rounds of a ladder to look into the redbreast's nest four feet from the ground. We are glad to see them reproduced with beautiful illustrations.

Yet these were still counted as baby-books. In "Cælebs" we find that in the pattern family the children at eight years old have to resign en masse their story-books, and take to "such books as men and women read." The father inaugurates this stage with "John Gilpin"; and probably the "Spectator," Rollin and Goldsmith, Shakespeare, and Pope's "Homer," would have been Hannah More's staple reading for the young.

She herself was the real originator of books written exclusively for the poor in the "Cheap Repository Tracts," which were called forth by her desire to arm the peasantry against the doctrines more or less afloat at the time of the outbreak of the first French Revolution. Both she and her sister Patty were really masterly writers in this line, full of good sense, humor, and real insight into character. "The Shepherd of Salisbury Plain," though taken from an actual character named John Saunders, is a sort of Christian Arcadian, and "Black Giles the Poacher," "Tawny Rachel," and "Hester Wilmot" are capital reading to this day, though probably the change of manners would prevent persons of the class for which they were designed from caring for them. These tracts were not intended for children, but their simplicity and interest made them to be eagerly read by the young, especially when there was an absolute dearth of all interesting comprehensible "Sunday reading," except the "Pilgrim's Progress."

The tide of what we have called the Rousseau-inspired books was by this time setting into England. Perhaps one of the cleverest of them was by the German, C. S. Salzmann, translated, or, perhaps, more truly adapted, by Mary Wollstonecraft, under the strange name of "Elements of Morality." There must have been a strong flavor of genius about the book, for we, without possessing it, heard the traditions of it from the older generations that had been nurtured thereupon, and always regarded a reading of it as one of the pleasures of the houses where the ancestral copies still abode. What the German originals were we cannot tell, but they must have been much transmogrified, since the father of the family figured as Mr. Jones. We suspect that he was formal and prosy, but the noble art of skip carried us over all that, and the adventures were admirable, and indeed were the originals of many a subsequent story in other books. There was the boy bewildered in a wood (which we now know must have been a German forest), seeing "gorgons, and hydras, and chimeras dire" in every bush, admirably given in the illustrations, until he is found by a virtuous curate, who takes him to his home, and regales him with simple fare and good advice.

This curate must have been a regular German pastor, for the grateful Charles, going afterwards to make him a visit, finds the whole family prostrated by the small-pox, all in one room. There are the children left to spend the day after their own devices (an idea often repeated); and the horrid disaster of the boy who, kicking against a door, impaled his foot on a projecting nail. We well remember that in one of the two copies we had the occasional felicity of studying there was a print of this unhappy being, on which we used to gaze with awed fascination; and there was also a miser in a ragged garment, and a benevolent Jew, whose forms impressed themselves on our imagination before our tenth year, though what part they played in the story is so entirely forgotten that probably it was beyond the childish comprehension. And well might these be so memorable, for the designer was no other than Blake, though then we little knew it. This first edition had, however, an objectionable preface, which we never attempted to read. It is odd that the almost coeval work, the "Swiss Family Robinson," did not find its way to England till many years later. It was written by Joachim Heinrich Kampe, tutor to Baron Humboldt; and one longs to know whether the pupil's spirit of enterprise fired the tutor, or the tutor formed the pupil. The English edition is greatly and advantageously abbreviated. It has been one of the greatest of favorites, until Captain Marryat's nautical criticisms cruelly disclosed its absurdities. To be sure, when one comes to think of it, no one but a German could have thought it practicable to land the whole family in a row of washing-tubs nailed together between planks, and the island did contain peculiar fauna and flora; but the book is an extremely engaging one for all that, and we decidedly would prefer reading it at this moment than the rather characterless "Masterman Ready" by which Marryat superseded it in the youthful library.

But we are anticipating. "The Swiss Robinson" was still in his native German, when Berquin's bright little tales and dramas, terse and rounded as only French powers could make them, were already widely spread. Many were transferred into an English book, pompously termed "The Looking Glass for the Mind." There figured the four sisters who quarrelled and retired, like the four bulls of fable, into the four corners of the room, but, unlike the bulls, made it up in peace, and never fell out again. There was the boy who rudely fumigated his father's tenant when he came to pay his rent, and was punished by being left behind when his sister was taken to the farm, and regaled with rural dainties. There was "the pert little vixen, whose name was Cleopatra," and whose ill-temper was suddenly cured by a visitor's remark, that a pair of mustaches would suit the fierceness of her countenance. There is the kind, bird-feeding girl, said to have been suggested by the example of Madame Helvetius. There, too, is the capital description of the little Caroline, who insisted on taking a country walk in the full fashionable dress of the period, including powdered hair, pea-green shoes with high heels, and the tightest possible of stays. The dramas, which are not translated in the "Looking Glass," but are so in the "Children's Friend," are likewise very pretty. There is a very droll one (lately reproduced among Warne's Victoria stories) of a little boy, whose longing for a sword is gratified on condition he never draws it. In a passion he breaks his promise, and brings to light a turkey's feather. The insolent airs of the young noble, and the cringing of his roturier guest, give us a lucid notion of the pre-Revolution manners.

Berquin's tales were suggestive to the Aikin family of their "Evenings at Home." But the two collections remind us of the French criticism on our national gait, that while a French lady walks easily and gracefully, an Englishwoman always moves as if bent on hurrying somewhere. . . .

The Taylors of Ongar were an offshoot of the Aikin school, but, deserve special mention as the best of the poets for childhood. Of hymn-writers children have had only three really successful ones, — Dr. Watts, at a much earlier period, Jane Taylor, and recently, Mrs. Alexander; and of these Jane Taylor was the least really able. Her sorte lay in her secular poems, their astonishing simplicity without puerility, their pathos, and arch drollery. The incident of the little girl, in "Original Poems," who, seeing a lady in the towering headdress of the period, exclaimed, —

"What naughty tricks, pray, has she done, That they have put that foolscap on!"

was, Mrs. Schimmelpenninck tells us, taken from herself. "Meddlesome Mattie" paying the penalty of a peep into grandmamma's snuff-box; the

"Duck who had got such a habit of stuffing,
That all the day long she was panting and puffing";

the little boy who in his new nankeens, and "buttons bright as gold," fell into the embrace of a chimney-sweeper; the vain child who held herself to be "better than Jenny, my nurse," and is finally told,

"For 't is in good manners, and not in good dress,
That the truest gentility lies";

are all fixed in our mind by the peculiarly lively lilt of the verse. We never enter Cavendish Square without recollecting how "little Ann and her mother were passing one day" in that direction, and the pathos must have been great in the sadder poems, for the only compositions that ever drew tears from us in childhood were "The Lamentation of Poor Puss" and the "Life and Adventures of Poor Dog Tray," both of which we hated accordingly.

Rousseau had, as we said before, set people theorizing on education, and two more of his brood remain to be noticed. All were contemporary, but for the sake of convenience we will mention Madame de Genlis first. The extraordinary vanity of the woman has made her autobiography lower our estimate of her, and scarcely do her justice, for really the governess who trained up Louis Philippe so exactly in the way he did go could have had no common powers. To read of the young prince in the Chevalier de Roseville's correspondence in "Adele et Theodore," and watch the career of the heir of Orleans, is really enough to make one believe that human nature is the wax educational theorists would have us believe it. However, "Adele et Theodore" is not a child's book. It was the "Veillées du Château" on which the authoress set her fame as a writer for children, so that she was firmly persuaded that it was personal animosity that conferred the prize of the Academy by preference upon "Conversations d'Emilie." We confess to agreeing with the Academy so far, that ever since we could appreciate the delicate aroma of French wit and irony, we have infinitely more relished "Emilie" than Madame de Genlis's "Veillées," though a young child would, of course, like story better than mere dialogue. We suppose the book is hardly extant now, except where old juvenile libraries have been tenderly preserved, but it is worth reading for its freshness and grace, and the delicate refined banter with which the mother treats Emilie's little follies. The child's confused way of telling a story is drolly depicted, and so is her self-sufficiency in having learnt the three names, "Animal, vegetable, and mineral." There is a capital dialogue when Emilie comes in from the Tuileries gardens immensely scandalized by a little girl whom she describes as attracting the attention of "tout le monde" by her airs and appreciation of her own nœuds de manches. Tout le monde is reduced by the mother to two little girls and their bonnes, and Emilie's indignation is turned back on her own foibles most dexterously. . . .

Success has certainly been with its rival, the "Veillées du Château." The three children, César, Caroline, and Pulchérie, were portraits of M^{de}. de Genlis's own, the two girls by name; and the giddy but warm-hearted Pulchérie is so engaging that it is disappointing to know that her original was in after life estranged from her mother. According to the fashion that had prevailed ever since the days of Boccaccio, there is story within story. The virtuous mother, Madame de Clémire, retires to spend the time of her husband's absence with her three children and their grandmother in the country, in the dismal Château de Champceery, where the wolves are said by the disconsolate maids to parade on the snow every winter night. Here the children are weaned from the Countess d'Aulnoy's fairy tales, by tales related in turn by their mother and grandmother. Delphine, the spoilt child, who was reformed by a residence in a cow-house, under the treatment of an excellent Swiss doctor, — then really the fashionable cure for consumption; Eglantine, the excellently described indolent young lady, who was cured by losing her fortune; and the humble couple who built a house for themselves in the wood, are all excellent; and best of all is the story Madame de Clémire writes on being challenged to produce authentic wonders equalling those of fairyland. It somewhat reminds us of those school illustrations of natural phenomena where rainbows, waterspouts, volcanoes, earthquakes, geysers, flood and fire, and all possible catastrophes, are represented as occurring on one square foot of paper, but the ingenuity is really wonderful.

Alphonse, the frivolously educated son of a parvenu minister in Portugal, is interesting for his simplicity and wonderful proneness to get into scrapes. His father is first disgraced, and then loses all his property in the great earthquake of Lisbon, when poor Alphonse, by one of Madame de Genlis's touches of irony, perils his life to save the false pedigree in which he devoutly believes, but leaves the jewels to their fate. Wandering subsequently about the country, Alphonse, while sentimentalizing at the fountain of Ilêes de Castro, saves a beautiful young lady from a mad bull, which immediately after is demolished by a poisoned pin stuck into the nape of its neck by the fair Dalinda's father, the wise Thelismar. (The good lady's explanatory notes never mention how to stick your pin into your bull.) Desperate love for Dalinda is the consequence, and finding that Thelismar is a Swede sent to travel on a scientific mission, Alphonse runs away from his father and follows him, in spite of beholding a meteor and of being caught in a bloodlike shower, and then stuck fast by the nails in his boots to a loadstone mountain, for which Madame de Clémire must really have gone to the calendars with one eye. In spite of these slight obstacles he joins Thelismar, and obtains leave to accompany him, but in the mean time the fair daughter has been sent back to Sweden. It is too long to relate how all wonders of nature and art combine to persecute or amaze Alphonse; how he gets nearly murdered in a cave of the Guanches, and is almost drowned by an inundation in the Azores; how the "guide, Indicator, shows him the road" to a bees' nest, and the grotto of Policandro dazzles him with its native sculpture and jewelry; how automatons draw and play to rebuke his conceit, and pistols go off when he tampers with the locks of drawers; how Thelismar repeats Franklin's experiments with lightning, and becomes perfectly intolerable by his cool superiority on all occasions; until at last Alphonse's poor old father is discovered — of all places in the world — at the bottom of the silver mines of Dalecarlia; there is a general forgiveness and a happy ending. It is a very amusing and instructive story, allowing for the century of subsequent discovery, and Policandro still is invested in our imagination with a charm derived therefrom. Madame de Genlis made use of somewhat the same notion in a much less known work, where in, one story the hero's eyes became microscopes, and spiders, flies, moss, &c., appear in distressing detail and proportion, — an idea since repeated in "Good Words for the Young." . . .

But while no one in France could do more than watch aghast the fearful march of public events, the quickened spirit of thought in England was in full activity. Children, as far as common sense would allow, were being brought up on the Rousseau system; R. L. Edgeworth tried it on one of his sons, and found it in its full completeness such a failure that the son was allowed to drop out of sight. Mrs. Schimmelpenninck weathered it by her own strong warm nature; and Thomas Day after capturing two girls, to afford him a choice of a wife, brought up on the most perfect plan of simplicity in habits and cultivation of intellect, found one break down from native dulness, and cast off the other when on the point of marrying her, because she turned out too sophisticated to wear an unfashionable dress.

As we know, Felix Graham tried the same experiment with Mary Snow in our own day, just as Miss Edgeworth had portrayed the like attempt and failure on the part of Clarence Harvey in her novel of "Belinda." Her "Forester," the uncouth original youth in "Moral Tales," is we believe a far truer likeness of Day than the fine gentleman Clarence, only for the sake of the moral Forester had to be tamed, and Day never was. He is best known as the author of "Sandford and Merton," once a child's classic standing next to "Robinson Crusoe," and really containing much that is very charming, though mixed with much queer unsatisfactory stuff of the theorist author. Miss Zornlin has of late years tried to weed it, but it is one of those books that there is no paring down, — they must stand or fall all together; and we doubt if many of the present young generation have ever had enterprise enough to learn how Tommy Merton tried sledging with a kitchen chair and the big dog, — how Harry Sandford piloted him across the heath by the aid of the pole star, and saved him from the violence of a baited bull: another strange trait of past manners. There is another tale of Day's, much less celebrated but very effective, called "Little Jack," where a foundling is nursed by a goat, reared by an old man on a common, becomes first a blacksmith, then a soldier, is cast on a desert coast and taken prisoner by the Tartars, when his genius in saddlery raises him to high favor with the Khan, and he finally comes home a rich man, and builds a house on the original common. Probably Mr. Day meant to inculcate the advantages of the beautiful simplicity of Jack's nurture, but the story was to us a mere charming tissue of enterprise and adventure, and conveyed no lesson of democracy.

Our copy of "Little Jack" was the first in a volume named "The Children's Miscellany," a sort of prevision of an annual, and containing likewise, besides an unreadable history of the world, and "John Gilpin," the story of "Philip Quarl," by Defoe, — a desert island story, in which the cast-away sailor was solaced by a delightful monkey; and a very clever story of a child queen who, being despotic, banishes all insects because a wasp stung her, and then finds she can have neither honey nor silk; and when she is incommoded by the leaves, has them all stripped off and their place supplied by rose-colored gauze.

A general rebellion is caused, and her father returns to the rescue. We remember, too, a "Spoilt Child," who was taught to read an alphabet of spun sugar, and allowed to eat every letter he knew; then cured of cruelty by the dreadful warning of Charles the Ninth's history; and recreated with historical anecdotes of Damon and Pythias, Alcander and Septimius — one of the latter of whom got into trouble by firing a pistol in a robber's cave. But the books of the last century, with their dim type, long s, and united ct, were already scarce in our time; and perhaps the last of the period was a French story, published by subscription in England, (how we used to wonder at the list of names!) called Le Souterrain, where Gabrielle and Angélique, two young ladies whose parents were in trouble in the Revolution, spent seven years in a cavern, and were finally discovered there in a grand tableau, playing on the harp and the clavecin, both dressed in white muslin, and jonchées with rose-leaves. How beautiful we thought it, and how little we concerned ourselves with the salubrity of the Souterrain!

But that age of sentiment and improbability was waning, and with the nineteenth century reason came into the nursery, and with it realism and purpose strong; and before entering on the didactic school we pause.

FOREIGN NOTES.

RECENT French papers announce the arrival in Paris of Mr. Stuart Mill and Mr. Longfellow.

THE Viceroy of Egypt is said to have ordered 1,700 costumes for his theatre of a Paris consumer at the price of $ 80,000.

MR. HEPWORTH DIXON is to deliver a series of lectures before the Philosophical Institution, Newcastle, on "The Great Prairies and the Rocky Mountains."

DOCTOR BÖHM, a celebrated German surgeon, has just performed the operation of separating two female children, five years of age, who were joined together in the same manner as the Siamese twins. The German papers state that the operation was attended with perfect success; but one of the patients seems to have died the same day. The survivor is in good health.

THE Journal de Liege states that M. Rochefort is preparing to shake the dust of Brussels from his feet, the government having advised that ferocious editor to lower the key-note of his journal.

THERÉSA has kept the American tempters at bay. They have sought to lure her with splendid offers from her Tusculum at Asnières; but she means to sing no more. Thérèse aspires to histrionic fame.

THE King of Bavaria lately had Lohengrin performed for his own special behoof. The representation began at ten o'clock in the morning, the theatre was brilliantly illuminated, and the orchestral players had to appear in dress coats and white ties.

SINCE the great impulse given to the manufacture of velocipedes by their universal adoption throughout Europe, innumerable improvements have been patented. We hear from France and Geneva of two startling novelties. A Frenchman, Monsieur Bluin, has adapted to his velocipede a pair of sails, and in a fair wind skims along like a terrestrial nautilus, at a rate exceeding the greatest speed hitherto attained with the ordinary vehicle propelled by the feet; while, at Geneva, an ingenious musical-box maker has actually constructed a "vélocipède à musique."

GARIBALDI's health is reported to be in a very precarious state. A correspondent of a Paris paper, who had been admitted to an interview with the general, writes: "His features appeared contracted, his body appeared emaciated, and he was lying on a sofa suffering horribly from an attack of chronic rheumatism. The ex-dictator, bent like the tower of Pisa, is but a shadow of the past, and with difficulty one recognizes in the trembling and delicate old man the fierce republican of former days." It is, for the sake of Italy, to be earnestly hoped that this report is exaggerated.

MME. ADELINA PATTI was recently announced to appear in the "Figlia del Reggimento," but at the last moment, after the doors were opened and the audience had begun to arrive, notices were posted up that Mme. Patti was suffering from a severe hoarseness, and quite unable to sing. Another opera was therefore substituted. The severe hoarseness which prevented her from appearing at Covent Garden did not in the least disable her from singing before the Prince of Wales and Pasha of Egypt at Marlborough House the same evening, where, indeed, it is said, she never warbled more clearly and enchantingly.

A REALLY curious piece of musical patchwork will be the Grand Requiem now being written at the proposal of Verdi by no less than thirteen composers, as a monument to the memory of Rossini. The performance of this work is not to take more than one hour and a half, thus allowing about seven minutes to each composer. No restriction of key or time is laid on any one of them beyond the obligation of beginning and ending in the initial key. The following are the names of the contributors to this strange work, which is expected to be terminated on the 15th of September: Bazzala, Bazzini, Pedrotti, Cagnoni, Ricci, Nini, Boucheron, Coccia, Gaspari, Platancia, Petrella, Mabella, and Verdi.

SOCIAL SUPERSTITIONS.

Soon we shall have no social superstitions, I suppose. They are destined, no doubt, to disappear with political superstitions and religious superstitions,—or what people are pleased to consider as such,—in the natural course of the abolition of most things. How many have gone in our own time!—or in a time within the experience of men and women still among us, and familiar at least in a reflected light.

The superstitions to which I refer are not very important perhaps, but they mark changes in manners, and changes in manners mark changes in a great many other things. A great number have gone, as I have said. The superstitious observance of the custom of getting drunk after dinner, for instance, is among the disappearances. A great many people still get drunk, it must be confessed; but they usually pay the homage which intoxication owes to sobriety, and deny or conceal the fact. There used to be a superstition among a certain class of fine gentlemen that it was “bad form”—or whatever was the equivalent phrase of the period—to be able to do anything for one’s self, and that a state of utter apathy and indifference to things in general was the surest mark of good breeding. There may be such men about now, but they are very carefully cut, I should think; and a negative condition of mind and body would certainly not in these days be considered a sign of bon ton. There was a superstition once in favor of snuff-taking. Long since the days when a snuff-box was as necessary an appendage to a gentleman as his shoe-buckles, the habit of putting it to use was still general, and it has disappeared only in the present generation. During the rule of snuff, smoking was the exception; and though the latter had many votaries, the “vice” was a secret one,—to be indulged only in out-of-the-way places. A stable or a harness-room was thought quite good enough, and the tap-room at a low tavern most appropriate. When rooms were set apart for the purpose at clubs they were always the worst in the house; and up to so late a period as to be called the other day there was no smoking-room at one of the leading clubs in London. Now, not only are smokers in clubs luxuriously provided, but every house of sufficient size and pretensions—in the country, at any rate—has an apartment available for the weed; and in connection with billiards ladies endure it with a charming docility,—developed in some cases, so scandal declares, into the most practical expression of tolerance. In the old times only the most hardened offenders would venture to smoke in the streets or public places. I need scarcely say how this superstition has been disposed of in these days, when Royal Princes lead the way, and a Royal Duke may be seen on most mornings on Constitution Hill in company with an enormous regalia.

There was a superstition prevalent for many years that a gentleman could not be properly costumed unless half strangled in an enormous stock. This machine was wonderfully and fearfully made, with a slight pretence of elasticity, but intended evidently to keep the head up, and promote an appearance of dignified apoplexy in the wearer,—with the occasional effect of a divergence from appearance into reality. The custom originated through the “most finished gentleman in Europe” not being proud of his neck; and it became so rigorous as to ruin any man who refused to follow it. There is only one known instance of such hardihood, however, and that is in the case of Lord Byron. It is generally supposed that society set its face against the poet because he was supposed to be an immoral man, to ill-treat his wife, and exhibit a vicious tendency in his writings. I believe nothing of the kind. Society at the time made pets of men who were far worse than Byron was even supposed to be, who got on no better with their wives, and who set quite as vicious an example in their lives as Byron was alleged to set in his writings. Society cut Byron because he turned down his collar, and that is the whole fact of the matter. Had he worn a stock he would have been one of themselves, and they would have forgiven him as they did other people.

Stocks are seldom seen now, except in the army, where, in a certain but not sufficiently modified degree, they are still the rule; at the discretion, however, of commanding officers, who may allow them to be dispensed with if they think the relaxation necessary or desirable. Nobody, in fact, wears a stock in these days unless he is obliged to do so, except a few fogies who cling to the superstition as a link to life.

“What do you think of my uncle?” asked a man not long since of his friend, with whom he was walking in Pall Mall. They had just met the gentleman in question.

“Think of him!” was the contemptuous reply; “why, he wears a stock and buckles it behind,—that’s what I think of him.”

You see by this little incident the kind of feeling that stocks excite in the present day.

If there are superstitions among men there are superstitions among women, you may be sure, and among the latter as among the former there have been a great many that are now exploded. As regards dress and deportment there was one connected with the ideal of a lady which seems to have no believers in these times. A lady was supposed to be arrayed in the plainest manner, — to wear robes of the soberest colors and the simplest cut. Anybody who deviated from the rule was supposed not to be a lady; and the French, who set the fashions then as they do now, were far in advance of the English in this respect. That this superstition no longer prevails need scarcely be pointed out. The change in the present direction has been accompanied, too, by some incidental superstitions which have also come to an end, — or very nearly so. One was that ladies in order to attain elegance in skirts must be encased in a steel cage, absurdly — considering the derivation of the word — called a crinoline. Another was founded upon the idea that a lady could not appear out of doors without wearing upon her head a preposterous contrivance, which, had it been discovered in the ruins of Pompeii, or in some such place, without any indication of the use to which it was applied, would have been a mystery to succeeding ages, and remained perhaps a puzzle to antiquarians up to the present time. The thing I mean was called a bonnet.

What a monstrosity it was! It stood alone in creation. Nature never produced anything like it in her wildest and most colonial moods. Art could never have conceived such an object. For the bonnet was like our old friend Topsy, according to that young person's idea of her origin: it was never born of the fancy of any one man or woman, — "I guess it grew." You could not indeed resemble it to anything else. It was not like a coal-scuttle, to which some of its varieties have been flatteringly compared, for it would not stand on its end, if indeed it had an end to stand on; and for similar reasons among others it could not be supposed to be intended for a coffee-pot, a bread-basket, a card-tray, a toast-rack, a mouse-trap, or a warming-pan.

It was certainly not like a hat; for though it contained a place where you could put part of a head, there was nothing to indicate — in the absence of previous information — that such an uncomfortable receptacle was meant for such a use. The coincidence, was altogether insufficient. You may put your head into a bag or a portmanteau, but nobody would guess those useful articles to be head-dresses on that account. The bonnet, in its ultra days at any rate, was as shapeless a monster as the Picuvre, first described by Victor Hugo, and since made familiar to us in collections of aquaria; with bows and flowers for "feelers," turning up in arbitrary and unexpected places. Had we — innocent of it ourselves — found it in use among the Cherokee Indians, we should have fancied it connected with some religious rite, since it would be difficult to suppose that anybody would voluntarily wear such a thing for its own sake. That it is an exploded superstition among civilized nations is a fact for which everybody blessed with eyesight ought to be grateful. The present substitute is called by the same name; but nobody, seeing the two things together, would guess that they were put to the same use. The bonnet of the period is a charming little decorative arrangement, which may be quite useless as far as shelter is concerned, but is scarcely more so than its predecessor, which was ineffectual against sun or rain, and had not the excuse of being ornamental instead.

Another superstition of the past was the corset. I am not quite sure that I shall be allowed to allude to such a subject, but must take my chance. I will be content, however, to observe that the garment, — it can scarcely be called a garment though; what am I to call it? — the article? — the machine? The machine will do. It was a point of faith that this machine was indispensable to the female kind, or at any rate that it ought to be, and it was worn when not wanted as a distinction of the sex.

One need not be the oldest inhabitant of any place to remember these curious contrivances of which wood or steel, and whalebone inevitably, formed such important features. Such things may exist in the present day; but they could never have been necessities; for the interesting wearers of the modified mysteries now in use under the same name do not seem to suffer from the absence of their predecessors. On the contrary, they evidently flourish the more for the change, look a great deal better, and must feel a great deal better if they can feel at all.

Among social observances which may be classed among exploded superstitions, I may include the circulation of wedding-cards and wedding-cake among the friends of married couples. The cake went first, and the cards are fast following. I am not quite sure that the omission in either case is an advantage. People always liked getting the cake, though it is a horrible thing to eat, and the cards certainly answered their intended purpose, — that of marking the feeling towards old acquaintances under new conditions, and influencing them in paying congratulatory visits. Now, under the new arrangement, half the acquaintances of the bride and bridegroom are uncertain whether to call or not; and as they are very apt to give themselves the benefit of the doubt which gives the least trouble they frequently remain upon anomalous terms with the happy pair for an indefinite period, — determined in the end perhaps by an accident.

The superstition which dictates the use of cards in general intercourse is not likely to die out. Society cannot get on without them. But calling — where you actually want to see the people — has been relieved of half its horrors by the practice of appointing certain days for being at home, and adding the attraction of tea, which, whether visitors want that refreshment or not, at least gives them something to do. A great many people would prefer that these rites should be performed after dinner instead of before, and it would be well to allow them the alternative. I dare say we shall come to this some day. Meanwhile many take kindly to what has been called the social treadmill, and grind away for the fun of the thing. It is hard perhaps to have to drop additional cards after having dined at a house, and such visites de digestion are usually paid with the kind of gratitude known as a lively sense of benefits to come.

Among existing superstitions that which necessitates introductions at balls in private houses has a great many heterodox enemies. They are mere matters of form, since the persons introduced are frequently no wiser as to one another's personality than they were before; and the observance has the effect of curbing individual ardor. There is no harm in them; they are often an assistance; but they should not be held necessary, and in a happier state of existence I dare say they will be dispensed with.

Among exploded superstitions upon such occasions may be reckoned speeches after supper. Where there is no regular supper to make speeches after, the evil naturally cures itself; but even where there is, the bore in question is never met with except in offensively old-fashioned society. So much the better, say all sensible people. Speeches after dinner, when the dinner has a business object, of course can't be helped, and come under a different category.

Apropos to dinners I may mention a very old superstition which gave the palm to English dinners over all other dinners in the world. "Foreign kick-shaws," compared with them, were held in contempt as unwholesome abominations. And an English dinner, when well cooked, is no doubt a very fine thing, and better for people leading an active life than, say, a French one, as a continuous arrangement. But it is the old story still, — our dinners come from a sacred, our cooks from a profane source. To cook an English dinner well, a person ought to be capable of cooking a French one. The principles are the same, and the ornate variations, in the latter case, are mere matters of special attainment, easily acquired from prescribed formulæ.

But the popular delusion with the common run of cooks is, that an English dinner, in order to have "no nonsense about it," should be essentially solid, and leave digestibility an open question. Any suggestion of an advance upon these conditions is met by the response that Mary Jane does not profess to understand foreign cookery; and an intimation, if she is disposed to be candid, that she considers "plain English" entitled to the preference in every respect. She can never be made to understand that food prepared in the English fashion is not necessarily crude, comfortless, and injurious. Her main idea is that everything English ought to be substantial, that is to say, heavy; and in pursuance of this I have known her send up such a thing as suet pudding with particular joints. The accompaniment is well known in schools, where it is accepted as part of the discipline of the establishment, — but surely nobody ever ate suet pudding as a free agent! This is perhaps an aggravated instance of infatuation, but it is quite within the compass of common "plain cooks," who minister to the middle classes of society. How the poor fare who are their own cooks is a sad consideration. That they eat at all is a marvel; and it is a still greater marvel, considering the savage character of their meals, that they do not drink twice as much as they do.

The superstition which exalts bad cookery and calls it English is less strong than it was, and among the educated classes is rapidly passing away. But unhappily the greater part of the population are not educated, — even to an appreciation of the commonest comforts, — and are still willing victims to a delusion unknown in any other civilized country.

The popular delusion in the matter of wines, which was endured for more than a hundred years, has a greater chance of being dispelled; and if the mass of the wine-drinking population — so largely increased of late — still cling exclusively to port and sherry, it is surely not for want of other wines being suggested equally to their palates and their pockets. Port is now favored by only two classes of persons, — the few who will pay fabulous sums for the little that can be got of the best kind, and the many who are not yet influenced by the light wine movement, and still incline themselves — from superstitious motives — to any concoction called by the name.

The former need not be converted. Their taste is entitled to the highest respect, and I trust that they will long enjoy the means to gratify it. The latter are being converted by degrees, if we may believe in statistics; for the consumption of port which comes from Portugal has sensibly decreased of late years, and it is not to be supposed that the production of the spurious article can have increased in the face of the increased facilities for obtaining the real one. The wines of all other wine-producing countries are now largely consumed in this country; and the natural conclusion is beyond a doubt, — that the majority of habitual or occasional drinkers of wine do not drink port, while the minority drink it in less proportion than formerly. Sherry has made a firmer stand, and is still considered a necessary wine, whatever be the other wines which find a place in the public favor. There is a competition, too, in the market between sherry and sherry, — that is to say, between sherry as usually prepared for English consumption, and sherry as it is in its natural state; and other Spanish wines which are not sherry, but which have the same character, are also entering the field of opposition. The "natural" wines, as the merchants call them, have a hard fight for it at present; for the mass of wine-drinkers undoubtedly prefer the old fiery mixtures. But there is a demand for the "dry" qualities rapidly spreading, and palates educated to these — dreadfully doctored as they commonly are — will find out in time that they can be better gratified by unadulterated vintages, or vintages which are at least not deprived of their original character. Between Spanish wines as they ought to be and French wines as they are — to say nothing of Italian, Hungarian, and Greek, which are making their way — the time is probably not far distant when the superstition which gave exclusiveness to port and sherry will be known no more.

Port is associated with prejudice; and prejudice of many kinds is breaking down with port. I allude especially to English prejudice — to be classed with superstition — in reference to things continental. There was an old belief that one Englishman was always able to beat three Frenchmen. That delusion must surely have exploded; and I may mention as a matter of personal experience, that I once made the experiment with only two of our lively neighbors, — and signally failed. But the superstitious sense of superiority on the part of our travelling countrymen on the Continent still prevails to a great extent; the principal exception being the members of the gentler sex, who have thrown off their traditional reserve in a remarkable manner, and dash about in out-of-doors diversions with an affability which is a wonder, not to say a scandal, and utterly confutes the stock caricatures which, in Paris especially, still represent the blonde misses of Albion as embodiments of prudish affectation, — wearing green veils and actual bonnets, and regarding the social freedom of France as shocking, quite in the old style. There has, to be sure, been lately opened a rival vein of satire, represented in periodicals like the Vie Parisienne, which gives the English girl in her gushing, hatty, high-heeled aspect, and has just begun to understand the joke about "the period"; but this development is quite recent, — the blonde miss still holds her own in the shop windows, and it will be years before she is accepted in her new character.

I am not quite sure that the English superstition as regards our relations towards our lively neighbors has been dissipated with unmixed advantage, — as far as the gentler sex is concerned. But it must be admitted that, whether through French or other influence, English women — including English girls of course — dress a great deal better than they did, and — except when they make caricatures of themselves — cannot be accused of failing to set off their beauty to the best advantage.

The mention of dress again suggests that an old superstition concerning costume has just exploded. I mean that which made it de rigueur for gentlemen, unless in some kind of uniform, to go to court in the habits as they lived of our forefathers in the middle of the reign of George III. The dress was both uncomfortable and incongruous, and nobody liked it; and the change has at least this advantage, that it enables a man to wear in the presence of his sovereign a dress of the shape to which he is accustomed in common life. But innovation begets innovation, and now we find certain levellers condemning the court dress worn by ladies as a superstition. Why, they ask, cannot ladies go to the drawing-rooms in morning dresses with high bodies? These agitators would, it seems, get rid of the "feathers, blonde-cappets, and diamonds," and all the rest of it, at one fell swoop, on the ground that full dress happening in these days to be rather scanty, ladies who go to drawing-rooms are apt to take cold. The agitators may depend upon it that some stronger reason than this must be discovered before the ladies concerned will join the agitation, even if such a simplification would ever be permitted by the milliners. Il faut souffrir pour être belle is a social decree submitted to more philosophically than is the fate of most legal decrees. And if those who wear court dresses are content to suffer in one way, you may be sure that those who make them will not be content to suffer in another. So the question, I fancy, may be safely left at rest between the two.

Among superstitions which still survive may be mentioned the belief in some apocryphal period known as the "palmy days of the drama." When these days existed, and what they were like, is not easy to determine. For we find no contemporary evidence of their existence; it has never been handed down to us that people have said, "These are the palmy days of the drama; I am content with the condition of the stage." On the contrary, from the earliest times of which we are able to take anything like a near view, the cry has always been that the regular drama was neglected whenever there were counter-attractions in the form of French dancing girls, performing dogs or monkeys, or even such exhibitions as puppet-shows.

Nobody seems ever to have heard of the palmy days of the drama until they had passed away, and then the praises had a suspicious appearance of being rung for the tempora acti in the abstract. Great actors and actresses have lived no doubt before the Agamemnons of our own time, and their Homers have kept their fame alive; but it must be doubted if the drama — that is to say, the regular drama — has had such great days for its own sake as has been made out. The days of which we have the most distinct idea are those comparatively early in the century, when enthusiastic people used to go to the pit door of Drury Lane, and wait from two o'clock in the day to see Mrs. Siddons, or the Kembles, and later still the elder Kean, — buy a bill in the street, and struggle for the attainment of three hours' intellectual ecstasy. One may suppose that the reward was greater than could be gained now by a similar process, — supposing the process to be necessary; but the fact was due to exceptional circumstances; and if the public taste was high, it had not so many invitations as it has in the present day to become low. If there were better actors there were certainly worse, and the same may be said of the pieces which obtained popularity, — the inferior class of which would not be listened to now, as has been proved by occasional experiments. There is a larger public in these times; but even making allowance for the fact, a larger proportionate amount of money is spent upon the drama than used to be spent, dramatic authors make larger profit, and dramatic performers are better paid.

It is true that plays of a low class, and players of a low class, sometimes succeed, as well as plays and players of a higher class, — sometimes better, indeed, when a thorough hit is made. But this has always been the case; and they do not fail because they are of a high class. When such pieces are unsuccessful it is because there is something wrong about them, — because they are cumbersome, dull, and unfitted for the stage. A great deal of false sentiment would once pass for real, and a great many situations which we have discovered to be claptrap were accepted by our forefathers in good faith. On the whole, judging by the number of theatres we have, and the number of pieces that fill them, and the standard of excellence demanded by most of the audiences, it must be a mistake to suppose that the drama has declined or is declining. Therefore the belief in the palmy days, as compared with our own, — which, however, is far weaker than it was, — must be ranked among the superstitions.

An alleged cause of the supposed decline of the drama is the late hour at which most of us dine. It has become later and later in the course of the last few years, and we seem rapidly arriving at the fashionable point said to have been attained by a late American president, who was such a great man that he never took his dinner until the next day! But it is made later, and worse than later because less certain, by a superstitious custom which prevails of the host fixing one time and the guests assembling at another. The inconvenience was pointed out the other day in a morning journal, and it is one which decidedly demands reform. Everybody understands that a little grace is allowed beyond the quarter past seven, quarter to eight, or eight, set down in the invitation; but nobody knows exactly how much, unless well acquainted with the custom of the particular house. And as few choose to incur the embarrassment of being too early, a great many run the hazard of being too late.

The consequence is an amount of confusion and annoyance which is felt equally by host and guest. There is only one way of destroying this monstrous delusion, and saving the enormous amount of time and temper which it wastes in the course of the year; that is, to issue invitations for the exact hour at which the party is expected to be assembled, with a special provision as to punctuality until the rule becomes generally understood.

While on the subject of dinners, I may mention a custom which is surely founded upon superstition, and ought to be banished forever from civilized society, — the only society in which it prevails. Why should we be obliged to perform the not very difficult operation of dividing our food into morsels fitted for the mouth with a weapon so formidable and effective that we could employ it with the greatest ease to cut the throat of our next neighbor from ear to ear? Had we to kill the meat in the first instance one could understand the propriety of being so armed; for the sake of carving joints that bore and birds that bewilder, such an instrument is appropriate enough. But why place it in the hands of persons who have only their own mouths to accommodate? It is enough to embarrass a nervous man, and how that very uncomfortable person, "the most delicate lady," manages to survive the responsibility is one of those marvels which can be accounted for only by custom founded on the grossest superstition. The anomaly exists but in association with European manners. The natives of the East, and semi-civilized people elsewhere, would not dream of such an enormity. I do not insist, of course, that people ought to eat with their fingers; and chopsticks are naturally unfitted for dividing a steak. But when knives are wanted,—and they are not wanted, nor used, for many dishes,—why should we be made to use a murderous weapon? One can fancy them fitted for the days of old, when knights carved at the meal in gloves of steel and drank the red wine through the helmet barred; but in those times people used their own knives at the table, and employed them, upon occasion, in casual combats. Such is not now the custom, though there are instances of the proceeding on the part of violent persons even when engaged at the meal itself; and the temptation is one which should not be thrown in the way of men of ungovernable tempers, exasperated, it may be, by the bad dinner of humble life. But these enormous knives are given us advisedly, and so careful is custom in measuring the supposed necessities of the case, that for the lighter descriptions of food smaller knives are given, so that you are supposed to calculate the amount of force required at every course, and always employ it accordingly. It is always a comfort to get to a little knife after a large one,—it is like the sense of peace and security that comes after a fray,—and no knife need be larger than the silver one put on for dessert, if indeed it need be so large; and I need scarcely add that forks might be modified in proportion.

There are a few superstitions in connection with our language which may be pointed out in this place. There have been a great many in most times; but some have disappeared while others have arisen, and there are not many now remaining. Among them I will note only some peculiarities in pronunciation. We still call Derby Darby and Berkeley Barkeley, Pall Mall Pell Mell, not to add other instances. Contractions, too, are not unfrequent. Thus we cannot ask if the Marquis of Cholmondeley is at home, giving the syllables their legitimate sound, without running the risk of being told by a facetious servant that he will refer us to some of his peopole. If we ask for the Marquis of Chumley we shall be treated at least with respect. Again, we must not say Leveson Gower, but Leuson Gore, unless we wish to be supposed out of the pale of society; and Mr. Majoribanks would consider us a Goth if we called him anything but Marchbanks. These are only some of the cases that might be cited. Are they not founded upon superstition?

There are other superstitious observances in social life to which I might refer; but I dare say I have cited illustrations enough, and the rest may suggest themselves to your mind without my assistance.

MOSCO'S AUTOMATON.

I HAVE got a hard and heavy head; it's like wood. I don't think I ever think; and don't know as I ever did, except about nothing; and I often set doing that for hours at a time.

"You blockhead!" father hē ses to me (which is a shipwright), "you're only fit to cut up into a figure-head, you great, hungry, hulking, wooden-headed lubber you"; for he had put me to lots of trades, and it was no use; everybody said I had no head-piece,—no, not for going errands, nor giving away handbills even. It's no good dunning things into my head, for the only thing I ever could remember is meal-times. Nothing I eat hurts me, and nothing don't seem to do me any good. Nothing makes me laugh nor puts me out of temper. The only thing ever I see makes me feel like laughing is meals, and then I've got something better to do; and the only thing makes me feel like getting out of temper is getting out of bed of mornings to chop wood; but when you are out of bed, you may as well chop wood as do anything else, for aught I know. The snail gets to his bed as quick as the swallow, and don't get near so tired.

Well, there was a conjurer chap came into our town,—a brisk lively sort of chap that could talk like a pump, in a regular stream. He see me loafing about, and give me an order to see his show, providing I would go up on the platform to hold some things for him. I went up, and did what he told me. It seemed to amuse the people very much, for they laughed themselves nearly into fits, and said: "Did ever you see a man keep his countenance like him?" and, "It's just as if he was cut out of wood." Now, unless a man sees something to laugh at, he has got no call to laugh,—and that's why I did n't.

After it was over, the conjurer chap come to me, and ses: "I never see your living equal. You must be used to the public, not to mind them any more than as if you was a stone idol?"

"I never see the public before," I ses.

"You did n't?" ses he.

"No," I ses.

"Well, look here," he goes on, "I don't mind standing you half a crown if you'll tell me what you was a-thinking of when the public was screaming with laughing at you."

"Victuals," I makes answer.

"Come and have some along with me," he replies, "for I think I can put you in the way of getting them regular."

So I did.

Next day, he goes to see my father.

"Your son has a wonderful talent, sir."

"Hang his talent," ses my father: "it's a pity he can't use it on any other tool than a knife and fork!"

"A natural gift, sir, for not laughing at anything, such as I never see before out of the reserved seats. The question is, could he be depended upon always to keep his countenance as he did last night?"

"I never see him smile in my life," father makes reply, "nor get angered, nor put out; in fact, I never see him take notice of anything. There's no mistake he can keep his countenance, which is a good deal more than his countenance 'll ever do for him."

"I don't know so much about that," the conjurer ses, "for I'm open to give him two pound a week and his board, if he'll sign articles with me for twelve months."

"And what is he to do?" ses my father.

"Nothing, — except to be looked at, and that won't hurt him, I suppose?"

"Well," father ses to me, "is it a bargain?"

"I don't care," I ses. So I joined the show.

The public is an obstinate lot, for when you laugh, they won't; but if you set your face against laughing, or if you've got no call to laugh, through not seeing anything to laugh at, they will laugh like mad, — leastways, so I've found it.

Signor Mosco was the conjurer's name, or, at any rate, the one he went by in public. He was called a pretty good hand, but I could n't see much in what he did. I knew where the bullets went to when he made believe to ram them into a pistol with a barrel like an ear-trumpet. I stuffed the gold watches in the half-quartern loaves, and ironed out the ladies' and gentlemen's pocket-handkerchiefs, while he was pretending to burn them. It's surprising what little things amuse the public. I used to tell 'em so, when Signor Mosco had done one of his best tricks, but they only grinned, and said, "Lord, how he does keep his countenance!" and, "What a nerve he must have to be sure!" There was the hat-trick. The tins, and the feathers, and things look a good deal when they are all thrown about, but they took up no room scarcely when I'd put 'em together, ready for use. And as to rolling two rabbits into one, what was there to surprise me, knowing all along very well what was become of the second rabbit, when I should n't have took on very much even if he had rolled 'em into one, except it was at dinner-time. There was the decapitated head and the basket-trick, and the magic flowers, and the woman setting on nothing, which was called Mecca. Well, I see the looking-glasses and the false bottoms, let alone the legs of the decapitated head; and, consequently, I could n't see anything in any of it.

There was only one part of the entire performance that ever I could see anything in, and that was, as the bills put it: "The Marvellous Mechanical Man or Wooden Automaton, on whose construction no less than twenty-five years have been expended, to bring it to its present perfection as the greatest wonder of the age."

I will tell you about it.

First of all, there was a large box, or pedestal, for the figure to stand on, and containing the works which was carried off the stage, and into the centre of the reserved seats. It had a winch, to turn with a handle like a bed-post key, to wind up the man, and when wound up made a noise like an engine getting up steam, which was the works running down. Then the man was brought down off the stage, carried upright by four strong fellows. His feet were fastened to a round wooden stand like children's soldiers stand on, in which was a worm for the great screw on the top of the pedestal. When brought down, he was hoisted up on the pedestal, and turned round and round until screwed on. There were a great many tubes, and wires, and levers connecting the figure with the box, and sticking out round it, which looked very curious, and, besides, showed the working parts. But a worse finished man no one ever see at a tobacconist's shop-door, which made it the more singular his doing what he did. About his neck and the back of his head the paint was wore off, showing the bare wood; and the same with the point of his nose, which was splintered; and likewise his hands, which were glued and cracked. Signor Mosco used to explain this had occurred in packing, and that he would repair the injuries. But it seemed as if it always did occur in packing, for the injuries never were repaired. Then, as to his complexion, it would have been a disgrace to any house-painter. It was red and whitewash, varnished, and done so badly, that it looked as if you could see the grain of the wood through the paint. I've often asked Signor Mosco why he did n't paint his automaton better, but he only grinned, and said, "How precious green you are, ain't you?"

Everybody who see the man used to say: "How stupid of Signor Mosco, after making such a clever figure, not to have spent a pound or two in finishing it properly, instead of leaving it such a clumsy wooden scarecrow."

The newspapers, too, used to speak most disrespectful of the man; like this which I've cut out:—

"Signor Mosco revisited our town with his interesting exhibition last week. His remarkably skilful feats of pretidigitation were the admiration of large and fashionable audiences. To the other attractions of his entertainment, the professor of the quick-fingered art has now added what he is pleased to term The Marvellous Mechanical Man. The performances of this automaton are particularly clever, but it belies its name. It might with more correctness be termed a figure, for it is so roughly constructed as to bear no more resemblance to humanity than the effigies which are carried through our streets on the 5th November. We cannot help thinking that if Signor Mosco would devote a little more pains to the finish of his wooden effigy, and to concealing some of the cords and levers by which the life-like motions are too obviously conveyed to the limbs, the illusion would be rendered more complete."

So far from being angry at reading such notices, Signor Mosco always used to chuckle and slap me on the back, and want to know why I did n't laugh too. I ses, very naturally: "Because I don't see anything to laugh at." "Well," says he, "you are a cure, you are, and the biggest I ever see."

But that figure only got worse, and more shabby and rickety, the more that was said about it, until at last, whenever the men used to carry the automaton to his pedestal, one of its arms would drop off. The professor always said it was an unforeseen accident, and apologized for it. But it was an unforeseen accident that used regularly to occur every evening, and get apologized for. And what was another singular thing, the worse the figure was, and the more rickety he got, the more clever people thought his performance was.

Well, when the Mechanical Man was screwed down on the pedestal for his performance, Signor Mosco would commence with a short lecture on the powers of the lever, the screw, the pulley, and the spiral spring. He would then go and wind up the machine, with the handle like a bed-wrench. It made a great clatter, and took a long while to wind, owing to the power of the spring. When he had done, the whole concern began to go "Cr-r-r-r-r," and kept on going so all the time, whilst the people could see the works going round through one side of the pedestal, which was of glass. The professor would then strike sharply with his wand, and pull a cord that worked the levers of the automaton's head. "Wake, Francisco!" ses he; and Francisco, which was the wooden figure, begins to move his head, very slow, first from right to left, then from left to right. Then Signor Mosco pulls another string, and Francisco opens his eyes, very gradually, or quick, according as the string is pulled. Then it would be: "Raise the right arm, and salute the company"; which the figure would do, rather stiff and jerky, but still he did it. That stiffness and jerkiness of the movements (and they were all like that) was what people seemed disposed to grumble at. "We want to see 'em a little more airy and graceful," the public see. "Ladies and gentlemen," sees the Signor, "what can you expect from machinery?" — which was very true. "But to show you the command I have over the automaton when at a distance from it, I will now return to the stage, after simply pressing a spring in the figure's back, and, sitting before the index-board connected with the figure, I will enable you to put its abilities to the test."

He sat at a small table in front of the stage, where there was a board like a draught-board, but covered all over with knobs. People were then to question the automaton. The figure did numbers and counting, by slowly jerking up its right hand as many times as was wanted. "Yes" and "No" he did with his head, by bending it for "Yes" and shaking it for "No," and this way he would tell fortunes and ages quite equal to a learned pig or an educated pony. Indeed, there was no end to the questions he could answer, and they were very often right, which was a wonder for machinery. Francisco used to finish up by whirling his arms round like the wooden sailors do on weather-cocks, and he would keep on till the professor touched a button and stopped the works, when his arms would remain sticking straight up, until a string was pulled to let them down, and even then they would still keep on swinging backwards and forwards for a bit. There were some people wanted the automaton to do more, but the Signor said it could n't be done, not by machinery.

In due time, as we went round the provinces, we come back again to the town where my father lived. I was against going there at all. I told Signor Mosco so; and I did n't want him to show the Mechanical Man there, as I told him they were n't good judges of machinery in that place. But he would n't listen, and so the automaton was done there the first night. We had got about half-way through his performance, and the professor had gone on to the stage, whilst Francisco was answering questions. There is mostly a crowd of people round the figure at such times, but to-night there was a wiry old man pressing his way close up to the wooden effigy, and looking into its eyes.

"Now, sir, will you keep your hands off that figure, if you please, — do you hear me?" Signor Mosco sees.

"Mother!" the old man bawls out to his wife, taking no notice, — only laughing fit to split, — "mother! come here, I tell ye, — I'm blowed if they have n't been and made a figure-head of our Bill!"

I could n't see anything to laugh at, for it was two pound a week and victuals out of my pocket, let alone the exposure.

THE QUESTIONING OF PADDY MUL- LOWNEY'S GHOST.

THE following is a literal narrative, the names of some of the actors being modified, every incident in which occurred precisely as we relate.

In a certain flat county of Ireland, between a hill renowned in the Ossianic lays, and the pretty village of Rathangan, stands the hill of Dunganstown, an oblong ridge of limestone about a mile and a half long, and three hundred feet in height. From the top a charming view is obtained over a vast extent of arable land, once occupied by forest, marsh, and meadow, and hunted over by Fionn MacCumhaill and his warriors, or at least by chiefs of the era in which they are supposed to have lived. From the Grand Canal, distant about a mile, extends a "togher," or causeway, to within a short distance of the hill, and proves of great service to cow-herds and carriers of turf and other country produce. On one side of this togher extends a reclaimed bog, intersected in sundry places by drains never deficient of water in rainy weather, and this causeway and bog form the scene on which our bizarre drama was enacted. Our authority, now, a business-loving Dublin merchant, assisted at the exhibition which was well calculated to make a lively impression on an intelligent and inquisitive youth of eleven years of age, still in blessed ignorance of bulls, bears, stags, and other monsters, which infest the forest where men of stock take their forenoon exercise.

Mike Donegan was a boy in the service of a farmer in the neighborhood, and every evening was in the habit of driving his charge, when milking was ended, to the reclaimed flat we have mentioned. It was enclosed by the "togher" on one side, and a field of rape on the other. Mike was a smooth, easy-going youth, of few words, and as little likely to "set the Liffey or any greater river on fire" as any boy in Leinster.

One evening, while on returning home after having driven his cattle to their pasture, he met with an acquaintance, the servant-boy of a neighboring farmer, and addressed him in words to this effect: "Faith, a strange thing happened to me just now. Just as I was driving the cows into the pasture a big white cat jumped out of the rape-field and ran towards me. It was mighty playful at first, and miaowed at me, and rubbed the head again my legs, and purred, the way they do when they do be pleased. After a while he stopped this, and began to walk round me, and growl, and the eyes of him sometimes were like two coals of fire, and other times like the green spots in a paycock's feather. Faith myself got frightened, and at last I let a screech out of me, for he looked as big as a dog, and if he flew at my throat with them claws and teeth of his, I had no way to save my life. Well, what would you have of it? the next minute there was n't a sign of him to be seen; but I made no flays in the place you may depend. You must bring the mastiff dog with you to-morrow evening when I'm dhruvin' out the cattle; that's the boy for to match any cat in Ireland."

Next evening the neighbor came, bringing the dog, and accompanied by a few curious village folk, who had heard the story in the course of the day. When they reached the spot indicated, Mike, pointing in an agitated manner to the fence of the rape-field, cried out, "There he is, there he is! Why don't you set the dog at him? Ow, ow, here he comes!" "Hie, cat! hie, cat!" cried the assistants, getting rather terrified by the boy's apparent fright, and his cries. The dog barked and jumped about in great excitement, but it was evident that he neither saw cat nor rat in any direction. "O, don't yous all see him sittin' there on the edge of the gripe? He turned back when Thigeeen began to bark, but he 's now lookin' at me, and growlin' like vengeance." The standers-by began to be more frightened at the cat they did not see than Mike at the cat he did see; and off they drew without more delay. That evening and the next day the story had travelled a mile or two in every direction, and the following evening, at the same hour, a hundred people, at least, including our authority, were on the spot.

Mike's attention was again painfully arrested by the cat, to the terror of some and the derision of a few. It changed its position several times, and Mike's features were expressive of great trouble, blended with awe. After this state of things had continued for a while some one proposed to send for the schoolmaster, whose house stood by the side of a neighboring by-road. A deputation waited on him, but on learning their business he scoffed at the thing altogether, said that ghosts or spirits were out of place in the nineteenth century, that he was tired, and that it was too late, and that he would be on the spot next evening, and make a hare of Mike or the ghost, whichever deserved it.

At the usual hour of the cow's visit to the pasture on next evening, our informant was one among a thousand spectators at least. While waiting for the young ghost-seer they formed knots and indulged in various surmises. Some were of opinion that it was what has since been poetically termed a sell, while a young man, who had made the Pantheon his study, and had got a glimpse of the Metempsychosis, conjectured that some evil liver of past days was now obliged to do penance in the shape of the cat, and hinted at the expediency of giving the animal a wide berth. The schoolmaster arriving, and finding a good deal of desultory chat going on, mixed with some laughter (for a little factitious courage is always generated in a crowd), raised his voice, and requested decorum to be observed. "If there is any truth in the boy's story," said he, "the spirit must be either a good or evil one, and in either case levity should not prevail. O, here is the spirit-seer!"

The cows were seen approaching, and the young herd, feeling himself the observed of the multitude, slowly advanced, assuming whatever gravity he could in face and movement. When he came opposite the locality of the former apparition, he cried out, in real or assumed fright, "The cat, the cat!" All became hushed and attentive; then, following with his eyes the supposed movements of the apparition towards a little hillock occupied by some women and children, he cried, "Take care! he is going that way!" There was a general scamper among the little group, mixed with some cries and ejaculations, and the operation was repeated a couple of times more with other groups. This caused some general annoyance, and one discontented individual called out, "Now is your time, master, if you have anything to say to Mike or the ghost. You know you boasted last night there was no such thing as ghosts. Let us see what you're good for."

"Well," said he, "one thing or the other must be taking place, — a spirit is present in the shape of a cat, or the child is making fun of us all. I do not believe in these apparitions; but if any one of you that has more faith or more folly than myself directs the boy to order the thing, in the name of the Holy Trinity, to appear in its own shape, and reveal what is troubling it, you'll see or hear something out of the common if the boy is not humbugging you all. Mind, I don't believe a word of his story."

A voice was now heard from the fore ranks. "Well, then, I believe in ghosts, but am not a bit afraid of any mother's son of 'em. Mike, my boy, do as the masher says, and I'll be your bail for any harm that can happen you."

Here the mother of the boy rushed at him out of the crowd. "Mick, my darling," said she, "take care what you do! Maybe when you spake them words it's tare you limb from limb he'll do." "I'm not a bit afeard, mother. I said my prayers comin' along, and do you think the wickedst spirit in the world could have any power over a Christian that wasn't in mortal sin, and was after blessin' himself?"*

"That's my brave little boy," said the gratified mother, hugging and kissing him. "May the holy angels be about you this night."

"Well," said the schoolmaster, "if you must go through with the ceremony, form a semicircle; let the child go to the front, and then every one kneel down and pray for God's protection. It was done, and then the stout fellow began. "I command you in the name, &c. — to, to, to — co, co, co." — "Master, something is sticking in my throat; will you say the rest, if you please?" "Well, this is too bad," said the schoolmaster; "but not to disappoint us all, begin again, child." "I command you, &c., &c., to leave that form, to take your own that you had when alive, and answer me such questions as I shall solemnly ask you." A pause.

"Well, Mike, is the cat there still?" "No; don't you see the smoke?" Here there was a getting up off knees, and a few charges over the togher. "Keep still," said the schoolmaster. "While you stay on your knees, and arm yourself with the sign of the cross, the devil himself and all his imps won't have power to touch a hair of your head. What now, boy?" "A face coming like the moon out of the smoke, a three-cocked hat on his head, a long waistcoat, a square gray coat, knee breeches, blue stocking, brogues."† All these came from Mike one after another, his eyes wide open and his teeth chattering. There was no small consternation among the people. The boy now began to move forward beyond the more advanced line of the congregation, and all eyes were anxiously following his movements. One of the nearest to him said "Where are you going, Mike?" "Ach! he's beckonin' me farther." "Have a care. Maybe he wants to get you into his power." "O, never fear! I'm a little in dread, but God won't let him harm me. What had I better ask him first?"

To repeat the babel of directions given to Mike would be neither agreeable nor interesting. Mike proposed the first question with the adjuration, alluded to before it, and then seemed to listen attentively; and all bent forward, silent as the dead, to catch the answer. But if an answer came, no one heard it but the boy. After he had waited for a while he turned round, and requested to be told what he should ask next. "Let him answer the first question before you go to a second." "Did n't yous all hear what he said?" "We heard nothing but your voice asking him." "O, I see, no one can hear him but myself. Well, the answer he gave was that his name was Paddy Mullooney, and that when he was alive he lived in these parts." Then issued a volley of observations and ejaculations. "Tshu, tshu! Well, to be sure! See there now! That flogs! I wish we could hear himself! It's all a piece of gother. Whisht, whisht! no use to be too hard of believing." This portion of the narrative would occupy too much space if given in detail with all the interjections, cross-questions, interruptions, &c. So we confine ourselves to the statements made by Mike the interpreter.

"He says that his name was Pat Mullooney; that he lived in these parts; that he was twenty-two years old when he died; that it is twenty-two years since; that he is all that time wandering about Lord Drogheda's demesne along the banks of the canal, and in the demesne of Oldcourt; that he feels the cold as if he was alive; that what he suffers is what is called a 'cold purgatory'; that it's all because he owed Mr. Jonathan Payne of Oldcourt eight pounds when he was dying; that ghosts cannot reveal their grievances but to those fitted by grace to receive them," &c.

What with adjurations, the proposing of frivolous questions, and other interruptions, the night was far advanced by the time this information was completed, and an adjournment was resolved on.

A deputation waited on Jonathan Payne, Esq., next day, and the awful disclosures made, but they only added to a peck of ill-humor he was nursing at the moment of the visit. "How, in the name of Pluto!" (he worded the expression differently) "could he tell whether any thief of the name of Mullooney worked for him or robbed him twenty-two years ago? He was probably a rascally boatman that cheated him, maybe, more than that. His books were in Dublin, and he'd see Mullooney farther off than purgatory, hot or cold, before he'd take the trouble of going so far, or investigating such a cock-and-bull story." He looked at the poor men as he said this with an expression that said as plainly as possible, "I'd see yourselves along with Mullooney in that farther region before I'd take any trouble." Just as they were taking leave he condescended to add, "If Mullooney or any of his friends sends me the money I'll take it. I'm pretty sure he or some other knave made me the worse by that sum and a great deal more."

They returned and acquainted the schoolmaster with the unsatisfactory result. "I am sure," said a man who had taken most offence at Mr. Payne's manner, "that we are imposed on. Would any soul be kept in punishment for owing such a trifle to a cursing ould thief that does not know what to do with the tithe of the money he has?" "Ah," said the schoolmaster, "but maybe he stole it." "And sure it's not to purgatory he'd be sent for that." "But do you recollect what happened to the penitent thief?" said the master. "Well, well! the more I think on this thing the more I'm puzzled. That boy can't be deceiving us, I'm sure. No one of his age could be so deep as to invent all that he has put out of him. We were great ganders for not asking the ghost the most important things to be known. Like Jack in the story, we'll be wiser next time."

The fatal hour coming round again and the crowd—considerably augmented since last night—having taken their station on and near the togher, Mike stood at some distance in front, and announced that the spirit was again visible, being forever freed by the adjuration of the previous evening from the appearance of the cat. In the various answers he redelivered he could not have received any assistance owing to his isolated position, yet he showed wonderful discretion. When he was obliged to ask frivolous or hazardous questions, the ghost, according to him, frowned or remained silent. This evening the following information was elicited. He was a native of Monasterevan; his father and mother and brothers and sisters were dead; one relative, M'Ardle by name, lived at 22 High Street, Dublin, but was unable to assist him; he had been a boatman, and had met his death in his boat at Salins (while sleeping) from the effect of choke-damp; his corpse lay in the churchyard of Clane; the number of his boat was 22.

The frequent recurrence of this number set the thinkers to work, but they could not agree whether it betokened deception or the reverse, and the perquisition continued. "Where were you waked?" "I was not waked at all." This reply seemed strange, and the question was repeated. Same answer. "Why were you not waked?" "They were troubled times." This answer electrified the assembly. Twenty-two years before, the rebellion of 1798 was raging. How could the child be up to that piece of chronological information? Very few doubted of his sincerity after this point in the scrutiny. "What day in the week were you smothered?" "Sunday. It was a just punishment for working on the Lord's day; but the owner of the boat was more in fault than me. He is not far from his end, let him look to it."

This stroke went home also. There was a secret agitation at the time to put an end to Sunday business on the canal. Very many in the crowd would have applauded the ghost if they only knew how to set about it.

Next arose the question of raising the supplies. Some proposed that Mr. Payne should be appealed to for forgiveness; but one of the deputation so feelingly described the reception of the embassy that the proposition fell unseconded, and the demand was formally made of the ghost, "how was the money to be raised?" The answer came, "Mr. Phil Gilchrist, of Glounthann, must advance it." Here there arose shouts of merriment, for every one in the crowd was well aware of Mr. Gilchrist's weak points.

Query. "Why is Mr. G. to advance this money?" Answer. "He is a very close man. He deals too hard with the poor people that have *conacre with him. He makes his turf-cutters work from sunrise to sunset in summer. He grinds the faces of the poor that owe him money. His end is not far off, and he must strive to make some reparation before death calls on him." "I'm sure," cried Phil, "the ghost never said that. Anyway, I must get time to consider." "An', faith," uttered a voice in the crowd, "that's the very thing yourself never gave anybody." There was a general explosion of laughter at this home touch, still, without any misgiving in regard to the supernatural presence. Most of the crowd had firm faith in its being there; but, as in other concesses of life, two nights' familiarity had much diminished the awe felt at first.

* A farmer sets a large field to several poor people, each of whom gets his portion ploughed, and manured, and sown with potatoes, and pays the patron so much for his half or quarter acre, or whatever it may be, before he is allowed to remove his crop. This is conacre.

Phil's voice was heard as soon as opportunity was given, announcing, in a very sulky tone, that he, Phil Giichrist, was ready to advance the money if the ghost of Mullowney would make itself visible to him. Mike having consulted the spirit, beckoned the speaker to come forward to the little hillock on which he himself was standing and have his desire gratified.

The poor victim advanced very leisurely. His terror was not small, but it was mastered by his desire to save his darling guineas. Just as he reached the spot and was being led a little onward by the young adept, and becoming conscious of the frightful disorder of his ideas and sensations, a loud squib was let off among the people (whether by design or not our authority could never ascertain), and completed the unsettling of the poor man's nerves. He shouted out, "O, anything but that! I'll give the money." And without waiting for an interview with the ghost he darted back, preferring the jeering and the noisy reception of the crowd to the unknown terrors on the other side.

Here Paul Downey, the schoolmaster, was obliged to exert his authority to restore order. He particularly addressed himself to a man whose name was Darby Duncan, a bruiser, a sheebeen-house keeper, and the owner of a boat or two. He had felt himself aggrieved by the ghost's denouncing of Sunday work on the canal, and seemed zealous to promote a riot among the spectators. Darby, however was a man of moral as well as physical courage, and boldly turned on the village oracle. "Mr. Downey," said he, "you are a cunning fellow, but you won't put your finger in my eye. This is a plan contrived to stir up ill-feelings against persons of any property or standing in the place, and I'll uphold you as the head contriver if the ghost does not make his appearance to myself face to face." "O Mr. Duncan, you need not turn on me. I'm neither art nor part in the matter. I am only striving to ascertain whether the little boy is an impostor or not, and I am very glad of your offer. It will make a cat or a dog of the affair, and speaks well for your resolution. There are very few who would voluntarily seek communication with spirits, for who knows what power they may get over a person to harm him here and hereafter?"

If Mr. Downey was striving by false praise to work on Darby's fears, he did not succeed. "Come, Mike, my boy," said he, "if you are not circumventing us to please the master, let us see the spirit." "Well, Mr. Duncan, come forward a bit. You must put back the people. He says he does not like their breaths. He is moving off into the water, and we must follow him, he is beckoning." Here the urchin paused for a little. "He bids you come a little farther, and he will show himself to you in case you pay the eight pounds." "O, indeed I will, and I am sure to get some help from the neighbors. Mr. Gilchrist, won't you stand to me, and you, Mr. Downey?" "O, we will, we will."

On the side of the hillock farthest from the togher a portion of the flat meadow was at this time flooded by water as deep as three feet in some parts. Into this pool was poor Darby obliged to wade till the water reached his knees. Worse still, at the direction of the ghost conveyed through Mike, he was obliged to kneel down, and there wait, with the water up to his arm-pits, till it was the ghost's convenience to reveal himself. "Speak to him, Mike," said the poor man, feeling his condition verging on the intolerable. Thus exhorted, the youth began his adjuration. "In the name, &c., I command you, ghost of Paddy Mullowney, to show yourself as I see you, to Mr. Darby Duncan, of the Lock public-house." A pause. "Do you see him, Mr. Duncan?" "Indeed, and I don't, not a shine of him." At this point of the drama there was not a sound from voice or movement in the crowd. All hung on the countenances and voices of Mike and Darby. After a painful pause the interpreter proceeded. "In the name, &c., I command you, ghost of, &c., to reveal why you don't appear to," &c. Another pause. "He says he can't appear to you." Confusion. Order being restored, and the ingenious youth requested to demand the reason, the reply came in proper time. "He says that when he strove to appear the weight of sin on your conscience put it out of his power." Disturbance, cries, shouts, and laughter. "Faith," said the stout bruiser, getting up, and coming forward with the water pouring down from his clothes "I believe Paddy Mullowney's ghost is not far wrong. Let any one else take my place that likes."

Incredulity and discontent were fast stealing on the crowd, and schools of discussion were forming, when one of the practical division of the mass cried out, "Be the laws, I'll call on Father Stokes, and bring him here to-morrow night, and we'll see how the ghost behaves to him." "I'd be glad," said a sage, who had come a distance of four or five miles, "to hear from the spirit whether he'll think well to appear to the priest or not." "Put that question to the ghost," said one of the people in front. . . . "He says he won't answer it till the priest is kneeling in the water before him like Darby. He can't bear the smell of any one that's in sin, and Father Stokes is too apt to be meddling with things that don't concern him."*

Here an unlucky Protestant, the only one in the crowd, indeed, jocularly remarked that the ghost must be of the Established Church, he showed so little respect to the clergy. However, he made more haste than good speed, for it was immediately objected to him that the poor spirit's grievance arose from the existence of a purgatory. The controversy, ending in the utter discomfiture of the man without a friend, now assumed such an irreverent shape that we are obliged to omit the particulars.

The mention of the priest's visit introduced much uncertainty into the after proceedings, and the crowd separated without any distinct understanding about meeting or not meeting next evening. There was a gathering, indeed, but it was a poor affair compared with the late ones. Father Stokes made his appearance, and Mike was seen uneasily moving from point to point, unsuccessfully (as it seemed) looking out for the ghost. The priest called Mike and his father before him, but not being satisfied with their answers, he directed both to come to his house next morning. Among the absentees were the schoolmaster, and divers worthies known or suspected to belong to the illuminati of the neighborhood. Father Stokes did not say much on that occasion. He requested the few that were present to go about their business, and be more on their guard for the future against hoaxing reports. He had an interview with Mike and his father next day, but as neither he nor they could ever after be induced to allude to it, the conference was probably confined to the confessional. Mike assumed a pedler's pack when strength permitted, but found the occupation below a youth of his genius. Mr. Downey emigrated in time to Canada, and his ghostly pupil was obliged to emigrate to Australia, both departures being probably for the good of their country.

* This, translated from ghostly to human speech, meant that the good priest interfered with the movements of the secret society of the neighborhood more than was agreeable to its ruling members.

We have before us the circumstantial account of this transaction, written in choice English by our friend the Dublin Citizen.

We would have much preferred to give the narrative in his own racy and energetic sentences, but needful economy of space interfered. He acknowledges his inability to account for the young rascal's self-possession, and judgment, and discretion, unless by allowing him a remarkable degree of precocious talent, and supposing a strict tutoring on the school-master's part. The question still remains — how was he provided so well for contingencies, when he was out of earshot of promptings by the secret members scattered through the crowd?

The objects of the original contrivers seem to have been to obtain the money which certainly would not have found its way into the strong-box of Jonathan Payne, Esq., to expose the priest, and Gilchrist, and Duncan, to contempt, and — what were really desirable things — to confine turf-cutting operations to twelve hours in the day, and to put a stop absolutely to Sunday labor on the canal. The public excitement caused by the imposture aided in a considerable degree to effect both reforms.

IN Mr. Charles C. Coffin we have a traveller after the latest and best transatlantic pattern. He has thrown himself thoroughly into the spirit of his age and race; yet, while loyal to the backbone, and indorsing to the full his country's claims to present grandeur and future pre-eminence, he has a corner in his soul for the merits of other lands, and is open to the lessons of Old-World wisdom. There is everything to hope from an enterprising and intelligent citizen of the New World who, after an absence of two years and a half, during which he has made the circuit of the globe, can return to his home with the impression that "America does not possess all the virtues in the world. We have something yet to learn." He and his party have "lost some prejudices, and gained new views." From the outset he appears to have conceived the true idea of travel, and the success which crowned his efforts is the deserved result and confirmation of the foresight and resolve with which he laid down his plan from the first. He is true to the proverbial maxim of his country, and has verified it over the length and breadth of the earth. "Be sure you are right, and then go ahead." "The secret of travelling with ease is to know where to go, and how to get there, making all necessary preparations, and never to worry." It is care and fuss, as he says, which kills us, or, at all events, takes all the life out of our travel.

The tourist who cannot proceed leisurely had better stay at home, or submit to chalk out for himself a more limited field of exploration. "To be benefited by travel time must be taken for study and reflection. No man can eat all the time; if he attempts it, digestion ceases." A man may get round the world in ninety days, but he must be a fool or a slave to undertake it. A year Mr. Coffin thinks little time enough. To see all that he saw, and to read, mark, learn, and digest it thoroughly as he did, cannot easily be brought within less compass than it was in his case, though he lays down a programme by which it can be compressed within eighteen months. To attempt the feat with the same headlong unreflecting speed with which one might despatch a bale of goods will only result in weariness of body and dizziness of brain:—

"Japanese, Chinese, Hindoos, and Arabs will be so completely mixed,—there will be such indistinct recollections of joss-houses, pagodas, mosques, temples,—of junks, sampans, proas, and other queer craft,—such a snarl of streets, lanes, and alleys, filled with myriads of people, carrying baskets, bundles, chests of tea, and dressed in blue blouses, baggy trousers, flowing robes, long gowns, turbans, broad-brimmed or steeple-shaped hats,—or wearing nothing at all except a narrow strip of cloth about the loins,—with pigtails, cues, or shaven crowns, plucked brows, painted faces, tattooed skins,—riding in sedans, palankeens, or on donkeys, elephants, and camels,—that the brain instead of retaining distinct pictures will be in the condition of a sportsman whose horse turns a somersault in a steeple-chase, and the unfortunate rider beholds only a whirling landscape of fields, trees, hounds, hedges, and blinking stars!"

The tour adopted by Mr. Coffin's party was that from west to east. But the true course for the circuit of the world, experience has now taught him, is with the sun. By starting at the right time, and by travelling westward, every country will be seen at its best season. The tourist will be pretty sure of calm seas and pleasant weather all the way from San Francisco to Japan, thence by way of China and India to Suez, and so on to Europe. It was doubtless the natural hankering after the sights and ways of Europe that turned our traveller's steps in this direction before exhausting the marvels and novelties of his own land. Rapid as was his flight, and superficial as was his purview of the multitudinous objects that daily crowded his path, his powers of observation are, we are bound to say, keen and vigorous, and his judgments upon men and things both shrewd and impartial. Be it the aspects of nature, the historical monuments, the national traits or the social idiosyncrasies that come before him, we find him invariably alive to what is most beautiful or august or original or piquant, as the case may be. He is at all times happy in hitting off the salient features, or picking out the weak spots, in local life and manners. While full of aspirations for the future, he is far from ignoring the glories or the legacies of the past. He is not the man to have to fall back, like a certain traditional fellow-countryman of his, for his recollections of Rome upon the entry in his diary of "the place where the buildings were so much in want of repair." Rome, indeed, we regret to say, lay out of his adopted route, but Greece was happily so nearly in the direct line from Marseilles to the East as to render possible a bird's-eye view of classic sites and cities, and to call up a swiftly passing panorama of Attic grandeur and decay. Skirting the Dorian peninsula, the gray ribs of limestone broken into rugged caves tell him of "the puny Spartan children dropped into these dark chasms, to be devoured by wolves."

Earlier echoes still of siren voices float upon the ear, and fancy might people these quiet nooks with graceful forms of nymphs and water-goddesses, only that it is "sheer nonsense to undertake to go into ecstasies about them with a steam-engine beneath our feet, and the screw of the steamer churning the ocean to a foam." The mutations of history flit rapidly past the eyes of our New World philosopher. From the Phœnician rovers, or robbers, bringing West the "seed corn of civilization," through the glorious harvest of Western prowess and intellect and art, the eye travels swiftly down to the poor gleanings of to-day. On Sunium's lofty steep, maybe, a hermit builds his nest, "a philosopher in a hair shirt digs and delves for potatoes in a garden-spot as large as a common dining-table." A railway car whirls us up from the Piræus to the Acropolis. Polyglot commissionaires strive noisily for the honor of showing us the lions of the Parthenon. At a restaurant hard by, "thirty or forty descendants of noble Greeks—a great way descended—are singing the songs of Bacchus, guzzling wine, smoking abominable tobacco in Turkish pipes, shuffling dominos and cards." "Call with tenderest voice for the Mighty Past, amid such associations, and it will not come. It is far better to get into a carriage and ride to a good hotel in Athens, five miles distant, than to endeavor to work ourselves into a fine frenzy by thinking of Demosthenes, Socrates, and Plato."

In the same practical and cosmopolitan spirit our traveller takes in with equal eye the wonders of Pharaonic rule and the no less striking marvels of modern Egyptian progress. It is hard to say whether more strict, albeit summary, justice is done to the Pyramids or to the Suez Canal, to the solemn associations of the Exodus or to the smartness of the Pasha's railway management. In one respect, he is disposed to yield to young Egypt the palm, not only above all early types of the proverbial wisdom of the Egyptians, but over what we had blindly thought to be the 'cutest of all existing races. The Arabs turned out "sharper than any Yankee at a bargain. The keenest Vermonter would be outwitted and fleeced by them. It is easier for them to lie than to tell the truth." They have also a keen eye for marks of nationality. The naked rascals who swarm in the human ant-hill at the base of the Great Pyramid met our party with sardonic grins, and with offers of service in tortured English,— "Me help you, master; me good for Yankee Doodle."

The great highway of nations opened up by the Overland route furnishes an unparalleled field for the study of diversities of national type. Whilst others, however, rub off their angles in the great attrition of humanity, the Briton shows his angularity even enhanced. His very pronunciation of English, his "extra h or o" jars upon the sensitive ears of an American. The polish and courtesy of the P. and O. officers, and the equipment, speed, and comfort of their vessels are notwithstanding beyond all praise. The history of British rule in India, and the tokens of material and social advancement everywhere beside his path, are themes after the American's own heart. We have never seen a more graphic or telling sketch of Anglo-Indian life and characteristics within anything like the compass of Mr. Coffin's flying experiences. Landing at Bombay, his route lay across the Ghâts by the Great Indian Peninsular Railway to Nagpore, and thence to Jubbulpore, by the Deccan horse dak, of which novel yet primitive mode of locomotion he retains lively reminiscences. The mercury at 180° by day and 100° by night enables the chances of dissolution or sun-stroke in the "Orient" to be weighed against those of the most fiery of Western prairies. From Allahabad the railway whirled our party down the valley of the Ganges to the capital, leaving leisure, however, by the way, for a summary of Indian mythology, history, and economics, from the dawn of time to the present day, for the edification of the American public. From the literary annals of the Veda or the origin of caste his lively pen runs on to the American mission, its fruits, and expected harvest, though the utmost to be boasted of as regards its effect upon the native mind is but what is termed a "state of betweenity."

The Hindoo has given up his idols, eats beef, and drinks champagne or Bass, but has made no further progress towards Christianity. One institution or "notion" is of universal adoption, and grateful to thirsty souls of all races and creeds. From the veranda of his heated bungalow the traveller's weary eye rested upon the sign next door,— "American Ice." The Indian Ice Company has been fifteen years in operation in Allahabad. Machine-made ice is discarded by the natives as containing something possibly unclean. The Wenham is absolutely pure. Three years ago the ice in our author's tumbler crystallized thousands of miles away towards the setting sun. The thought furnishes occasion for one of the few passages in the gushing or "high faluting" vein in which his muse permits him to indulge:—

"The most extravagant tale of the Orient is not more romantic than the story of this solidified water from Wenham Lake. It is a piece of imprisoned cold, a fragment of a bygone winter transported by sea and land to this city of Central India, to minister to our health and comfort.

"How romantic to think of it!—of boyhood's rosy cheeks and girlhood's laughing eyes, the joining of hands, the swiftly flying feet sweeping the gleaming field, the linking of hearts for a wider curve across the stream of life;—a picture of happiness without a counterpart in the world, and as much in advance of life in this tropical land as the Sistine Madonna of Raphael is superior to the figures on a Chinese tea-chest!

"Call it rhapsody, sentiment, what you will; how can one help this outburst of enthusiasm with a piece of ice from Wenham Lake clinking in his tumbler, melting in his mouth, cooling his parched tongue, and bringing to his soul a breeze of old associations?

"Blessed be the ice, and prosperity to the Tudor Company!"

Mr. Coffin's studies of life in China are eminently piquant and original. Nothing is too old or too new to escape his notice. His vista of Chinese history opens with the Deluge and comes down to the latest iniquity of the British Government in pushing the opium trade. The laws of Confucius, the Hia, Shang, Chun, and Tsin dynasties, the contact with Greek and Roman civilization, and the later annals that tell of the still-growing intrusion of "foreign devils" are reeled off in a few lines apiece. Never, perhaps, has the history of the staple manufacture of China been put before Western readers so fully and clearly within so brief a compass, though ardent tea-drinkers are hardly to be congratulated upon the ample light here thrown upon many of the mysteries of the craft. The chapter upon the future of China embodies, and goes far to justify the most sanguine dreams of the political and commercial destinies of the flowery land that Mr. Burlingame and other prophets of the new dispensation have made us familiar with. Still more golden and blissful are the visions opened by the immense success of the great line of steam communication between China, Japan, and California. Here is one of the most novel and piquant themes that the new circuit of the globe suggests for contemplation. The details of this extraordinary traffic may well fill European readers with surprise. Every month a steamer, second only to the Great Eastern in tonnage and power, leaves Hong Kong for San Francisco, touching at Yokohama. Each carries from a thousand to twelve hundred Chinese emigrants at forty dollars a head, generally carrying back on the return voyage more than half that number who have made their little fortunes. The Colorado, the pioneer ship of this line, which started January 1, 1867, netted, we are told, some 60,000 dollars over all expenses. Who can predict the effect, not only upon American, but even European civilization, as the mighty tide of emigration swells in range and volume, bearing, by the new highway just opened across the Western continent, the growing overplus of a nation at once the most populous, the most prolific, and the most restless upon earth? Mr. Coffin's narrative comes down as late as the laying of the last rail between the Atlantic and the Pacific. To his patriotic eye America looms greater and greater in the distance as the centre and heart of the human system, the teacher of the nations, the world following in its path. "The people of Europe are keeping step to the march of the great Republic."

With his foot, so to say, once more on his native heath, we should have been surprised if Mr. Coffin had turned aside from exploring the great social and religious portent of the New World. The story of his visit to the Salt Lake City will be found not only one of the shrewdest and most impartial accounts that we have seen of the "new institution," but a corrective of much of the sensational clap-trap that recent travellers have been wont to indulge in. Upon the author of New America he is successful in turning the tables. Instead of polygamy being peculiarly an outgrowth of American institutions, the great body of Mormon recruits are from the old country. Neither is there anything in democracy more than in autocracy to give growth to such an excrescence as that of Utah. And as slavery has disappeared from the land, so is the time not far distant when the country will be purged of polygamy, — "by peaceful means if possible, by forcible if there is no other way."

Of the physical marvels encountered by our traveller in his way round the world, none could exceed that which bursts upon his view when the new way round the world brings him once more home to the continent of his birth. He would be cold indeed to the glories of his native land who touched the shore of San Francisco, and did not make the slight detour of 150 miles to the southeast which brings him to the "big trees" and the Yosemite valley. Of the former of these wonders of the world, Londoners have of late lost the opportunity of judging which they had prior to the lamentable fire at the Crystal Palace. Of the latter they still possess the means of forming somewhat of an estimate in the large and expressive picture of Mr. Bierstadt now on view at South Kensington. Mr. Coffin's powers of description are exhausted upon these truly sublime monuments of nature's grandeur. The vast cones of granite that border the valley have taken their names from a fancied resemblance to the Domes of a cathedral or mosque. But what is the architecture of Damascus or Stamboul to this handiwork of the Almighty? —

"The domes of St. Sophia and Suliman, so beautiful from the Bosphorus, so mean when we approach them, bear no more comparison to those of the Sierras than the card-houses reared by children bear to the city of London. The gray granite fashions itself into mansions, palaces, and cathedrals. Imagination pictures a celestial city above the clouds. The setting sun, falling on fields of gleaming snow, illumines its jasper walls and pearly gates with heavenly light.

"Suddenly we find ourselves on the brink of an awful chasm. One mad leap of our horse, and we should fall three fourths of a mile! The heart ceases for a moment to beat. We hold our breath. The brain reels. No word of exclamation. Every voice is hushed. The soul stands in awe before this revelation of Omnipotence. This is God's work. Eternal might alone cleft the chasm, rived the rock, and reared the lofty domes. So vast, grand, majestic, so filled with God's presence, is this cathedral of his, that we dare not speak. Hang over the chasm, if your nerves are steady enough, and look into its depths. Those little green points, like plants just springing from a garden bed, are gigantic forest-trees. That foliage of brighter hue, no larger than a tuft of grass, is an oak, which has withstood the storms of centuries. That thread of silver winding through the valley is a river, which has poured its flood down a precipice twenty-seven hundred feet. The opposite wall of the chasm rises three fourths of a mile. It is a perpendicular rock, without seam or scar to mar its beauty.

"Overwhelmed by the scene, we can only gaze as one who has suddenly passed into a higher existence and beholds things 'not lawful for a man to utter.' We think of that holy city which Bunyan's Pilgrim saw beyond the river, from the Delectable Mountains. The sublimest imagery of the Revelation of St. John, portraying the transcendent glory of the New Jerusalem, alone is adequate to describe it. White clouds rest above it as the angelic host hovered over the hills of Bethlehem, and sung the sweetest music ever heard on earth. The Merced, like the river of life proceeding from the throne of God, winds down from the celestial city, making glad the peaceful vale.

"Like the song of the redeemed is the music of the many-voiced waters swelling upward through the evening air. We behold beauty, grandeur, majesty, immensity, and omnipotence, and hear the Te Deum Laudamus ever ascending.

"There are eight persons in our company and we join in singing Old Hundred; but how insignificant! The only fitting choir would be the whole church militant singing the Hallelujah Chorus of the Messiah!"

The falls of the Yosemite have a descent of nearly 2,700 feet, broken at one point by a cascade. From the summit of the granite cliff of Tu-toch-arnu-lah — the "Great Chief" or El Capitan — the Po-ho-no, or "wind spirit," otherwise christened the "bridal veil," falls in silver spray 900 feet. From the lake to the summit of the South Dome, is not far from 6,000 feet. This dome has been riven perpendicularly "as by the sword stroke of the Almighty." And what a chasm is the result! "Bring New York, Philadelphia, Boston, Baltimore, Washington, Chicago, — all the churches, warehouses, shops, stores, dwellings, — tumble them all in, and it will not be full."

We are constantly reminded how much purer English is spoken and written by Americans than by ourselves. It behooves us, therefore, to take heed of such casual lessons as may enable us to bring up our notions of what is correct or chaste in style to the level of the latest and best transatlantic standard. We are grateful for any hints which a visitor so recent and so vivacious as our author has to bring to bear upon our old-fashioned diction. The novelty of certain idioms to our ears involves, we have sometimes to complain, somewhat of obscurity, as when we are told at a Chinese dinner "there is no letting up of etiquette." We are not so familiar as our teachers and models in precision with walking "on the streets," nor do we find fault with our ships for omitting to arrive "on time." We hardly know whether to credit the printers or the scientific men of America with the discovery of the rotation of the earth "on its axes," or with so much tampering with the transmutation of metals as is implied in the "wealth of the plains being transmuted into golden grain."

Haste, or want of familiarity with local names or events, may excuse such minor slips as making Sir H. Laurence telegraph "from Calcutta" during the mutiny. Mr. Coffin's style is in general correct and clear, and his information not less sound than varied. The wood-cuts interspersed among his pages deserve a word of commendation. They are drawn with vigor and truth, often showing touches of quaint and quiet humor. The group of perspiring wretches melting away in the stateroom of the Baroda down the Red Sea, and the imperious Briton (uncovenanted, we will suppose) with his full-blown, vulgar wife and limp, washed-out children "going home," are remarkable for compressed fun. Altogether, if there is nothing new under the sun, Our New Way Round the World shows there may be much novelty and freshness in the mode of telling even a thrice-told tale.

FRIENDS IN HIGH LATITUDES.

EVERYBODY knows what manner of creature an Eskimo * is; the "strange infidele, the like of whom was never seen, read, nor heard tell of," as stout Martin Frobisher describes him. From morning to night under my window in Jakobshavn Kirke—in nearly 70° north latitude—there stands a group of the queer little folks; fur clad from head to foot; good-naturedly grinning at our small witticisms in very bad Greenlandish, until the dirt cracks into huge asterisks on their brown, globose, good-humored cheeks. All the children have their hair in their eyes, and their hands in the pockets of their ragged mangy-looking skin-breeches. It is summer-time, and their toes protrude through their seal-skin boots without fear of frost-bite. No sooner do they devour their rather more than modicum of the blubbery seal which their father has killed in his skin kayak, than they hurry over the bleak, lichen-covered rocks with flowers and ferns and creeping things, on the chance of a skilling or a biscuit from the Nalegak Tuluut,—the big Englishman,—and they will scramble amid the snow and slush, with merry shouts, for the smallest coin thrown out to them. "Kuyanke! Kuyanke! Thank you! thank you!" the fortunate one shouts, the last syllable echoing from behind the rocks, for young Greenland is off to Herr Mörch's, the trader, to buy lump-sugar. Then there are the women,—some of them good-looking enough when clean and tidy; for the old ones, they are so hideous that I do not at all wonder at some of old Frobisher's sailors pulling the boots off one of them, to see if her foot was not cloven, after the traditional fashion ascribed to the Evil One! There is now very little pure Eskimo blood in Danish Greenland; fair hair and blue eyes are just about as common as black hair and black eyes. Everybody, however, dresses à la Eskimoiske,—man, woman, and child, blonde or brunette. The woman's dress is not at all inelegant, and is much more suited to the climate than would be European garments. In the winter all is fur, but in the summer-time a little lighter and more varied raiment is ventured on. The round-hooded jacket is made of checked calico, tartan silk, or even blue velvet, fur-lined; made rather short, to show the white chemise beneath. It would, no doubt, be warmer to have it a little longer, but then fashion sways as much in Greenland as in Europe; and the Arctic belles would rather shiver and catch cold than disobey its dictates. Then the trousers are of seal-skin, striped with eider-ducks' necks, or ornamented with little strips of the curious skin-embroidery so much affected among these people. The boots are the grandest of all the articles of wardrobe, and are made of dyed seal-skin leather. Some of them have regular "tops" like a pair of hunting-boots, and between the foot of the boot and the top is a piece of white calico,—often embroidered, so that the general effect of red and green boots and calico embroidery, when collected in a mass on some rocky point, as you sail in a Greenland fjord, is sufficiently striking.

A white nun-like scarf is sedately folded round the neck and over the breast; and the hair is twisted into a top-knot doubled upon itself, and tied with a piece of colored ribbon. Now this constant pulling up the hair to the top of the crown is apt to result in a circle of baldness. To conceal this defect the Greenland coquette, from eight to eighty, folds a handkerchief, generally of black silk, round her head, finishing off with a fancy knot in front. This knot is pinned on, and, like the ladies' chignons in Europe, is a hollow sham, lined with all sort of rubbish, such as old rags and clippings of sealskins. The color of the ribbon with which the knot is tied denotes the condition of life of the wearer. When unmarried it is pink, when married blue; if a widow in service it is green with gold; if a widow at home black; while if the damsel has, as is not uncommon in Greenland, loved not wisely but too well,—to the scandal of priest and kirk,—she is doomed to wear one of green. When this custom originated it is difficult to say, though it must have been since the Danes came to the country; yet, nevertheless, it is religiously obeyed, whether it implies honor or disgrace. The description of seal used for dress is also of importance; the smooth mottled Kassiglak (Phoca vitulina) being most highly valued for this purpose. When a Greenland Pyramus would grow in favor with his Thisbe, instead of bijouterie, he presents her with what she values rather more (albeit she is not insensible to the charms of trinkets), a dappled sealskin to make her a pair of—trousers. Some of the young men are stalwart, handsome fellows, and the admixture of Danish blood shows itself in the features, the nose especially,—that organ in the regular Eskimo being merely a flattened tubercle,—meandering on either side to his cheeks in an expanse of nostril.

The population lives solely by hunting and fishing; seal and white-whale killing being the staple occupations. A few go hunting reindeer in the summer, and trapping or shooting polar hares and white foxes in the winter. The produce of these hunts is sold to the Government of Denmark, which, at various localities along the coast, has established little trading ports, presided over by a governor and other officers, administering the trade for the benefit of the natives. The object of this strict monopoly is to prevent the Greenlanders being demoralized and ruined by contact with unprincipled traders. According to the strict letter of the law none can enter Danish Greenland or leave it without permission of the Government. The trading monopoly is directed in Denmark by a board called the Kongelige Gronland ske Handel, or "Royal Greenland Merchant Company," the chief of which is a "Director." Under this board again are a Royal Inspector of North Greenland and a Royal Inspector of South Greenland, both of whom are resident in the country. The former division extends from 72° north latitude to 67°, and the latter from 67° to Cape Farewell. All these settlements are on the west coast, the east being almost altogether unexplored. Each of these trading settlements is called a "colonie," and is presided over by a "colonibestyrrer," or the "best man in the colony"; in other words, a governor, to whom are responsible various little outposts commanded by a petty officer, — generally a carpenter or cooper, — called an "udliger" or "outlyer." Each of these colonies is the centre of a "district."

After the expenses of the very elaborate machinery of a company of Government merchants is defrayed, a quarter of the profits of the trade is credited to each district, to be again distributed among the natives. About £11,000 is the average amount derived from the sale of the oil, walrus and narwhal ivory, whalebone, sealskins, &c. in Copenhagen; and supposing the share of the profit from this falling to the settlement of Egedesminde to be £50, — which is, I suspect, more than the average, — it would be distributed in the course of the year by a sort of hyperborean parliament called the Partisok. This assemblage is composed of representatives chosen by universal suffrage from all the little Eskimo fishing-stations, each outpost returning one member, — generally some talkative old fellow, not of much use as a seal-hunter, but who is intimately acquainted with everybody. The president of this body is the governor; and the priest, doctor, and assistant-trader have also seats in it. All the native members wear a scarlet cap with a white band, with the badge of the Royal Board of Greenland Trade in front, — a bear rampant, its head surmounted by a crown. They meet generally in the winter, when travelling from settlement to settlement over the frozen sea is easy. Then assemble from all the outposts the claimants, — the clients of the Partisok. A widow will say that her husband is dead, and it is now time that her boy should learn to kill seals in his kayak; but she cannot afford to pay anybody to teach him. The Partisok in its wisdom votes the munificent sum of five rigsdaler per annum for that purpose. Then a young fellow comes, — blushing through the oleaginous dirt on his cheeks, — and avows that he is going to be married, and has not money to purchase a musket or a kayak; and, with a deal of good advice from the assembled sages, he is lent the money for a term of years; or a family is in poor circumstances, the seal-catcher of the family being sick, and to them a sum for their immediate necessities is voted, and so on until the balance is expended.

The Government gives the Greenlanders little for their produce; but then again, it sells them articles very cheaply. For instance, it buys their blubber at about a farthing and a half a pound; their ivory at 6*d.* per lb.; their white bearskins at 11*s.* 3*d.*; the white fox at 1*s.* 1*d.*; and the blue, which will sometimes bring £1 in Copenhagen, is bought at the outside price of 4*s.* 6*d.* Common sealskins do not fetch many pence, though the kassigiak before mentioned will often be sold for three or four rigsdaler.

On the other hand, the Government sells handy little rifles at a trifle more than two pounds sterling, while a plainer sort may be had at 30*s.*; powder at 6*d.* per lb., being rather less than it costs in Denmark, and other things in proportion. Some articles are sold below prime cost. For instance, a stove, which would be worth about thirty rigsdaler in Copenhagen, will be sold for ten rigsdaler in Greenland. To make up for this disposal of articles of necessity at so low a rate, articles of luxury are sold at a good profit. Accordingly, the Greenlanders, being very fond of coffee, has to pay for the green beans 8*d.* per lb.; for chiccory 3*d.* per lb.; and for sugkut, or candy-sugar, 6*d.* per lb. Now these, though not ruinous prices by any means, are yet tolerably high, when it is considered that the goods are taken out of bond in Copenhagen; that the freight is not heavy; that there are no custom-house duties, or shop-rents in fashionable streets to pay in Greenland. All this information I derive from a little pamphlet, redolent of stale oil, which I picked up in an Eskimo hut. It is the price-list of all sort of things sold in Greenland, printed in two dialects of the Eskimo language, with a Danish translation. It is carefully classified, and informs us that "timmisetkernertut" or coarse Scandinavian ship's-bread, something like half a roll toasted hard, sells for 3*d.* per lb.; that white shirting, or "satoralakaglalak," is sold at 4*d.* per yard; and that "illupainakpanmkaissialik," which is another description of calico, sells for 8*d.* per yard. I also know, having bought one, that a very coarse pocket-knife useful for opening preserved meat tins, but for little else, can be purchased of Good King Christian, at his "handel" in Greenland, for 3*d.* This is called a "Savtikissungnikipugdlit"; but if I am of a more extravagant turn of mind, I can buy a "Savtikussartutangisut," or a large-sized English knife, for twenty skillings, or 7*d.*, and so on, the list concluding with a table of the price of blubber, — a sort of ready-reckoner, by which our Eskimo friend can immediately cast up the sum-total value of the greasy load he has thrown down in the blubber-house. There is no barter now in Greenland, as in most other out-of-the-way places in the world. All the transactions are on a money basis, and for this end the Government has issued a series of paper notes from 6 skillings, or 1*d.*, up to one rigsdaler, or 2*s.* 3*d.*, for use in Greenland. These notes are signed by the Director of the Trade in Copenhagen, and the image and superscription is a bear rampant, with certain words informing all whom it may concern that this note is worth so much money, "rigsmont." They soon get very ragged and very greasy. The Government is now beginning to withdraw them, and soon there will be only coin in circulation, when these Arctic bank-notes will probably command a large price from collectors. The native names for them are peculiar; being, in reality, the names of what they will purchase, or rather what they represent in produce. Six skillings (1*d.*) is called "Arningnoako," a small skin; twelve skillings, "Amingnoakomirdloakako," a large skin; twenty-four skillings, "Napardlangnoako," a small cask of blubber; and one rigsdaler is dubbed "Napardasok," a large cask of blubber. These are big words, — or rather conglomerations of words, — but it is impossible to pronounce them separately. What would a hardware merchant — say in the city of London — think if any "intelligent foreigner," clad in fur, five foot four in height, and with very long black hair hanging over very fat and very dirty cheeks, were to come into his shop, and in a voice loud enough to be heard at the North Pole, shout, as he threw sixpence on the counter, "Savekenearreatoresooarat-laromarouatetok?" Yet this is done every day in 70° north latitude, and all this tremendous collection of letters strung together means is only, "You must try and get me a good knife!" This is really several words, but it is in vain that you ask any native to separate them.

Let us look in on what English voyagers jocularly call the "Lieutenant-Governor." His duties are really more those of a country shop-keeper's assistant than anything else. "Herr Assistant" he is called in the settlement; in the books of the Government he is styled a "volunteer"; though why he should be so called, it is hard to say, as he receives pay, though certainly that is small enough. He is at present in the shop of the settlement, very busy, but yet with leisure enough to smoke the biggest of big pipes. "Merchanting," he assures us, "is strong work." He has absolutely toiled three hours to-day. He has just sold three skillings' worth of soft-soap to an old woman, and six skillings' worth of coffee to a small boy, and is now putting up some eider-down for Herr Pastor, the new missionary who has just arrived with the "Hvalfiak." Every officer and missionary coming out for the first time is entitled to forty-eight pounds of uncleaned eider-down at 6d. per pound, and two bearskins for a sleeping-bag, at the country trade-price of five rigsdaler. Troops of little boys and women drop in and out, for the shop is only open so many hours a day, and there is no opposition. If you are not pleased with your purchase, you will be (always most politely) told to go to the next shop, which is in Reikjavik in Iceland, or possibly Moose Factory in Hudson's Straits! "Kavit," or coffee, notwithstanding its high price, seems to be the article chiefly in demand. Whatever else may be wanted, kavit must be had, and to procure this a woman will allow her children to go about like half-skinned seals; and her husband to want the most common necessities. No spirits being allowed to be sold, the natives take coffee instead, and to such an extent that it has been not inaptly styled "the curse of Greenland." For a family to consume one and a half pounds per diem is no uncommon extravagance; and the polite little trader turns to his books, and shows me that some families, when in luck (the father having killed a white whale or many seals), will use as much as five pounds of coffee daily. Half of this is wasted in the preparation. The green beans are roasted in a pot, or on a flat stone, until they are charred black; they are then smashed up with a stone in an old leather mitten, without fingers, until they are roughly bruised, when they are thrown by the handful into water and boiled for some time. The result is a liquid, black enough in all conscience, with half-beans floating about in it, and very bitter; but it is strong, and that is the main thing. A bit of candied sugar is taken into the mouth, and the coffee is sipped, the sugar meanwhile dissolving, and imparting a certain degree of sweetness to the bitter liquid.

This is drinking coffee à la Gronlandice; but practice is required to accomplish it satisfactorily, for the sugar will slip down without the coffee, and the coffee without receiving its proper saccharine addition. Herr Assistant asks a hulking-looking Green-lander, standing at the door with his hands in his pockets, why he is not out seal-hunting? (For independently of his regard for the welfare of the natives, Herr Colonibestyrrer is directly interested in the produce of the hunt.) He gives a growl and replies: "I have had no kavit to-day"; and then, as if correcting himself, "Besides, there is a hole in my kayak, and my boy is not well, and—"; but the real truth was "no kavit." Just as I am talking to him, a little boy who is working for me begs a few skillings on account, as he is out of "kavit," and finds it impossible to get along without his accustomed beverage. Then arrive two brothers from a distant settlement with blubber and skins, which net nearly £ 2. What do they buy? Some bread, some butter, some tobacco, a little powder and shot; the rest all goes in coffee and sugar. The butter is of course quite in their way; my friend the schoolmaster of Christianshaab is rather fond of fenks (or the refuse of the blubber) and butter, — a rather greasy dish. However, the traditional blubber-eating of the natives is, so far as Danish Greenland is concerned, rather mythical. Blubber is too precious for winter light and heat to be rashly expended as food, and accordingly we find that they use it but rarely, and only as we would use fat to lean meat. The shop itself is about as dirty a little shop as could be imagined, containing everything which could possibly be required for use either among the Danes or Eskimo, all heaped up in confusion. Women are here in the trader's shop in abundance, most of them trying to obtain goods on credit. Greenland women, as a rule, are excessively bad housewives. Before marriage they are clean in their persons and attire, and everything that an Arctic lover of right constituted mind could desire. But once married they sink into slatterns, — careless of person, house, and family, and negligent of the duties expected from every Greenland's wife. There was a great seal-hunter at Claushavn, called Timotheus David, known, in one day, to have killed twenty-three seals and one white whale. I saw him once bring some skins to trade, which were refused on account of their being half rotten. "What can I do?" the poor man replied. "She" (looking cautiously around) — "she won't look after them." This man's wife, before marriage, was the best tailoress in the settlement. Now she is a dirty slattern and will do nothing, not even make her husband's and children's clothes, nor even dress the skins, as every Greenland wife is expected to do. He is camped on an island just off shore, and has come for a woman to dress the skins, for which service he must of course pay her, while his lazy wife looks on. Yet the unfortunate wight cannot, as in the old times of Tournoursoak and the heathen Angakoks, send his worthless wife about her business, because the Lutheran Church, which he has adopted, does not allow of such a proceeding; and if he gives her a good caning (as she richly deserves), or even speaks crossly to her, then she will inform the "proester" when he comes round, and the poor man will be read a long lecture upon the iniquity of his ways, and forever there will settle upon him the priestly scowl, as he is pointed out as a vicious creature, an example unto all refractory seal-catchers. Now, as the poor fellow does not care to be sent to a clerical Coventry, the wife sips her "kavit," while another woman dresses his skins. The father of this man, Matthias, was a stern Arctic parent, and brought up his son in the way he should go. When the dreaded southwest wind was driving the breakers high over the rocks at Claushavn, he would place his son in the kayak and throw him into the surf. The little fellow, with the double paddle in his hand, would watch his opportunity and right himself as he descended, and then triumphantly paddle through the boiling sea to the little haven where the canoes land. Though Claushavn is called the "shut harbor" by some jocular old Dane in times past, on the lucus à non lucendo principle, — the harbor is merely an open roadstead, exposed to every wind that blows round Disco Bay. People used to say to Matthias père, "You will drown your boy"; to which advice this sage hunter of seals and white whales replied: "If the boy cannot right a kayak in a stormy sea he cannot kill a seal, and if he cannot kill a seal he cannot live in Greenland, in which case he might just as well go to —" the sentence being left unfinished.

On the subject of morality there is little to be said for the Greenlanders. But in this respect the Danes set a very indifferent example to the natives. Half-castes of illegitimate origin abound, and the Government, whatever may be said about it otherwise, really offers a premium for errors against church discipline. If a young officer of the Government is adjudged to be parent presumptive of a brass-colored baby, all he has to do is to pay thirty-six rigsdaler — or about four pounds — to the Governor, and he will be troubled no further about the matter. Murder is almost unknown now in Danish Greenland; very few cases of even a suspicious nature having occurred for many years, and no provision is made for punishing it, so little is the commission of the crime calculated on. In the "good old times," if two men quarrelled, they would watch an opportunity, until a harpoon driven through the back of one, while in his kayak, settled the dispute. The cardinal virtue of the Greenlanders is his honesty. Theft is almost unknown in the country. Nobody, unless, indeed, he be very weak, or very suspicious, ever thinks of locking his door against thieves. When he goes out he draws it to, to prevent things being meddled with, or dogs running in, but not with an idea that if he should leave his table covered with money a skilling of it would be gone.

Only one case has occurred for a number of years, of a thieving Greenlanders, and this person was altogether so remarkable an individual, and of such special interest to Englishmen, that I think he ought to be introduced to the notice of the reader. One autumn evening my boatwomen rowed me into the little harbor of Ritenbenk, a dreary little settlement on the Waigatz Strait, — very far in the outer world.

I missed Governor Anderson's hearty welcome at the landing; but a rascally looking Eakimo (with a head shaped like the Neanderthal skull), who, to my astonishment, spoke tolerable English, flavored with a fair sprinkling of the oath of British commerce, informed me that the Governor was out "training his (blessed) dogs." This worthy I subsequently discovered to be Samuel Immanuel, who accompanied Sir Leopold M'Clintock on the voyage of the Fox. He bears the reputation of having degenerated from his residence among British seamen, notwithstanding his linguistic accomplishments. He was found guilty of robbing Kivittut store-house, up Disco Fjord, and it was thought necessary that he should be publicly punished.

Accordingly, at the flagstaff at Godhavn, Mr. Inspector Olrik caused to be administered seven-and-twenty lashes on his bare back. Again, the district surgeon, worthy "Laege" Pfaff, complains that when Samuel was in the hospital at Jakobshavn, he stole half of the Doctor's winter supply of pork. When M'Clintock discharged him from the Fox he presented him and Anton, the other dog-driver, with about two boatloads of stuff, and describes how these greasy worthies intended disposing of their wealth. If I recollect rightly, one was to build a house for his mother, and a church, or something of that sort; but the Captain's back was scarcely turned before the two sold everything for a mere trifle, and guzzled until the proceeds were finished, when, having contracted a mode of living above their income, Anton took to general loafing (a very fashionable occupation in Greenland), and Samuel to indiscriminating theft, which, it appears, brought him into trouble. As a rule, however, everything is safe in Danish Greenland, — a fact which certainly speaks volumes for the teaching of the missionaries, when we know how villanously addicted to picking and stealing are the natives on the other side of Davis Strait, and to the north of the glaciers of Melville Bay. Everything is safe, with one exception, — that being a bottle of anything in the shape of grog. The Greenlanders are passionately fond of spirits, no matter how vile may be the quality, so long as it "brings on the drunk." They are allowed a glass on the King's birthday, and other high festivals; and when rowing in boats the Danish officers are accustomed to give them one small glass of schnapps (costing 5d. per quart) every four miles. It is remarkable how quickly they know when the distance has been accomplished. If the officer is not so cognizant, coughs and a pantomime of swallowing a glass of grog soon remind him that the boatmen require their "brandymik." The priest at one of the settlements had engaged an old fellow to feed his dogs in winter, the stipulated payment being a little money and a glass of schnapps. Every morning, after emptying his grog, he was seen to bend his head reverently; until, being watched, he was observed to squirt the spirits back again into a bottle concealed in the breast of his jacket. This he mixed with water and sold to the other natives, so that the old rascal lived royally on Herr Pastor's morning dram. When the annual ship comes from Denmark a crew of natives board her outside the harbor with a dusky pilot. For their services, in addition to pay, they receive a glass of schnapps. Sometimes this glass is sold to another long beforehand. A captain of one of these ships told me that he could never understand how yearly it constantly happened that one or two of the crew were intoxicated after receiving the dram, until a trusty old boatswain put him "up" to the trick. A man after receiving his grog will go behind a boat or a mast and squirt the contents of his mouth into that of his neighbor to whom he had sold it, though the amount of self-denial required to be exercised in a case of this nature must, to an Eskimo, be enormous! Though rather addicted to striking very close bargains with their good friend, the Tuluit,* they are yet, apart from business, exceedingly hospitable, and you can always depend upon the best their huts afford, if by chance you are driven to seek their shelter from the storm, no return being asked; though the custom in such cases is to ask the master of the house to share what provisions you may have, especially your brandy-flask, and to present the wife with a rigsdaler when you come away. An invitation to drink coffee before their threshold is looked upon as a mark of great regard and friendship. The giving of vails to servants prevails to an alarming extent in Greenland, however. One of the young gentlemen who acted as secretary to the Royal Inspector, and had, therefore, to travel much about, assured me that the first winter he was in the country, the douceurs he gave to the servants at the different ports where he halted for the night really exceeded his pay. Servants, moreover, not costing much, and being worth still less, are kept in considerable numbers. There is one servant whose business it is to feed the dogs, another will limit her exertion to softening the stiff sealskin boot with the Kamik-stick, or, as it is sometimes called, the Reiser-coonah, or travelling wife, because, when on their travel, the men have to apply it themselves to the soles of their boots, and then dry the dogskin socks, which soon get wet with perspiration. The woman whose business it is to look after the boots, if asked to bring a pitcher of water would never think of doing so, but would send for the boy whose special duty it is, though he may be at a considerable distance. They are as improvident as they are hospitable; rarely thinking of the future, and often neglecting to lay up sufficient food for the winter; so that they will sometimes die of starvation in the little outposts in the winter before they can arrive at the colonies through broken ice and water, to receive the bread which the Government declares no man shall die for the want of. Again, their own law is that everything shall be divided, and it is painfully amusing to see a crowd of hungry natives standing on the shore, waiting for an adventurous man who has gone out among the broken ice and trembling bergs to kill a seal for the starving settlement; yet their hunger once satisfied, the offer of a halfpenny diamond ring, or a scarlet cotton pocket-handkerchief (such as is sold by the Birmingham Christians to the slave-traders on the Zambesi), would be quite sufficient to tempt them to dispose of the rest for dogs' food.

It is thus much the same whether the government gives high or low prices for the oil or ivory. The more a Greenlander receives the more he wastes. Pay a native a few rigsdaler, and the chances are that ten minutes afterwards you will see him disposing of the whole amount in the trader's shop. Thus a little change is quite sufficient for a settlement, because it does not long remain in any single individual's pocket. No doubt this sharing of the product of the hunt is absolutely necessary in a community always struggling between plenty and starvation, but it conduces to the standstill of the natives in civilization: a hunter having no stimulus to, or reward for superior exertion or skill, except the vainglory of the thing, — the lazy, worthless loafer being every whit as well off as he.

They are a humorous people, fond of little rough jokes, and most communicative and pleasant with those whom they like and trust; but they are very little to be depended on, and are curiously vacillating and fickle. However, if they once decide not to go anywhere with a person whom they despise or dislike, no bribe will tempt them to change their determination; though, on the other hand, even if you are a favorite, it is not altogether certain that they will really go with you until you are fairly outside of the place. The only way to secure them is to advance a little of their pay beforehand. They are never known to break a contract of this nature. But then they must have their own way, and to pass a trading-post without sleeping and drinking kavit would be an innovation unheard of in Greenland. On all sides you would be told that it was impossible. They are fond of ridiculing the Europeans; indeed, this forms their principal amusement in the winter. Any little peculiarity in person, manner, or conduct will be instantly noted within a day of your arrival. The result is that no European in the country is known by anything but some sobriquet, sometimes not over-complimentary. One of the Governors who has a remarkably prominent nose is called "Kringalik," the nose; another Tulgak, the raven, from his dark complexion; a third pitted with the small-pox is known as "Cheese-rind"; Vahl, the naturalist, was known by a word which signifies the "diligent catcher," the name being applied in derision of his entomological and botanical researches, and not in admiration of his ability to catch seals, of which, indeed, he caught none. One of our party being a little stout man was called at one place Apalearsok, the little auk or rotje, and at another settlement he used to be known as "the pedler," Herr A — being a collector of all sorts of Eskimo curiosities; while another foreigner, who did not impress the people much with his wisdom, is remembered as Pitokiak, — the weak-minded man, or fool. The present writer was first called "Usuk," the bearded seal, and finally settled down, as being the tallest man of the party, into "Nerkersok," — great muscle — (Nerke flesh, sok great). They are very fond of a name which by a slight twist of the tongue can be converted into a double entendre, as many Eskimo words can be, several only differing slightly in the sound, though with an entirely different meaning. Of course, you are the last man to know of your own name. Among themselves they are not a whit better. Ask a native his name, and he will hesitate to tell you. If it is very good his modesty will keep him from mentioning it, but if it is the contrary his shame will equally act a barrier to your acquiring the desired information.

In reality very vain and great braggarts, they are affectedly modest when speaking of themselves, and laudatory of their neighbors or their property. "Would you lend me," they would say, "your large fine kayak, as my miserable thing has got a hole in it?" In every district or two the Government appoints a parson, and all the natives are nominally Christians, and are baptized, married, and buried after the Lutheran fashion. The priest comes round when he has time, and marries them in batches, a certain dispensation being allowed in the mean time, and a refusal to complete his engagement being perfectly unknown on the side of the male lover. The Lutheran missionaries are supported by the Government, and come out for a term of years, Greenland falling to the lot generally of the least brilliant of the theological licentiates of Copenhagen University. The Moravians — the celebrated Unitas fratrum of Herrnhut in Germany — also have missions in South Greenland, but they are not allowed to stretch further north than 65°, and it is only recently that they were allowed to baptize and marry. They are a self-denying set of men and women, but much too austere for the Greenlanders' temporal welfare. Round a Moravian settlement the natives are generally a miserable ragged set of wretches; attendance at church three times a day allowing of little time to attend to seal-catching. The Danes, though they bring out stores to them, yet do not like them; the proverbial professional hatred not being starved even out of Greenland, and, moreover, the Herrnhutians are — Germans! There is not now a real healthy Pagan in Danish Greenland, — Hans Hendreich's Smith Sound wife, so celebrated in Dr. Hayes's narrative, being the last: but Shanghai's pretty daughter, whose love-episode poor Kane has told us all about, is now settled down at Proven, a regularly christened woman. Occasionally a wandering savage or two comes round Cape Farewell, from the east coast, from unknown lands. Only a few years ago some came to Pamiadluk, declaring that it was two years since they had left their homes in the far north, somewhere near the pole doubtless. Such windfalls are, however, soon pounced upon by the nearest parson and baptized volens volens, under the name of Peder or Jens, or Hans, and a most gushing description of his conversion instantly despatched by the next ship, to the Danske Missionair Tidsskrift! The last real Pagan, however, was an old fellow who lived at Upernavik, in 70° north latitude. When asked to be a Christian, he would slap his broad chest, and shout in a voice as if from a drum, "Why should I be baptized? I can provide for my family, — I don't hang on the whites like the baptized Greenlanders"; and so a Pagan lived and died this representative man.

Every Sunday there is service in the little wooden church, the men sitting on one side, and the women on the other. The priest is a sight for gods and men, — clad in his sealskin trousers and boots, with a dogskin jacket, the collar of which peeps up above his high Lutheran ruff. Service is in Eskimo, as are also the sweetly sung hymns. An Eskimo plays the organ very well indeed, while the congregation intone out some such hymn as the following:—

"Soerbaermets tanko okautigat
S rapok innardlungalloornerput," &c., &c.

On a summer morning, when it is in session, there issues through the cracks in the church-door an unmistakable odor of ancient seal. The church wall seems to be a regular place for hanging up all sorts of implements of the chase. For instance, there is a musket or two hanging in the corner, some paddles, harpoons, and seal-lines, all on the outside. It seems as if some of old Pliny's Hyperborei had hung up their arms on the walls of the Temple of Neptune, in gratitude for their escape from shipwreck.

Though certainly civilization engrafted on savagedom shows itself in a tolerable form in Danish Greenland, yet even here missionary influence has its less bright side, and we still find some of the uglier features of paganism peeping out from under the grab of transmarine sanctity. At Christianshaab (where, however, there is no resident priest) they yet drown the groans of dying people with their heathen songs as of yore. Old people they are strongly suspected of putting out of the way; and every trader knows that, thoughtless and improvident in everything else, they buy the soap to wash the dead a good while before the last moment comes, and often, such is their horror of touching a dead body, they sew up the sufferer, while yet alive, in his sealskin grave-clothes. After the head of a family dies, you can generally buy a kayak tolerably cheap, because there is a prevalent objection to occupy the kayak of a dead man. The angekok, or "wizard," though according to missionary report his influence has long since ceased, is not so dead as some people would imagine. At Mancetsok, near Egedesminde, there is said to be an old fellow who does a little in that way during the dark winter, though he stoutly denies it, knowing full well what a priestly frown, with all its attendant inconveniences, would fall upon him. I have heard of another who yet makes a fuller display of his scepticism in regard to Luther's doctrines; and I know a family who practise an even darker piece of superstition within the sound of the kirk bells of Jakobshavn, with its fourteen catechists and three priests. When the members of this family kill anything, they expose a portion of the animal to propitiate Tournoursoak (half god, half devil), in a cave in the mountains. One of our party was once delayed by a contrary wind near an Eskimo settlement, and an angekok, under promise that he would receive two rigsdaler and "a schnapps" if successful, agreed to get up a northwest wind; but on no condition was the priest to be told of the exercise of the black art. He took a stick and dipped it in some grease: then selecting a lively specimen of an insect occasionally found on Eskimo, he placed it on the grease and extended it in the air. The nasty little creature struggled hard to get free in the direction of the wished-for wind, and then the wizard pronounced the charm complete. The young Greenlanders are sharp at learning, and in the school will acquire the elements of education every whit as quickly as Danish children. There are very few children in Greenland above the age of nine or ten who cannot read and write. In art the people do not excel, though they are good imitators. Nothing can they design, but yet they will produce exact imitations of any picture or piece of carving. Models of their canoes, houses, &c. are continually offered for sale; and you cannot go round some of the settlements without being dodged round corners by women, boys, and girls, wanting you to buy gaudily embroidered slippers, belts, or tobacco-pouches of dyed seals'-leather. The native cooper at Claushavn wrought for more than two years at copying a set of chessmen in ivory. At one of the southern missionary establishments they produce a yearly newspaper with gorgeous lithographs, nearly all copied, however, from the Danish illustrated papers. Many of the illustrations in Rink's Grønland are by native draftsmen.

Engage a woman to make you a suit of sealskin clothes or a pair of boots, and she must have another suit or a pair of boots to copy from. I asked a girl to make me a sealskin jumper of the same pattern as the natives', and gave her an English shooting-coat for the size. What was my horror to find my garment returned in a day or two, exactly imitated — buttons, pockets, lids, and all in sealskin!

I do not know into what class Mr. Ruskin would put icelands as art-producing; probably the formula would be, — icelands, shrewd intellect, and very material art. Yet with all the care a philanthropic government can exercise over them, the Greenlanders are slowly but surely becoming extinct. In the old Hans Egede's days, — not a century and a half ago, — the population was estimated to be about 20,000, though he knew but comparatively little of the northern portions; but soon after the effects of civilization became evident. In 1731 small-pox was introduced from Europe, and 3,000 were cut off; and so with one disease and another, until in 1820 an exact census now before us showed the total population to be 6,286 people.

In 1824 the total population was	6,331
" 1835 " "	7,356
" 1840 " "	7,877
" 1845 " "	8,501
" 1850 " "	9,185

Of these (1855) 1,327 were married males, 3,081 unmarried males, 183 widowers, 1,371 married females, 3,166 unmarried females, and 561 widows.

Twenty-one males reached from 66 — 70, and 39 females were about the same age; 8 individuals were aged from 76 — 80, and one woman had reached the very mature age of ninety. At that time, October, 1855, there were 248 Europeans in Greenland. Since then I have seen no later census; but until 1867, the population remained in numbers about stationary, with a slight decrease in the Moravian settlements. In 1867, an epidemic bronchial disease cut off about four per cent of the entire population (one settlement suffered to the extent of about ten or eleven per cent); so that the gradual increase shown by the table is now reversed. Moreover, the dogs are dying off; and whenever a native loses his dogs, it is remarked that he goes very rapidly down hill in the sliding scale of Arctic respectability, becoming little better than the hanger-on of the fortunate possessor of a sledge-team. Without his dogs the Greenlander cannot exist. He requires them to drag home the seals, the white whales, the sharks, and the narwhals, which he kills at the open place at the ice in the winter. When the dogs die off then the master must follow. He has no ulterior resource of agriculture or the arts of civilization, like most other aborigines. He must be a Greenlander, or he is nobody. He has no higher civilization to flee to, no place of escape; and hence, whatever may be said about the Greenland monopoly, and the management of affairs there (and volumes are written about it every now and again, and lengthy speeches made in the Danish Rigsstad), still, I do not see how it could be greatly improved. The Greenlander must follow a savage's mode of making his living, or die. A few may be educated and become Catechists and officers of the Company; one even became a missionary and an author, but these are rare exceptions.

Such was the people among whom we lived, — not unhappily, indeed, on the whole. The time comes when we must leave, and all is packing up and good by with "Herren Engländer." Every day little deputations arrive to ask us to drink coffee before some hospitable threshold, or to take some little farewell dinner. One of these kindly acts of hyperborean (though by no means frigid) hospitality seems worthy of being recorded in these notes, as being one of the last of the many acts of goodwill and warm-heartedness received from a people whom I can scarcely ever hope to see again. Samuel (not he of the Neanderthal skull) was one of the most respectable of the mixed race of Greenlanders about our neighborhood; a skilful hunter, artificer, and maker of many curiosities, for which he had found a customer in me. He insisted that I should — Danish fashion — take "kavit" with him. As I saw that the invitation was intended as a special mark of favor, and that the refusal would be a mortal affront, I complied most gracefully, though I had drank so much black coffee that day as to give me little hope of sleeping all night. His house was the ordinary turf mansion situated in a little valley and entered by the usual tunnel. The interior was in no way much different from the others, except that it was more cleanly and neat, and boasted a greater variety of knickknacks, — a Dutch clock, a cupboard, and several glaring prints of the Emperor of the French, his Empress, and a fierce, red-faced gentleman, whom I had some difficulty in discovering to be intended for "Albert Edward, Prinds af Wales og Hertug of Cornwall." I was here introduced to Samuel's wife and daughter, — the latter with the softest brown eyes and auburn hair I ever saw, — both of whom were busily manufacturing articles of household attire on the "brecks," or general platform, which occupies one side of the house, and serves the purposes of bed, table, and chair. The house is very warm, and I am begged to take off my coat, following in this fashion the rest of the family, most of whom are in a state of semi-nudity. There are many other folks there, but they are of the commonalty, and beneath the Tuluut's attention. I, however, notice them patronizingly, and they grin from ear to ear by way of reply. While the rather lengthy operation of preparing the coffee goes on, the family produce their penates to entertain me, while the women examine the texture of my coat and scarlet shirt most knowingly. Samuel shows me his tools, and how he uses them; his spears and harpoons, and allunaks, and the work-box he made for his wife (which does him much credit), and some patterns for slippers, painted in colors by his little boy, who was once one of my particular henchmen, but is now dead.

He himself has just recovered from a long sickness, and is very pale. He plays a tune on the fiddle, and the younger members of his family, who have been out gathering blueberries, dance most joyfully to it. He has likewise an accordion; he apologizes for its being a little out of tune, but he had had to open it to show the children where the sound came from! And then the wife (who has been a handsome blue-eyed woman in her day, for they are, of course, all of a mixed breed), with a woman's curiosity, questions me in broken Danish and English and Eskimo, all about my condition in life: if I am married, and how many children and so on, and so on; and all the gossips are delighted. They, to my astonishment, inquire if I do not come from Scotland, and on my expressing astonishment at their knowledge of geography, Samuel produces an ancient map, and points out the land of my nativity. All of this is done leisurely as the "Kavit" boils, and as I sip it in the cleanest of cups, they pour in the soft unction of hyperborean flattery, and assure me with an air which means even more than the words would seem to express, "Efflete eyunelak Tuluut," "You are the good Englishman." "All the Innuit (Eskimo) will miss you, when you are gone, and the little boys will have no one to throw skillings to them now. All of us will have sick hearts when you go away." To all of which an ancient dame on the further side of the "brecks," whom I had hitherto thought only a bundle of sealskins, echoes in a voice as if it came out of a mattress, "Yes, especially the Neviarsuk!"* and the house echoes with laughter, as the joke is apparently thought a good one. I grin like the rest as it is explained to me, though Samuel's daughter blushes crimson, for she is apparently the butt of it. Be it known, however, that the daughter of Samuel bears a highly proper reputation in Aetlunia, and is, I am told in a stage whisper (at which she again blushes), to be the spouse of Peder Zaccharias Brug, when that young gentleman has finished his new kayak, and Pastor Neilssen has time to unite them in the bonds of wedlock.

After we have finished our coffee, we have blueberries and a glass of schnapps, which last is produced with the air of smuggled whiskey; and when we consider how dearly they all like this beverage, the extent of the favor may be imagined. When all is over, and the autumn sun is getting low, I am escorted to the door by the whole family, with many good-bys and hopes to see me again next year, and take my departure homeward. We have a long way yet to go before we meet the stout ship which is to take us to Denmark. We have to share, some snowy nights, the hospitality of an Eskimo hut, — very savory and very warm, — and to pass miserable days and nights enow in dreary Akajaroah.

Snow is falling fast as we leave Greenland behind. All have some little regrets at leaving it. One thinks of the eider-ducks and the reindeer, another of the glorious glaciers and icebergs, like silver castles floating in the summer sunlight on an emerald sea. Everybody joins in one regret that the free-and-easy life — so novel and so wild — is at an end; that behind lies life in its wildest aspect — before us in its most civilized, but also most artificial form.

Yet, after all, how green — how right pleasant — look the fading woods of Elsinore! † how pleasant, yet how strange, are the quaint little villages along the shores of the Cattegat and under the shadow of Hamlet's home! We are strangers to all the news of the outer world, nor can we obtain any. Little knows the Swedish fisherman who sweeps alongside in quest of skin-breeches and schnapps. There is no war in Europe "that he has heard of"; he had never heard of the French Exhibition; and there is no use asking him about the fate of the Reform Bill of 1867; but this he knows, that potatoes are "feer rigedaler and feer skillings a tonder, and that the rye crop ain't worth a snap of the fingers!" A golden-crested wren flies on board from the forests of Jutland. This is very homelike, but still more homely, though not so pretty, is the little collier whose captain and crew curse us, both loud and deep, in the Newcastle dialect, for sanguinary Dutchmen, because we do not choose to get out of his tack. An hour or two afterwards we are on the "Lang Linea," in Copenhagen, shaking a dozen kindly Scandinavian hands, and telling the strange tale of how we disappeared in the outer world so many moons ago.

* Girls.

† Nearly three hundred years ago, the same feeling delighted the scowry-riddled companions of poor Willem Barents, when escaping from their ten months' imprisonment in Nova Zembla. We have Gerrit de Veer telling us in his quaint account of Three Voyages; the like of which has never been seen, read, or heard told of, that when they reached the coast of Lapland, "we saw some trees on the river-side, which comforted us, and made us glad, as if we had then come into a new world; for in a'! the time that we had been out, we had not seen trees."

A GREAT JEWEL ROBBERY.

IN TWO CHAPTERS. — I.

SOME years ago, people used to prophesy that in consequence of the Californian gold discovery the precious metal would be precious no longer, but fall to a par with, if not below, silver in value. But in spite of the golden treasures of California, supplemented by those of Australia, a sovereign is still worth its twenty shillings; and the reports of progress in Sutherlandshire are not sufficiently promising to make the favored of us mortals who indulge in such luxuries to exchange our golden ornaments for their present value before it deteriorates. But as a dealer in precious stones, I have often thought of what would be the consequence should some tremendous deposit of diamonds be laid bare; for we are not bound to suppose that these precious crystals of carbon are everywhere so sparsely scattered over the earth's surface as to render the quest one of patience and difficulty. Imagine, for instance, some pebbly mountain stream, whose pebbles were all Koh-i-noors, Stars of the South, and Great Pitt Diamonds! What consternation amongst the holders of family heirlooms, whose glittering clusters have been handed down from generation to generation, and valued at so many thousands sterling, — what horror to find that, by the glut in the market, those thousands sank to hundreds, to tens, to units at last, or merely the value of the cutting! That lady who described the wearing of diamonds as an exquisite pleasure, but too painful, from the risks incurred, would be then able to wear her precious jewels in peace.

There is a strange, and too often a fearful history attached to every great gem of price, many of which, while flashing on the brow of beauty, or in some regal or imperial ornament, are dimmed to the thoughtful mind by the tears shed over them, or by the blood in which they have too often been bathed. Robbery and murder have ever been mingled with the stories of precious gems; and as a peaceful man, living in these highly civilized times, I have more than once felt my life to be far from safe as soon as it was known that in the little black leathern case I carried, or even in the scrap of tissue-paper in my waistcoat pocket, I held so many valuable diamonds, rubies, or sapphires.

One gets used to it in time; but at first there is a strong feeling that every person who looks at you, or says a word about the weather, is bent upon murder and robbery. You live a solitary life during your travels. You get in the farthest corners of carriages. You would not ride alone in a first coupé with some strange traveller, upon any consideration, even if that strange traveller were a feeble old woman, since you would certainly suppose her to be a ruffian in disguise. Elegantly dressed ladies become swindlers' accomplices; clerical gentlemen, the swindlers themselves; and distrust of everything and everybody becomes the bane of your existence. Your wine or tea seems to be drugged, your food poisoned; and once, at a hotel where I was staying, I had serious thoughts about giving the proprietor into custody for supplying me with medicated soap.

I will not mention the name of the Bond Street firm with which I was some years ago connected, but let it suffice that their name was well known, and that the manufacture of more than one regal diadem had been intrusted to their skilled workmen. I was with them some twelve or fourteen years, and it was during that period that the incident I am about to relate occurred. As a matter of course, the strictest injunctions respecting care, caution, and watchfulness are issued to all the employees, especially to those whose daily business brings them into contact with the public; and being always in the show-rooms myself, I was one of those in whom the elders of the firm placed confidence. The consequence was, that being tolerably thoughtful, sharp of eye, and a good judge of gems, I rose to occupy one of the most responsible positions, and to me were always intrusted those rather delicate, critical, and caution-demanding embassies, where customers wished for jewels to be sent to their houses for inspection.

In course of time, a little feeling of jealousy sprang up; but it did not trouble me, for, either from extra care, or from good fortune, I had not in any single case been the cause of loss to my employers, — a state of satisfaction hardly to be enjoyed by either of my brother-assistants, so many, so ingenious, and so carefully contrived were, in those days, the plans for defrauding the great jewellers. I do not know that any very great improvement has taken place of late years; but my experience is with the past, and I relate accordingly. In fact, so many were the tricks, that when a visitor came to the show-rooms, the first question we had to ask was: "Is this a lady or a sharper?"

Very often the swindlers, or thieves, were easy to detect; for though dressed in the extreme of fashion, and arriving perhaps in a brougham, there would be some slip of the tongue — some vulgarity — which would betray them. Frequently, a misplaced h, or a wrongly applied verb, has raised suspicions, which defeated a carefully planned swindle, and sent the disappointed ones to lament their ill success, or often to jail. But with all care, the jewellers' enemies are so many, and their losses so heavy, that, in spite of enormous profits, the balance-sheets at the end of the year are not so satisfactory as is supposed for those who follow this artistic business. Now a well-dressed couple would come and look at some rings, turn them over for half an hour, and then leave, declaring that there was nothing to suit; when perhaps before, more often after, their departure, one or two valuable gems have been missed, — taken no one could tell how. Twice over, assistants allowed jewels to be taken into the next room, at some hotel, to show a sick lady, and came back ruefully to announce the sick, as well as the sound, lady had disappeared. Times out of number, ring, chain, or bracelet has been snatched from counter or table; once such a thing happened when I was in waiting, but a presented pistol stopped the marauder before he reached the door — a door already bolted by the porter; and my friend was committed for trial, and afterwards transported. One select company of visitors purchased goods to the amount of nine hundred pounds, when the gentleman of the party wrote a check on the spot for the amount, — Drummonds of Charing Cross being his bankers, — but as I objected to the jewels being taken away until the check was honored, I was courteously told to send them to Morley's Hotel, and half sorry to be compelled to show the distrust, I bowed the distinguished customers out.

"Here, Johnson," I said to one of our men, "run down at once to Drummonds, and present this check; take a cab."

In half an hour Johnson was back with the check branded with the words "No effects."

I received an invitation to dine with the head of our firm after that, and returned home at night wearing a very handsome gold watch. "A reward for your shrewdness," said the old gentleman, clapping me on the shoulder. "You'll be in the firm yet, Willis, that you will."

"I hope I may," I thought, as I went home that night; but the happy consummation never arrived, since I was but mortal, and, like other men, liable to be deceived; though, upon maturer consideration, I don't think I was very well used.

I was seated one day busily examining some stones which were to be reset for the Countess of Maraschino, when the principal came softly in.

"Lock those up, Willis," he said, "and go and attend to those parties in the front show-room. Thomas is with them, and I don't half like their looks."

I hurried into the show-room to relieve Mr. Thomas of his task, which he gave up with a very bad grace, and proceeded to listen to the demands of a tall lady and gentleman in black, both of whom wore respirators, and spoke in low, husky voices. The gentleman looked very pale and ill, and the lady was very closely veiled as to the upper part of her face; but upon my approach she threw up her fall, and displayed the bright bold eyes of a very handsome woman.

"Don't look suspicious," I thought, as I evaded the glance directed at me; for our rule is not to look at eyes, but hands, — or rather fingers, which sometimes turn out to be light. In this case, though, the lady's were bien gantée, and the gentleman's thin, white, and soft, — an invalid's hands, in fact, and I proceeded to listen to their demands.

"Well, Lilla, what's it to be?" said the gentleman.

"I thought you had decided, love," was the reply. "Something simple, and not too expensive now, whatever we may decide upon hereafter. Why not keep to what you said, — a bracelet, or a cross?"

"Well, show me some bracelets," the gentleman said. "We do not want anything of high price, but something pretty, light, and suited for a young lady of eighteen, about to be married."

I proceeded to open case after case of bracelets of all prices, from ten to five hundred guineas each; but though they were fastidious and hard to please, I was bound to confess that the lady's taste was excellent, and that the gentleman was no mean connoisseur in gems.

"I rather like that," said the gentleman at last, selecting a very pretty but slight bracelet, set with a sapphire, surrounded by pearls. "What is the price?"

"That is sixty guineas," I said.

"Yes, it's pretty enough," said the lady; "but not sufficiently good."

"You mean not valuable enough," said the gentleman: "but you know the old proverb about the gift-horse. Lucille will not study the value, depend upon it; and, besides, I don't see anything I like half so well."

"Have it then, dear," was the reply; and then, directly after, "Ah, what a sweet cross!" exclaimed the lady, looking at an enamel and gold ornament lying in a case, — and which I immediately opened, for I must confess I had almost forgotten our principal's suspicions.

"It is a sweet little thing!" exclaimed the lady, examining the cross; "such a fine pearl, too, in the centre. I should like it."

"What, to give to Lucille?" said the gentleman, smiling.

"No; of course not. I fancied it myself."

"My dear Lilla, this is not a linendraper's shop," said the gentleman with a shrug, and then there was a smile and a whisper between them.

"What is the price of the cross?" said the gentleman at last.

"Fifty guineas," I said.

"It seems a good deal for so small an ornament," said the gentleman, turning and re-turning the cross; but I explained that the size of the pearls increased its value; and after a little hesitation, he decided to take it, when I saw that he was rewarded by a quiet pressure of the hand from his companion, whose eyes then met mine almost mirthfully for a moment.

"You're a nice creature, I expect," muttered I to myself; "coax him out of everything you fancy, and then laugh in your sleeve." But my eyes were wanted to guard the valuable assortment of jewelry displayed, and they were back the next instant to business.

"Where can I send these, sir?" I inquired.

"Ah! we'll take them," said the lady; "we will not trouble you to send."

I explained that it would be no trouble, but they held to their determination; and upon payment being requested, the gentleman drew out a check-book, asked for pen and ink, and wrote a check for one hundred and ten guineas upon a small city bank.

Now it was that my lips became a little tighter, and I felt that the principal had had some cause for his suspicions; and thoroughly on my guard, I took the check, and explained that it was a rule of the establishment that goods should not be delivered until after a check had been presented.

"Ah, quite right, quite right," said the gentleman quietly, and without displaying the slightest annoyance. "I can easily suppose that you are obliged to be careful."

But the lady looked angry, and returned my bow very distantly as I ushered them out, having promised to send the purchases on to the fashionable hotel—Moore's, in Brook Street—at which they were staying.

"All a farce, but well carried out," I said to the principal as he came up to me, and I showed him the check and the card given me, bearing the name "Mr. H. Elliston Ross," and in pencil, "Moore's Hotel." "But we'll send the check all the same. Here, Johnson."

The principal shrugged his shoulders: and as Johnson came up to where I was carefully running over the various items of jewelry, to see that nothing had been stolen, I gave him the check, and he went cityward.

To my great satisfaction, all was right; not a jewel missing, and the purchased cases lying by me. Suddenly, a cold chill shot through me. Had they contrived to abstract the contents? I tore the little morocco boxes open; but, no—all was correct. Cross and bracelet lay upon their white velvet beds; and so far, everything was perfectly satisfactory. If they were swindlers, we had escaped; and I began to wonder whether I should get another invitation to dinner, a chain for my watch, and be told that I was a step nearer to the junior partnership.

To our intense astonishment, though, at an hour's end, Johnson returned smiling.

"All right, sir," he said.

"Why, you don't mean—"

"All right, sir," he said. "Check cashed in an instant: hundred and fifteen pounds, ten shillings."

It is almost needless to add that the two little cases were sent immediately to the hotel, and a discussion followed respecting unnecessary suspicion, and how very often it happened that swindlers passed unnoticed, while honest people were suspected.

POACHING ON MONT BLANC A DOZEN YEARS AGO.

AFTER spending one of the hottest July days that I can remember in roaming about the gardens and galleries of Versailles, I returned to Paris in time to dine with an old friend and start in his company by the night mail to Dijon and Dôle on our way to Geneva. At 4.30 A. M. we were stepping into the malle-poste which in 1857 afforded the swiftest means of reaching our destination. The little vehicle could only take three passengers, but was urged along all day at the full speed of four horses, which were never allowed to walk even in the steepest parts of the ascent. Now I am not going to act the part of a Conservative laudator temporis acti, so far as to deny the advantages of railways over coaches in general; but I have no hesitation in asserting that those who now wriggle over the rails through dark tunnels and profundities from Ambérieux to Geneva can have no kind of conception of the marvellous treat which awaited those who approached it over the summit of the Jura. Our only companion was a very agreeable and cultivated Frenchman, who turned out to be the préfet of the department through which we were passing. From Les Rousses the horses were kept at an ambling trot up the long slopes of the mountain: the appearance of the country was very dull and monotonous, but we could see that we had attained a considerable height; presently the gentle trot upwards was exchanged for full speed, and our French friend said, "Regardez maintenant, vous allez voir quelque chose."

The préfet was right. We flew round a corner, and in an instant saw, as it were by enchantment, a new and more beautiful world. The whole Lake of Geneva, with its more than fifty miles of length, lay stretched out before us and beneath a vast crescent of sky-blue shining under the cloudless canopy of heaven. At our feet were the green slopes and picturesque villages through which lay the remainder of our road; and, far across the lake, high above the intervening ranges of Savoy, Mont Blanc and his attendant peaks rose in spotless beauty through the deep blue sky.

In no part of the world have I ever seen so sudden a transition from absolute dullness to indescribable perfection; but as the railroad keeps far away, it is highly probable that what we saw will never more be beheld by the speed-loving generation of tourists. With a sensation as of having seen heaven opened before our eyes, we rapidly descended to Geneva and arrived there at four o'clock.

Mont Blanc was our destination, and the following evening found us at Chamouni, where we were welcomed as old friends at the Hôtel de Londres by M. Édouard Tairraz and his good-tempered wife. The Hôtel d'Angleterre had not yet flaunted its banners and its balconies over the surrounding buildings: and comparative simplicity was the order of the day. But amidst this comparative simplicity there existed one enormity which we were resolved to resist: the extortionate tariff and tyrannical code of the guides cried aloud for redress, and we had come with the secret purpose of striking at least one blow at the system, and anticipated no small amusement from the attempt. The guides had established a kind of trade's union in its most objectionable form; good and bad were all equally inscribed on the roll, and those who wanted their services must take them in order as they came. It was of no avail to plead old acquaintance with one whom you knew by past experience to be in every way a superior man; in vain did the best men complain that their better education, their greater linguistic or scientific knowledge was thrown away: they were all levelled by the obdurate roll, and you must take whoever was pointed out by that detested document. The men who could thus tyrannize over one another and over the public in one way could of course do so in other ways, and they established a system of charges which was outrageous enough to be ridiculous if it had not been too annoying to laugh at. By this Draconian code every traveller who wished to go up Mont Blanc was obliged to take four guides, and if the party consisted of two or three friends they must take eight or a dozen guides as the case might be. Eight of these men received one hundred francs, so that every traveller had to pay £ 16 to begin with, besides extravagant charges for feeding the party and numerous extras which were sure to be tacked on at the end. On the whole it may be considered that £ 25 apiece, the usual total, was rather a large payment for a couple of days' amusement in the ascent of what is, after all, the easiest of the very high mountains of the Alps: at all events, it was eight times as much as we had paid in the previous year for the much more difficult ascent of Monte Rosa. We knew that a party of plucky Englishmen had lately discovered a new route from St. Gervais, and succeeded in reaching the summit of the mountain without the assistance of guides beyond the top of the Aiguille du Goûté. The regulations of Chamouni were not binding upon the inhabitants of St. Gervais; but we wished to do something towards bringing the old route more within the reach of the aspiring public, especially on account of the great advantages offered by the hut of the Grands Mulets over the cold and dreary halting-place upon the somewhat formidable Aiguille.

We spent the first day in a leisurely ascent of the Brevent, which enabled us to study "the monarch" for several hours with our telescopes, and gave our legs the first stretching after a long imprisonment in London. The next day we increased the good effect upon our own limbs, and saved two Americans a certain number of francs by undertaking to be their amateur guides to the Jardin. This was good practice, and we then began the preparations for our main undertaking.

A man named Bossonney held what in diplomatic language would be called the portfolio of guide-chef; that is to say, he sat behind a table in a little room called the Bureau des Guides, where he was engaged in the perpetual study of the book of the roll, like Buddha absorbed in the contemplation of his own perfections. He was a hard man, one who would like to reap without sowing; and we knew that poaching in his preserves would be considered an unpardonable offence. Nevertheless, the thing was to be done; and, as Englishmen are rightly taught to study the means by which their forefathers obtained liberty, so ought the rising generation of mountaineers to know and appreciate the difficulties gone through by their predecessors before the complete establishment of the right by which they are now enabled to break their necks as they please, and in such company as they may select for themselves.

We knew that any revelation of a wish to ascend Mont Blanc accompanied by any amount of supplication would be perfectly useless with M. Bossonney; we therefore had recourse to subtlety and throwing dust in his tyrannical eyes. We walked quietly into the lion's den with a "Bonjour, Monsieur Bossonney." "Bonjour, messieurs," he replied.

We proceeded to tell him we had an idea of going to the Grands Mulets, but we had heard that the tariff was higher than we liked paying —

"Fain would I climb, but that I fear to pay."

He told us, as we knew well enough, that we must have four guides between us, and pay them forty francs each. "But, my dear Monsieur Bossonney, you know we have both had some experience of the high mountains; we have both made the ascent of the great and terrible Monte Rosa; surely you will allow us to make such an expedition as that to the Grands Mulets with a smaller number of guides than if we were raw novices who had never been beyond the Montanvert."

We might as well have spoken to the winds. The inexorable Bossonney replied that such was the règlement, and though he might perhaps have wished if possible to make an exception in our favor, yet there was nothing but to submit. It was like the Mussulman repeating, "There is but one God, and Mahomet is his prophet." Pretending to be convinced of the propriety of his reasoning, we shifted our ground and asked who would be the guides whom the tender mercies of the roll would intrust with our preservation. He saw that we were knocking under, and, with a gracious smile upon his unprepossessing face, he looked into the mystic scroll, and informed us that the favored individuals would be Zacharie Cachat, Jean-Pierre Payot, Michel Simond, and Pierre-Tobie Simond. It so chanced that my companion had on a former occasion been satisfied with the last of these men, and I knew by repute that Cachat was one of the best men in Chamouni. So we submitted with apparent reluctance, and said something corresponding to "what must be, must."

The next thing to be done was to order Zacharie Cachat, as the leading man, to come to the hotel for instructions for the morrow. For fear of anything going wrong, we took good care not to let M. Edouard, the landlord, have an inkling of our scheme; and even the faithful Auguste Balmat, though an independent friend, was kept in equally total darkness. In due time Cachat was confronted in the bureau of the hotel with ourselves and M. Edouard, who was in his normal state of slight confusion, arising from a superabundance of champagne. He was alive to business, but he preferred that his wife should sit down at the desk and do duty as scribe.

Hearing that our intention was to go to the Grands Mulets next day, and to take a fitting amount of food for the occasion, he looked very solemn; and, waving his hand with much dignity to his better half, he said, "Écrivez donc, madame." Pondering for a moment, as if he were going to dictate terms of peace to a conquered nation, he told her to begin the list with two chickens, two bottles of St. George, four bottles of Beaujolais. The worthy man was evidently getting into the regular swing, but we saw he was starting from false premises; it was quite evident that the supply proposed by him would be altogether inadequate for the refreshment of the party during the two days which would be required for the fulfilment of our scheme. I stopped him therefore by remarking that we did not intend to return the same day; that, in fact, our great object was to see the sunset from the Grands Mulets; and that, as we could not recross the glacier after dark, we should be obliged to spend the night there, and have the additional satisfaction of seeing the sunrise next morning. In fact, we should want provisions for two days instead of one.

"Ah! vous voulez coucher là-haut?" said M. Édouard. "Eh bien! donc, madame, mettez le double." So the provision list started afresh with four chickens, four bottles of St. George, eight bottles of Beaujolais, and so on, tapering off with the usual additions of tea, coffee, sugar, &c., which, being charged at fabulous prices in proportion to the amount supplied, form very profitable though humble items in a Chamouni bill. It was lucky, however, that we had given no sign about Mont Blanc, as everything would have been doubled again.

Business over, we had nothing to do but enjoy ourselves for the evening; and after dinner wandered out into the flowery fields to watch one of those magnificent sunsets which are so deeply impressive among the mountains. Darkness was fast approaching in the valley when the summit of Mont Blanc was still glorious with the last light of its rosy crown: and it was with no small pleasure that we looked with confidence for fine weather in the morning. It was intensely interesting to watch this splendid object, and to think of the delightful excitement which we hoped to derive from it in the coming day. If we succeeded in reaching the summit, and if old Bosoney spied us with his telescope, how great would be his wrath, and how great would be our satisfaction in laughing at his beard.

Next morning, about ten o'clock, we made a very quiet start, carefully avoiding the rather ostentatious death-or-victory kind of appearance which used frequently to characterize mountaineering parties in the days when transcendents of Le Mont Blanc were sufficiently rare to have their names inscribed on shields against the wall of the hotel. We let the men straggle out of the village, and followed them at our leisure, feeling our tendency to inward chuckling slightly tempered by the knowledge that the enemy might still anticipate our intentions and spoil our sport.

We were not quite easy at the sight of a fifth man having joined our four guides; he might be an emissary of the detested Bosoney sent to frighten our men from playing any tricks with the supreme government of extortioners. Cachat's explanation that it was a porter hired by the guides themselves to assist them in carrying up wood and provisions restored calm to our troubled mind, and we began to feel as poachers must be supposed to feel when they have successfully dodged the game-keepers. So we go happily over the well-known path, twining through the rich shade of the fir-trees, cheered by the ripple of lively streams, and climbing between beds of pink rhododendrons, till we begin to leave all vegetation behind, and the last few straggling scraps of half-dead pines warn us to pick up sticks while we can, if we have any wish for hot supper and warm feet that night on the Grands Mulets.

Each one was now condemned, like the mythical Man in the Moon, to carry his own fagot, as we filed round the narrow path which leads towards the Pierre de l'Échelle and the upper part of the Glacier des Bossons. Reaching the former in about three hours after leaving Chamouni, we prepared for an early dinner on the mountain-side. Up to this moment we had not allowed a word or a sign to give the slightest indication to our guides that there was anything behind the scenes: we were only supposed to be quietly going to the Grands Mulets, the situation of which, at about 10,000 feet above the sea, I presume to be pretty generally known. But, as the simple feast drew to a conclusion, and the guides looked merry over the red wine, we thought the hour had come for revealing our aspirations, and we asked them whether they would go with us to the summit of Mont Blanc, in defiance of Bosoney and all his works. Old Simond's rather dry face relaxed in a moment; Zacharie's sagacious eye twinkled with delight; and the younger men tossed their hats in the air with shouts of satisfaction.

We then found that we were not the only members of the party who had been enjoying the possession of a secret. The guides, who knew that we had both had tolerable experience among the mountains, came to the conclusion that we could not be going to content ourselves with the Grands Mulets, and had secretly supplied themselves with all that would be required for the ascent of the monarch himself.

This was so far highly satisfactory, and loud was the laughter as each man of the company produced his contribution of hidden stores. Tobie Simond was, I think, the man who brought from within the lining of his coat a canvas-sided lantern, which folded up flat, but which when set into proper form would be invaluable for examining crevasses in the early morning. Others had packed long snow-gaiters under chickens and bread, and one had brought a packet of prunes, knowing that at great altitudes nothing is so comforting to the mouth as the continual sucking of their stones. Seeing that all due precautions had been taken, we proceeded to draw up a solemn treaty. It was agreed that if the four men liked to go with us to the summit we would pay them each the conventional hundred francs, though nothing would have induced us to take eight men, according to the rules, on the same terms. They wanted us at first to promise to pay any fines that might be imposed upon them for breaking the rules, but we absolutely refused, remarking that they could easily do that out of the difference between a hundred francs and the forty which would be their pay to the Grands Mulets only. We carried the day upon this point, and were thinking what should be settled next, when Old Simond, the Nestor of the party, who seemed deeply pondering, suddenly brought down his hand with a violent slap upon his knee, and with the energy of a sudden inspiration, proceeded to unfold a scheme, the ingenuity of which was worthy of a better cause.

"Listen to me," said he in effect, "I will show you in a moment what should be done; follow my advice, and neither the gentlemen nor ourselves will have to pay fines. Voyez donc! We are seven men in all, is it not so? Two gentlemen, four guides, and one porter. Well, my friends, suppose that one guide remains at the Grands Mulets to keep the porter company, while the two gentlemen and the other three guides go to the top of Mont Blanc. Ha! do you not see? Depend upon it that Bossoney and other people will be looking out to-morrow morning, and with their telescopes they will count five men upon the summit, but there is no telescope in Chamouni that can make them see the difference between one man and another at such a distance as that. We will return home in the evening, and we will tell all the world that one of the gentlemen ascended the mountain in company with the full number of four guides, but that the other gentleman was ill and remained at the Grands Mulets, with the porter to take care of him. So shall we not have to pay fines at all. Is it not so, my friends? Have I not spoken the words of wisdom?"

The wily orator "paused for a reply"; his proposition was received with the hearty applause of his comrades, but we were obliged to remark that though he might have spoken the words of wisdom, they were certainly not the words of truth. We could have nothing to do with lying, and they must boldly take their chance of the consequences of discovery. Magna est veritas. Besides, our special object was to show the absurdity of the rules, and we wished to tell everybody that we had proved it by making a successful expedition without obeying them. Another very sufficient reason for rejecting the old fellow's proposal was the recollection that Bossoney, in spite of other short-comings, was not such a fool as to believe the story. It would have been very difficult for myself and my friend to decide who should play the part of the "malade imaginaire," for Mont Blanc puts a brand as of a red-hot iron upon the faces of those who invade his noble head.

The little congress broke up in a very happy frame of mind; we had all made up our minds to ascend the mountain, and we felt that the delight of the expedition would be doubled by its illegality. Everybody knows that "stolen joys are sweetest." So the knapsacks and the fagots were picked up again from their stony bed, a rickety ladder was found and dragged forth from its usual hiding-place under the Pierre de l'Échelle, and away we went across the glacier. It was in a terribly torn and broken condition, and a novice would have been puzzled as to how he should get upon it at all; a series of vast blocks and melting pinnacles of ice at the edge of the glacier seemed to separate us from the smoother region beyond; but Cachat soon solved the problem by marching up to one of the thinnest of the obstructions, in which the melting process had formed a sort of central window. This was widened by a few blows from his axe, and we safely passed through this eye of an ice-needle, which led us to the well-known and magnificent route across the glacier. We were sometimes picking our way along a white ridge with a deep blue chasm on each side of us, beautiful to behold; sometimes scrambling among blocks of ice at the bottom of a crevasse into which they had tumbled, and looking carefully upward to see if any more were ready to follow their example and alight upon our heads; finally, when all other means of progression failed, we had to appeal to the ladder as the only means of clearing an otherwise impassable obstruction.

So far, so good. The scrambling was to us only an additional charm in the day's adventure, but a far more serious difficulty was suggested by the appearance of the weather. Wild, ugly clouds, which at first contented themselves with sailing far over our heads, began now to show unmistakable signs of coming to close quarters; and presently we found ourselves pelted by an unmerciful mixture of hail and rain. The hail, however, was a good symptom: in a short time the air grew cooler and brighter; and as we labored up the last snow slopes to the hut upon the Grands Mulets, we could see the rain-drops on the edge of the roof glittering like diamonds in the restored sunshine. The sunset was glorious, as the sky was by that time perfectly clear. Of the thousands who have watched from below the magnificent spectacle of departing day among the high Alps, comparatively few can have experienced the sensation of forming, as it were, a part of the rosy-tinted picture. It is, however, an experience well worth the making. The sun was still above the horizon for us, while the shades of evening were fast closing around Chamouni in the depths of 6,500 feet below the wild rocks where we were sitting. Presently the sun made its last grand expiring effort; the gloom beneath us increased, but our airy perch was glowing with deep rosy light, and nothing could be more marvellous than the contrast presented by the dull gray upon one side of every rock, and the flush which warmed the other side with transcendent glory.

The dark shadow crept up the mountain towards our feet; extinguishing the last glow upon the Grands Mulets, it passed upwards to the summit of Mont Blanc, and the night of death reigned upon the cold white mountain. I know of few things so deeply impressive as the sudden transition from the red glow upon a lofty mountain at sunset to the ghastly white which immediately succeeds it; it is painfully suggestive of the strong man subdued by him who rides upon the pale horse.

Well, let the dead bury their dead; one day was gone, and we had not much time to prepare for the next, which we naturally expected would be one of the most interesting and exciting in our lives. Le jour est mort. Vive le jour! We prepared supper in the hut after a very primitive fashion; a fire was already burning in the little stove, over which was an iron bowl, stuffed full with snow as a preliminary to soup. We and our guides sat upon the floor, doing justice to the landlord's cold meat and chickens, and throwing at intervals into the seething caldron, not exactly "liver of blaspheming Jew," but goodly drumsticks, with lumps of mutton and bread. Somebody suggested the addition of wine, and a bottle of Beaujolais was instantly poured into the broth. In due time this rather singular mixture was boiled into a warm and comfortable nightcap, and I doubt if any production of the Palais-Royal was ever more thoroughly enjoyed. The stars were shining in fullest splendor when we took a last peep at the weather; and the moon, though hidden from us by the intervening masses of the Monts Maudits, lighted up the opposite Dôme du Goûté like a wall of silver. About half past nine o'clock we lay down upon the boards with knapsacks for our pillows; one guide at a time sitting up to whistle at the sticks and feed the fire.

Under the combined influences of hard beds and excitement, neither I nor my companion contrived to get a moment of sleep. We knew, however, that a good deal of rest and strength is derived from the mere fact of lying still, listening to the guides breaking up wood and snoring alternately by the weird light of our little fire. At last our chief cook gave vent to a snore of such astonishing and almost superhuman force that with one loud laugh all the rest of the party gave up the pretence of sleep, and, finding that midnight was near at hand, began to prepare for departure.

Coffee and eggs were cooked, long woollen gaiters were produced, and the lantern was set in order among many a lively jest about our enemy Bossoney, who was slumbering in the valley, and, like charity, thinking no evil as to what might be taking place so far above his head. About half past twelve everything was ready: one by one we filed out of the hut, fastened together about three yards apart by the rope round our waists, the first man carrying the lantern and keeping a sharp look-out for crevasses. The search became very interesting now and then, when near the base of the Dôme we found ourselves among cavernous clefts imperfectly covered with snow, and requiring some care to avoid what would at all events have been a disagreeable smothering in the cold hours of the morning. We passed steadily upwards to the Petit Plateau, hurriedly crossed the debris of fresh avalanches of ice from the séracs of the Dôme, and about four o'clock found ourselves among the vast sublimities of the Grand Plateau just as the summit of Mont Blanc full in front of us was tinged with the first touches of that glorious rose-color which generally promises a successful day. It was a moment of the purest delight. There was no difficulty in choosing a place for our temporary camp; we were on a huge plain of spotless snow, in as firm and excellent condition as could be desired. So down went knapsacks, and squatting round them in a ring, we proceeded to breakfast upon part of their contents. The pipe of contemplation followed, during which we leisurely looked over the work before us. How magnificently rose the mountain, still five thousand feet over our heads, glistening under the deep blue sky, and now of a certainty within our grasp!

The whole party being in very lively spirits, we began to think that as the expedition had commenced with illegality it might as well conclude with irregularity. Why should we go up by the ordinary safety-seeking route of the Corridor, when the long-deserted slopes of the Ancien Passage tempted us to the excitement of following a track which we heard had never been pursued since that day in 1820, when Dr. Hamel's guides were killed in attempting it? What says Cachat to this proposal? He makes a careful observation with the telescope, and then delivers an oracle to the effect that the snow up there, to the right of the Rochers Rouges, is in such good condition that we may try the experiment without fear of avalanches. Any one at all conversant with the general view of Mont Blanc will know that the route we proposed is far more direct to the summit, though considerably steeper than the ordinary one. It was only abandoned in consequence of the danger of avalanches from such a highly inclined slope. Little did we then care for extra steepness; and, with the sage Cachat's opinion against any present danger from the state of the snow, we resolved to go up by the Ancien Passage, and complete the tour by returning down the Mur de la Côte and the Corridor.

The greater part of our provisions were here left behind in knapsacks, only a small store for a treat being taken with us to the summit. We went straight across the Grand Plateau in a line for the mountain, and soon began a steady climb up a slope of firm snow. The inclination was at first moderate, but it soon became steeper, and the comfortable snow was exchanged for so hard a surface that step-cutting was necessary. Before long the slope grew steeper, the ice harder; we had to make much deeper steps for safety, and began to think of old saws about the unprofitableness of short cuts. The progress was slow, and hours were passing; still, whenever we raised our heads, there were the same vast blocks of ice about the summit of the Rochers Rouges, looking scarcely nearer or larger than when we had selected them as landmarks from the plain below. At length, however, we approached the base of an enormous buttress of ice which presented a perpendicular wall of glistening blue to the height of nearly 100 feet. We had calculated on being able to pass to the left of this splendid obstacle, and steps were accordingly cut slantingly, with great care, up the surface of a slope which we found with a good instrument to have an inclination of 60°. As the guides, however, knew no more than we did of the route we were taking, it was less surprising than disappointing to find on laboriously reaching the left corner that we were cut off from that side by inaccessible profundities of ice. Meanwhile a severe north wind had been rapidly increasing, and most of us began to feel the bitterness of severe cold in a situation where it was impossible to quicken our movements or to trust our feet out of the steps. Cachat himself seemed particularly suffering and anxious. However, as all progress was cut off on the left, we were compelled to turn to the right, and he began to make the best of the way.

The situation was peculiar, and rather calculated to try the nerves of a man who knew that he was frost-bitten and falling below the mark. He led the way, hoping to warm himself by the hard work of cutting steps horizontally along the base of the wall. We followed him cautiously, all taking the utmost care of the rope; our left shoulders touched the vertical blue ice, while, on our right down went the slope which, beginning at an angle of 60°, swept clean away to the Grand Plateau, nearly 4,000 feet beneath. Presently he turned round to me, and asked for a drop of brandy from my flask. This I gave him, and he cut a few more steps, but he then turned round again and said sorrowfully, "Je n'en peux plus."

Payot was next behind me in the line, so he went to the front; but it required all our care and steadiness to untie him from his own place and pass him forward to the front of the discomfited Cachat. Once there, he soon finished the task; we passed the obstacle safely with the aid of a few more steps; and turning its corner, soon reached a moderate slope which brought us to the Petits Mulets, a small rocky point near which our route meets the ordinary one from the Corridor. Here we halted for a while and examined the case of poor Cachat; he took off his boots and stockings and found both his feet completely frost-bitten. He said he could go no farther, but would stay behind on the sheltered side of the rock, and rub his feet with snow while we completed the ascent of the mountain.

The sky was now cloudless and our faces were fast burning with the light of a July sun upon the snow; but the cold of the furious north wind was terrific. Its penetrating power may be inferred from the fact that when I took out my thermometer at this point, it stood at 12° below freezing-point, though it was in a wash-leather case and had been all the morning in the inside breast-pocket of a strong coat buttoned close to my body. Leaving our chief in the snuggest place to be found among the rocks, we pushed upwards, with the comfortable knowledge that we had no further difficulties to contend with, if only we could keep ourselves from being blown away into space.

The upper slopes of Mont Blanc are easy enough; we had nothing to do but to go ahead independently of one another, and the wind was our only enemy. My companion had a fur cap with sides to protect his ears and tie under his chin. I tied my wideawake on my head with a handkerchief; and while one hand held the alpenstock the other was employed to keep my coat, waistcoat, and shirt from the fate of being scattered to the winds. It was useless to speak to one another; even a shout could not be heard easily amid the terrible noise of the wind, roaring over ridgy snow and driving countless pieces of detached ice over its hard and irregular surface. My feet were perfectly insensible by reason of the cold; but, as I was otherwise in such good condition as to feel no difficulty or inconvenience in the ascent, I found that I could dispense with the ordinary use of my alpenstock and turn it to considerable profit in another way. Carrying the friendly pole with the iron point uppermost, I made a vigorous thrust with the wooden end at each foot as it came in turn to the front. This is a device which I recommend with the utmost confidence to those who may find themselves in similar situations. Small changes delight those who suffer from monotony; prisoners love to watch the evolutions of a spider; and so I found a distinct interest in hammering my own feet during the least agreeable part of the expedition. There was a certain amount of sport in the uncertainty of hitting or missing, and there was much comfort when at length a slightly stinging sensation announced returning life. The only drawback was that a few days afterwards my feet appeared covered with bruises to attest the accuracy of my aim; but amongst communities who are in the habit of wearing shoes and stockings it will be admitted that such a consideration is a "trifle light as air."

In this fashion I steadily pushed up the calotte of the mountain till, lifting my eyes for a moment, I found that no one was in front, no one was near me. Looking back, I was horrified to see my friend some distance below, lying on his back with the guides standing over him. I ran down to him as fast as I could against the wind, and was not a little glad to find that he was only suffering from a sudden fit of that strange vertigo which is occasionally experienced at high altitudes. A few drops of brandy and a few moments' rest completely restored him to his normal strength and activity. We made a vigorous rush, and presently were brought to a standstill by finding that there was nothing more to climb. Our feet were on the summit of Mont Blanc, and our eyes ranged over the plains and mountains of North Italy. An attempt to stand in such a wind on the highest crest of snow would have involved the probability of some of the party being blown over the precipices of the Peteret; so we crept cautiously down a few feet on the southern side, and seated ourselves comfortably on the snow. We were facing the sun, and completely sheltered from the wind. It was peace after the noise and uproar of a battle,—a battle waged against the noisiest and most turbulent of the spirits of the air.

Ah! how pleasant it was to pile arms by sticking our alpenstocks into the snow, to empty the provision-knapsacks, and to sit down upon them with our backs to the sunny side of the dazzling crest! The only casualty was poor Zacharie Cachat, whom we had been obliged to leave far below us, kicking his frozen feet against the rocks. He had started with such a complete appreciation of the fun involved in a poaching expedition, that we were very heartily sorry to miss his ruddy face when in the hour of triumph we drank the health of the guide-chief with the liveliest of ironical cheers.

We fastened the thermometer facing the sun; but though it was now ten o'clock on a cloudless July morning, the mercury did not rise above 24° Fahr. during the half-hour which we spent upon the summit of the mountain. The terrible vent du Nord made itself felt, even though we were sheltered from its direct violence. Only a few feet over our heads we could hear at short intervals the hissing, crackling noise caused by volumes of dry snow and loose pieces of ice being driven by the blast in those long white streamers which, seen against the dark blue sky, are described in the valley by the expression, "Le mont Blanc fume sa pipe." The wind seemed irritated by our having escaped from its grasp, and by the gayety and happiness which prevailed in our little party as we proceeded to smoke our pipes also on the sheltered side of the snow-roof. It began to throw out skirmishers with the object of turning our flank; and one of them, coming round the corner with a savage puff, succeeded in blowing down my alpenstock, which at once began to roll over the steep snow-slope at our feet. In an instant I jumped forward to catch it before it could make a fatal leap over the boundless precipices which form the southern side of the mountain; but one of the guides stopped me with a scream of terror, and then made it sufficiently plain that it was better for me to lose my alpenstock than to run the risk of breaking my neck in an attempt to recover it.

There seemed much reason in this line of argument; so, though I felt a little sulky at being interrupted in what I intended for a rather brilliant dash, I resigned myself to the fate of my trusty weapon in the same way as some people are said to resign themselves to the misfortunes of their animate friends. It had only a few yards to roll: then it clicked against a rocky edge, and in the next moment was out of sight, bounding from crag to crag until perhaps its iron spike acted as a skewer to one of "those few sheep" which nibble the wilderness at the base of the Peteret, many thousands of feet below.

I did not allow myself to be seriously disturbed by the prospect of descending without this customary assistant to the human legs; we were engrossed in utter enjoyment of the situation. Let us think about this matter for a while; for, depend upon it, whatever scoffers may say to the contrary, it is well worth while to spend a scrap of one's earthly life upon the summit of Mont Blanc. Those who have been there are not likely to forget the spectacle revealed to them; and to those who have not been there, or in some similar situation, it is almost unless to attempt description. I would rather confine myself to an analogy. Doubtless most people must at some time or other have watched one of those majestic clouds, gray below and turret-clad with white above, rising almost to a point in the clear summer sky, and wondered what would be the sensation of riding on the highest summit among the celestial blue: the top of Mont Blanc will probably explain it to them. The height is sufficient to present the eye with a panorama of about two hundred miles in every direction, so it is easy to take a map and calculate what may be seen in favorable weather, though it is impossible to describe how marvellously the various objects are transfigured by the effects of atmosphere and distance.

The principal phenomenon to be recorded on this occasion was one that I never saw before or since during a considerable experience of the High Alps. The sky was cloudless, so that we could delight ourselves with observing range after range of snowy mountains, and tracing deep valleys leading to the Italian plains; but everything in the marvellous landscape was tinged with a delicate shade of pink, as if we were looking upon a wonderful world through the medium of a rosy gauze. Others must decide if we were right, but we arrived unanimously at the conclusion that this unusual and almost mysterious appearance must be connected with the fact, that the air around us was charged with infinitely fine spiculae of powdery snow, flying wildly before the wind.

Before leaving our magnificent throne it may be worth while to examine for a moment the position of those worthy but most misguided individuals who apply the cui bono principle to mountains, and ask with solemn air, "Did the ascent repay you?" To ask such a question of a true mountaineer is simply to insult him, as completely as we should insult a pious man by asking him whether, after all, he really thought it worth while to go to heaven. Repay? Repay for what? We were neither sick nor sorry. We had not been fatigued or uncomfortable, and if time had permitted we should have liked to remain all day where we were, in the enjoyment of a happiness that was perfect. It must be admitted that the wind was very cold: this however was no serious inconvenience, and may be dismissed as trivial. Though the barometer stands at sixteen inches on the summit of Mont Blanc, representing an abstraction of nearly half the atmosphere, yet we were not conscious of any effect whatever from the rarefaction of the air. We had not felt any desire to halt in the upper regions of the mountain, but went steadily up; and, as I have said before, were astonished at finding ourselves so easily on the topmost ridge with nothing in Europe above us.

So at least we thought at that time. A touch of sorrow might have mixed with our satisfaction if we could then have dreamed that in these later days a generation would arise to blaspheme the supremacy of Mont Blanc in Europe, and to declare with trumpet sound that the Caucasian Kasbek and Elbruz shall reign in his stead. There was something cruel in this part of the excellent work done by our three Alpine brethren; but on the other hand it is very comforting to find that they have done something towards dispelling another delusion. In recording the fact that at a height of three thousand feet above the highest of the Alps, they found no more inconvenience from the rarefaction of the air than if they had been upon the Rigi, they tend to establish a hope that properly trained and healthy men may some day reach far greater altitudes than have yet been touched on the Himalaya and the Andes. Even if Mount Everest and Kinchinjunga may remain invincible, surely some one will be found to complete Humboldt's work on Chimborazo, or to look down upon Bolivia from the heights of Sorata and Illimani. As the modest nature of our expedition was inconsistent with champagne, we had no opportunity of testing the statement that all the contents of the bottle would fly away in a fountain as soon as the cork was removed: and as we had no pistol with us, we were not able to prove that the noise made by firing it would be almost, if not quite, inaudible: but we satisfied ourselves that, as we could detect no change in the force of our voices, the pistol would in all probability have produced its customary sound.

And now for the descent. After nearly three quarters of an hour's enjoyment of the situation, we jumped to our feet and remounted the short snow-crest which had formed our sheltering wall. The old enemy was waiting for us; and as one by one we rose above the ridge, the savage wind swept torrents of highly dried snow and fine spikes of ice into our devoted faces. This was of no consequence however on such a summit as Mont Blanc, the calotte of which is entirely free from dangerous places: we had nothing to do but to shut our mouths, keep our clothes on our backs, and rush down as fast as we could to the rocks of the Petits Mulets. There we found poor Zacharie Cachat in much worse plight than we had expected, and it was probable that it would have been wiser if he had kept in motion by going on with us. All his efforts to restore circulation to his feet had failed, though he had been rubbing them with snow in the most sheltered spot that he could find, and he now looked pale, and seriously alarmed. We were of course very anxious about him; but his courage rose to the occasion, and he determined to meet a grand danger with an heroic remedy. He packed up his boots and stockings, and declared that he would go down the mountain barefoot, as the only way of saving his feet! Such a proceeding could not but remind me of the Irish reptiles disappearing before St. Patrick, when

"The snakes committed suicide,
To save themselves from slaughter."

But Zacharie was firm, and we started.

From this moment we turned away from our route in the morning; and, instead of descending by the long icy slopes which we had found so difficult in the Ancien Passage, we now made for the head of the Mur de la Côte with the object of returning by the regular route, and so completing an interesting circuit of the Rochers Rouges. The state in which we might find the surface of the famous Mur was a matter of some importance to us.

Cachat's barefooted state, and my divorce from my alpenstock, would have been awkward drawbacks if we had been obliged by hard ice to cut our steps down an incline which averages about 45°. Fortunately, this was not necessary. We found a good coating of snow half-way up to our knees; and, after a little caution in the steepest part of the slope, we finished this stage of our descent with a laughing run down into the entrance to the Corridor. We were in another climate. The white streamers of snow in the blue sky showed how the north wind was still furiously rushing and charging over the slopes where we had so lately fought and beaten him; but now we were in perfect peace. The masses of the Monts Maudits and the Tacul barred us completely from the north and east; the sun was beaming intensely upon all the spotless white around us; the air was perfectly still, our faces began to burn, and we found ourselves transported, as it were, from the Arctic regions into the soothing temperature of a hot-house.

As we had ascended by another route, there was no track to guide us on the way down: by some mistake we got too far to the right, and found ourselves entangled among some of the most gigantic masses of ice that I have ever seen, separated by caves and crevasses of the purest blue. To have such a sight was a full reward for the annoyance of losing our way for about half an hour: presently, by dint of some gymnastic efforts, we emerged from the glacial chaos somewhere nearer to the Grands Mulets than we ought to have been, at the head of a long steep slope, leading straight down to the Grand Plateau, on the further side of which we could see with a telescope the little heap which we had made with our knapsacks in the early morning.

There was a question among the party as to whether we should at once descend the snow-slope, and take our chance of what we might find at the bottom. Cachat was naturally rather out of spirits; but Payot, after a few minutes' inspection, sat down on the edge, and lifting his feet in orthodox fashion, was seen sliding over the snow at a pace which soon landed him safely on the plateau. We could guess how far he had descended by the smallness of his apparent size at the bottom, and then we all started off joyously in the same fashion. A few moments of that sensation, which is caused by a dream of flying down a staircase of everlasting length, were sufficient to place us by his side; and a few moments later, we were all camping happily on the snow round the provisions which had been left below in the knapsacks. Then we put the rope on once more, and quickly descended over the long snow-slopes which were fast melting under the heat of a blazing, grilling sun; and the consciousness of excruciating pain conveyed to poor Cachat the happy intelligence that his feet were returning to life, though much scarified by the ice. We paid a brief visit to the hut on the Grands Mulets, packed up our snow-gaiters and remaining possessions, found the ladder by the side of the great crevasse, and safely recrossed the Glacier des Bossons. The excessive heat was melting the ice-pinnacles at a rate which made great care necessary as we picked our way among their overhanging crests, and occasionally we had to insure quickness and accuracy of foot as we passed the most threatening places; but, as usual, a reasonable amount of precaution succeeded in landing us on terra firma, where rhododendrons and gentians welcomed our return. Cachat exhibited the horny soles of his feet, scored by the ice into a state resembling that of the crackling of roast pork, and resumed his boots and stockings with a grim remark that the heroic remedy had been in some degree successful. At the first convenient spot we made a halt to take stock of the party.

My companion and myself were in perfect order, but it now appeared that Payot and Tobie Simond were partially blind, especially the former. Old Simond was the only one of the four who was in as good condition as when he started; nothing seemed to hurt his wiry frame. Some goats were browsing near us, and he at once led a party to capture some of them; milking them upon the palm of his hand, he rubbed the milk into the eyes of his suffering companions, declaring that to be the best of all possible remedies. In spite of everything, however, we were obliged to lead Payot down for the remaining three hours which separated us from Chamouni. The unusual severity of the wind in the upper regions had greatly added to the effect of the burning glare experienced for so many hours upon the spotless snow: the two men had to spend the next day in a dark room, with no light beyond that which may have been contributed by their pipes. Cachat afterwards informed us that, still persisting in heroic remedies, he had occupied much of the same time with his feet in a pail of ice and water; in a day or two he recovered so completely that he was able to accompany us for the next six weeks in a constant round of mountain adventures, during which he seldom felt any pain in his feet, except when he was more than usually warm and snug in his bed. So there was no great harm done, and general hilarity was in the ascendant.

As we had anticipated, the telescopes of Chamouni had suddenly revealed the fact that a party of men had, in opposition to all notions of propriety, and in defiance of the puissant laws of the locality, dared to present themselves on the summit of Mont Blanc. We had left in a perfectly quiet and unobserved fashion on the previous day: the whole village turned out to look at the offenders when they appeared about seven o'clock in the evening. Groups of surly looking men, representing the inferior majority of the Chamouni trade's union, glared and growled at us as we crossed the bridge; but we soon had the satisfaction of being shaken by the hand and heartily congratulated by several of the best and most educated of the fraternity, who, as is generally the case in similar circumstances, objected to being put on a level with inferior men, and welcomed those who would do anything to emancipate them from tyranny by helping to break through the code which enforced it. The landlord and his wife, who certainly owed us no great gratitude for taking steps by which we accomplished our expedition at less than half-price with about a third of the usual provisions, showed the most generous satisfaction at our success, and supplied us and our guides with abundant libations of gratuitous champagne. That night we held high festival till a late hour, and next morning, with the small exception of badly burned faces, found ourselves all the better for Mont Blanc.

Our chief guide was punished by the guide-chef with the loss of two or three turns on the rôle; but as we employed him till near the end of the season, this infliction had no effect upon his serenity. The others were fined twenty or twenty-five francs each, which left them with quite sufficient margin to be happy.

We lodged a formal protest with the intendant at Bonneville, which, though it produced no immediate redress, must have served as one nail in the coffin of the ancien régime, which was soon after successfully attacked by the president of the Alpine Club, with the powerful aid of D'Azeglio, and mountaineers were relieved from the most oppressive and ridiculous of the Chamouni rules. The process reminds one of an African picture, in which an elephant is assaulted with spears till his body presents the appearance of a porcupine, and he yields beneath the force of constantly irritating wounds.

Only one thing remained to complete our happiness before quitting Chamouni at the end of a week or ten days, which were spent in a succession of delightful excursions upon the glaciers and general defiance of the obnoxious rules. We wished to bid a fitting adieu to our chief enemy, M. Bossoney. With this object we walked one rainy morning into the Bureau des Guides, and found him in a circle of admiring friends. His gloomy countenance looked eminently surly as we greeted him in a cheery fashion, and told him that we understood it was the custom to present a certificate to those who had made the ascent of Mont Blanc from Chamouni.

"Non, messieurs," he replied; "on ne donne pas un certificat qu'à ceux qui ont fait l'ascension selon les règles."

We declared that we had seen a copy of the certificate in question, and knew that it must be given upon requisition to those who had gone up the mountain from Chamouni, though not to those who had ascended from another quarter. He was as obstinate as a mule; but the rain poured down pitilessly, and we had plenty of time to dispute the point. We prevailed by reason of our importunity, and compelled him to give each of us a magnificent document which we shall keep to our dying day. It consists of half a sheet of large paper, crowned with a fancy picture of the top of the mountain, and a group of men in every conceivable attitude, shouting with delight. Bossoney was obliged to fix his own sign-manual to a statement that we had made the ascent, and he gave it with an air expressive of his intense desire that it might poison us. With stately mockery, we wished him the compliments of the season, and retired from his august presence.

Think not that because a mountain has been previously ascended, perhaps full many a time, it thereby loses all its charm for the next comer. The first pioneer doubtless has a particular kind of pleasure which is all his own; but let us never forget the truth that "a thing of beauty is a joy forever." Try your muscles and bronze your face upon the snow-fields and precipices of Mont Blanc or Monte Rosa, and as years creep on you will not repent of your exertions. Those who have been among the glories of the High Alps will carry with them a fund of sunny memories which will serve to brighten up many a dull day and cheer their hearts as they warm ancient toes over a wintry fire.

THE palace in course of construction at Ismalia for the reception of the Empress Eugénie during her stay in Egypt will be 180 feet wide and 120 deep. The estimated cost is 700,000 fr. According to the contract, it is to be finished for the 1st of October; for every day's delay the architect will be subject to a fine of 300 fr. per day, and if finished before he will receive a bonus of 300 fr. per day.

AN exhibition of postage-stamps is now being held in Paris, at the Hôtel des Monnaies. England makes the best show, as she has thirty-four colonies, each with a different design. The United States comes next, the artistic designs on her stamps having a beautiful appearance. The Turkish stamps contain the year of the flight of Mahomet, the year of the reign of the Sultan, and the value of the stamp, in Oriental characters. Finland commenced to issue stamps last year.

A CORRESPONDENT of Once a Week points out that the suggested derivation of the name of the horse-chestnut, from the figure of a horse's foot seen at the intersection of the twigs, is more ingenious than correct. The prefix horse in a number of compound words means simply large or coarse as horse-leech, horse-laugh, horse-fly, horse-radish, and it may in this sense be etymologically identified with gross. A horse-chestnut is therefore gross, large, or coarse chestnut, — the resemblance of the fruit to the sweet chestnut having doubtless suggested the name.

SOME years ago the Emperor of the French was astonished at the great space occupied by flour when packed in sacks in the usual manner, and imagined that it might be compressed into a much smaller bulk, and be thus rendered of easier transport. He at once authorized some experiments to be made on the subject, which resulted in the flour being submitted to powerful hydraulic pressure, and served to the various regiments in tin cases, not only occupying a very small bulk, but protecting the flour from the damp of the atmosphere and so preventing it from becoming mouldy.

ALPHONSE KARR used to say that the best profession going was literature, provided a popular author carried on some other trade. French actors and actresses have accepted this dictum. Their theatrical earnings are the smallest part of the incomes of many of them. The farcical Levasseur is a bookseller; Vollet deals in ladies' under-clothing and sells cuffs and collars to Worth's customers; Lacroix is a jeweller; Coulombier is at the head of a soup kitchen; Lemaire is a dramatic publisher; Lassouche is a dealer in bric-à-bric; and Berthelier's stays have a higher reputation than the famous corsets of Mme. Vertu. Sarah Felix has no end of commercial irons in the fire, but her largest revenues are derived from an oyster park and some ponds where salmon are produced on the Coste principle. Carmouche speculated in a boarding-house at Pierrefonds, and the capital on which he carried on his business was furnished by his wife, Jenny Vertpré.

THE London Athenæum describes some interesting experiments with gun-cotton at the Woolwich arsenal. A palisade was built of oak timbers a foot thick, firmly fixed in the ground, and supported in the rear by strong trusses. Disks of gun-cotton were placed along the face of the palisade about a foot above the ground, and were fired by a battery in the usual way. The effect may be described as wonderful. The palisade was literally blown away amidst a deafening report, as if the massive timbers offered no more resistance on one side of the gun-cotton than the atmosphere on the other. The disks require no fixing; merely laying them on is sufficient. Solid blocks of iron and stone can be shivered into fragments by firing a disk laid on the top. In future sieges, if some desperate fellow can but get to the gate or a thin part of the walls, and hang on a few disks of gun-cotton, a breach can be made by firing with a galvanic current from a long distance. Henceforth Indian stockades and New Zealand pahs will be but vain defences; and if a hole can be blown in the side of a ship, what will be the use of building vessels of war? After all, cotton may prove to be king in the shape of gun-cotton.

THE medical galvanists and all who have any faith in the curative powers of electricity, will be glad to hear that the French Minister of Public Instruction is about to institute some curious experiments, suggested by one Dr. Poggidi, on electrification as a cure for diseases not only of the body but of the mind. According to the doctor, you have only to submit children physically and morally weak to the action of electricity from an ordinary machine to see them grow and strengthen, and acquire an aptitude for work and a facility of learning to which they were strangers before the treatment. He has tested his system in many cases of youths suffering from mental depression, nervous excitement, and the attendant corporeal evils, and, as he and his supporters say, has been successful to an astounding degree. When he first divulged his system of electrical gymnastics, and told his stories to the Paris Academy of Sciences, he was laughed at. This was three years ago; in the interval he has seemingly gained a better hearing, and now the Lyceum of the Prince Imperial, at Vannes, is to be made a proving-house for his system.

A CORRESPONDENT writing to us from Munich, July the 5th, says: "To-day and yesterday the Peabody statue modelled by Story in Rome, was exhibited at the royal foundry in the immediate neighborhood of Munich. Great numbers of persons thronged to the building to see the features of the man whose honored name is familiar to all from one end of Europe to the other.

"The figure is seated in an arm-chair, leaning somewhat backwards in an easy and natural attitude. There is nothing studied in the figure or in the treatment of the accessories: the whole is lifelike, and brings the man himself before the spectator in the most pleasing manner. The countenance is full of vivacity, and the head being slightly raised, as though in expectancy, adds to this expression, which is spread over every feature.

"The artist has not attempted any classical pose or classical treatment of the drapery. There is no mantle with light or massy folds; the costume is the plain dress of the citizen of to-day; but it is so befitting, it suits the man so well, and the treatment of the figure brings the person so near to us, that we hardly know what change could be suggested which might be thought an improvement. To-morrow the monument will be packed up and sent to London, after which it goes to America."

"WE are very glad," says the London Spectator, speaking of Mr. Dana's "Two Years before the Mast," "to see an 'author's edition' of a very old favorite. Some of our readers may, perhaps, need to be reminded that some thirty years ago Mr. Dana, then or lately a student of Harvard University, went 'before the mast,' i. e. shipped himself as a common seaman on board of a trading brig bound from New York for the west coast of America; and that, happily coming back, he wrote a description, nearly unique in its way, of life in the fore-castle. In this lies the interest, and a very great and permanent interest it is, of the book itself, but this particular edition has an interest of its own. The brig Pilgrim, which Mr. Dana joined, was engaged in the hide trade, and remained for months taking in cargo in the bay of San Francisco, then, as he says, 'a vast solitude.' Six miles from their anchorage on one side was a ruinous 'presidio,' three miles on the other an equally ruinous 'mission,' and near the landing a shanty of boards which a Yankee, in advance of his age, had set up. Other habitations there were none. Twenty-four years afterwards, in 1859, Mr. Dana visited the city of San Francisco, then numbering a hundred thousand inhabitants, the growth of less than a quarter of a century on the shores of that desolate bay. Probably there are other men alive in America who have seen transformations equally wonderful; not a few of Mr. Dana's friends and associates in early life are alive, and can boast the same experiences; but the concurrent good fortune of seeing such things and being able to describe them is very rare indeed, and deserves a special recognition. It would be impertinence to praise so well known a book as Mr. Dana's original work, but we may say that his added chapter, 'Twenty-four Years after,' is of very rare interest."

LANDOR'S LIFE.

PREFIXED to the second volume of Mr. Forster's admirable biography of Walter Savage Landor* is an engraving from a portrait of that remarkable man, when seventy-seven years of age, by BOXALL. The writer of these lines can testify that the original picture is a singularly good likeness, the result of close and subtle observation on the part of the painter; but, for this very reason, the engraving gives a most inadequate idea of the merit of the picture and the character of the man.

From the engraving, the arms and hands are omitted. In the picture, they are, as they were in nature, indispensable to a correct reading of the vigorous face. The arms were very peculiar. They were rather short, and were curiously restrained and checked in their action at the elbows; in the action of the hands, even when separately clenched, there was the same kind of pause, and a noticeable tendency to relaxation on the part of the thumb. Let the face be never so intense or fierce, there was a commentary of gentleness in the hands, essential to be taken along with it. Like Hamlet, Landor would speak daggers but use none. In the expression of his hands, though angrily closed, there was always gentleness and tenderness; just as when they were open, and the handsome old gentleman would wave them with a little courtly flourish that sat well upon him, as he recalled some classic compliment that he had rendered to some reigning beauty, there was a chivalrous grace about them such as pervades his softer verses. This, the fictitious Mr. Boythorn (to whom we may refer without impropriety in this connection, as Mr. Forster does) declaims "with unimaginable energy" the while his bird is "perched upon his thumb," and he "softly smooths its feathers with his forefinger."

From the spirit of Mr. Forster's Biography these characteristic hands are never omitted, and hence (apart from its literary merits) its great value. As the same masterly writer's Life and Times of Oliver Goldsmith is a generous and yet conscientious picture of a period, so this is a not less generous and yet conscientious picture of one life; of a life, with all its aspirations, achievements, and disappointments; all its capabilities, opportunities, and irretrievable mistakes. It is essentially a sad book, and herein lies proof of its truth and worth. The life of almost any man possessing great gifts would be a sad book to himself; and this book enables us not only to see its subject, but to be its subject, if we will.

Mr. Forster is of opinion that "Landor's fame very surely awaits him." This point admitted or doubted, the value of the book remains the same. It needs not to know his works (otherwise than through his biographer's exposition), it needs not to have known himself, to find a deep interest in these pages. More or less of their warning is in every conscience; and some admiration of a fine genius, and of a great, wild, generous nature, incapable of mean self-extenuation or dissimulation — if unhappily incapable of self-repression too — should be in every breast. "There may be still living many persons," Walter Landor's brother, Robert, writes to Mr. Forster of this book, "who would contradict any narrative of yours in which the best qualities were remembered, the worst forgotten." Mr. Forster's comment is: "I had not waited for this appeal to resolve, that, if this memoir were written at all, it should contain, as far as might lie within my power, a fair statement of the truth." And this eloquent passage of truth immediately follows: "Few of his infirmities are without something kindly or generous about them; and we are not long in discovering there is nothing so wildly incredible that he will not himself in perfect good faith believe. When he published his first book of poems on quitting Oxford, the profits were to be reserved for a distressed clergyman. When he published his Latin poems, the poor of Leipzig were to have the sum they realized. When his comedy was ready to be acted, a Spaniard who had sheltered him at Castro was to be made richer by it. When he competed for the prize of the Academy of Stockholm, it was to go to the poor of Sweden. If nobody got anything from any one of these enterprises, the fault at all events was not his. With his extraordinary power of, forgetting disappointments, he was prepared at each successive failure to start afresh, as if each had been a triumph. I shall have to delineate this peculiarity as strongly in the last half as in the first half of his life, and it was certainly an amiable one. He was ready at all times to set aside, out of his own possessions, something for somebody who might please him for the time; and when frailties of temper and tongue are noted, this other eccentricity should not be omitted. He desired eagerly the love as well as the good opinion of those whom for the time he esteemed, and no one was more affectionate while under such influences. It is not a small virtue to feel such genuine pleasure, as he always did in giving and receiving pleasure. His generosity, too, was bestowed chiefly on those who could make small acknowledgment in thanks and no return in kind."

*Walter Savage Landor, a Biography by John Forster.

Some of his earlier contemporaries may have thought him a vain man. Most assuredly he was not in the common acceptance of the term. A vain man has little or no admiration to bestow upon competitors. Landor had an inexhaustible fund. He thought well of his writings, or he would not have preserved them. He said and wrote that he thought well of them, because that was his mind about them, and he said and wrote his mind. He was one of the few men of whom you might always know the whole: of whom you might always know the worst, as well as the best. He had no reservations or duplicities. "No, by Heaven!" he would say ("with unimaginable energy"), if any good adjective were coupled with him which he did not deserve: "I am nothing of the kind. I wish I were; but I don't deserve the attribute, and I never did, and I never shall!"

His intense consciousness of himself never led to his poorly excusing himself, and seldom to his violently asserting himself. When he told some little story of his bygone social experiences, in Florence or where not, as he was fond of doing, it took the innocent form of making all the interlocutors Landors. It was observable, too, that they always called him "Mr. Landor,"—rather ceremoniously and submissively. There was a certain "Caro Padre Abate Marina,"—invariably so addressed in these anecdotes,—who figured through a great many of them, and who always expressed himself in this deferential tone.

Mr. Forster writes of Landor's character thus:—

"A man must be judged, at first, by what he says and does. But with him such extravagance as I have referred to was little more than the habitual indulgence (on such themes) of passionate feelings and language, indecent indeed, but utterly purposeless; the mere explosion of wrath provoked by tyranny or cruelty; the irregularities of an overheated steam-engine too weak for its own vapor. It is very certain that no one could detest oppression more truly than Landor did in all seasons and times; and if no one expressed that scorn, that abhorrence of tyranny and fraud, more hastily or more intemperately, all his fire and fury signified really little else than ill-temper too easily provoked. Not to justify or excuse such language, but to explain it, this consideration is urged. If not uniformly placable, Landor was always compassionate. He was tender-hearted rather than bloody-minded at all times, and upon only the most partial acquaintance with his writings could other opinion be formed. A completer knowledge of them would satisfy any one that he had as little real disposition to kill a king as to kill a mouse. In fact, there is not a more marked peculiarity in his genius than the union with its strength of a most uncommon gentleness, and in the personal ways of the man this was equally manifest."—Vol. I. p. 496.

Of his works, thus:—

"Though his mind was cast in the antique mould, it had opened itself to every kind of impression through a long and varied life; he has written with equal excellence in both poetry and prose, which can hardly be said of any of his contemporaries; and perhaps the single epithet by which his books would be best described is that reserved exclusively for books not characterized only by genius, but also by special individuality. They are unique. Having possessed them, we should miss them. Their place would be supplied by no others. They have that about them, moreover, which renders it almost certain that they will frequently be resorted to in future time. There are none in the language more quotable. Even where impulsiveness and want of patience have left them most fragmentary, this rich compensation is offered to the reader. There is hardly a conceivable subject, in life or literature, which they do not illustrate by striking aphorisms, by concise and profound observations, by wisdom ever applicable to the needs of men, and by wit as available for their enjoyment. Nor, above all, will there anywhere be found a more pervading passion for liberty, a fiercer hatred of the base, a wider sympathy with the wronged and the oppressed, or help more ready at all times for those who fight at odds and disadvantage against the powerful and the fortunate, than in the writings of Walter Savage Landor."—Last page of second volume.

The impression was strong upon the present writer's mind, as on Mr. Forster's, during years of close friendship with the subject of this biography, that his animosities were chiefly referable to the singular inability in him to disassociate other people's ways of thinking from his own. He had, to the last, a ludicrous grievance (both Mr. Forster and the writer have often amused themselves with it) against a good-natured nobleman, doubtless perfectly unconscious of having ever given him offence. The offence was, that on the occasion of some dinner-party in another nobleman's house, many years before, this innocent lord (then a commoner) had passed in to dinner, through some door, before him, as he himself was about to pass in through that same door with a lady on his arm. Now, Landor was a gentleman of most scrupulous politeness, and in his carriage of himself towards ladies there was a certain mixture of stateliness and deference belonging to quite another time, and, as Mr. Pepys would observe, "mighty pretty to see." If he could by any effort imagine himself committing such a high crime and misdemeanor as that in question, he could only imagine himself as doing it of a set purpose, under the sting of some vast injury, to inflict a great affront. A deliberately designed affront on the part of another man, it therefore remained to the end of his days. The manner in which, as time went on, he permeated the unfortunate lord's ancestry with this offence, was whimsically characteristic of Landor. The writer remembers very well, when only the individual himself was held responsible in the story for the breach of good breeding; but, in another ten years or so, it began to appear that his father had always been remarkable for ill-manners; and in yet another ten years or so, his grandfather developed into quite a prodigy of coarse behavior.

Mr. Boythorn—if he may again be quoted—said of his adversary, Sir Leicester Dedlock, "That fellow is, and his father was and his grandfather was, the most stiff-necked, arrogant, imbecile, pig-headed numskull, ever, by some inexplicable mistake of Nature, born in any station of life but a walking-stick's!"

The strength of some of Mr. Landor's most captivating kind qualities was traceable to the same source. Knowing how keenly he himself would feel the being at any small social disadvantage, or the being unconsciously placed in any ridiculous light, he was wonderfully considerate of shy people, or of such as might be below the level of his usual conversation, or otherwise out of their element. The writer once observed him in the keenest distress of mind in behalf of a modest young stranger who came into a drawing-room with a glove on his head.

An expressive commentary on this sympathetic condition, and on the delicacy with which he advanced to the young stranger's rescue, was afterwards furnished by himself at a friendly dinner at Gore House, when it was the most delightful of houses. His dress — say, his cravat or shirt-collar — had become slightly disarranged on a hot evening, and Count D'Orsay laughingly called his attention to the circumstance as we rose from table. Landor became flushed, and greatly agitated: "My dear Count D'Orsay, I thank you! My dear Count D'Orsay, I thank you from my soul for pointing out to me the abominable condition to which I am reduced! If I had entered the drawing-room, and presented myself before Lady Blessington in so absurd a light, I would have instantly gone home, put a pistol to my head, and blown my brains out!"

Mr. Forster tells a similar story of his keeping a company waiting dinner, through losing his way, and of his seeing no remedy for that breach of politeness but cutting his throat, or drowning himself, unless a countryman whom he met could direct him by a short road to the house where the party were assembled. Surely, these are expressive notes on the gravity and reality of his explosive inclinations to kill kings!

His manner towards boys was charming, and the earnestness of his wish to be on equal terms with them and to win their confidence was quite touching. Few, reading Mr. Forster's book, can fail to see in this, his pensive remembrance of that "studious wilful boy, at once shy and impetuous," who had not many intimacies at Rugby, but who was "generally popular and respected, and used his influence often to save the younger boys from undue harshness or violence." The impulsive yearnings of his passionate heart towards his own boy, on their meeting at Bath, after years of separation, likewise burn through this phase of his character.

But a more spiritual, softened, and unselfish aspect of it, was to be derived from his respectful belief in happiness which he himself had misused. His marriage had not been a felicitous one, — it may be fairly assumed for either side, — but no trace of bitterness or distrust concerning other marriages was in his mind. He was never more serene than in the midst of a domestic circle, and was invariably remarkable for a perfectly benignant interest in young couples and young lovers. That, in his ever fresh fancy, he conceived in this association innumerable histories of himself involving far more unlikely events that never happened than Isaac D'Israeli ever imagined, is hardly to be doubted; but as to this part of his real history he was mute, or revealed his nobleness in an impulse to be generously just. We verge on delicate ground, but a slight remembrance rises in the writer which can grate nowhere. Mr. Forster relates how a certain friend, being in Florence, sent him home a leaf from the garden of his old house at Fiesole.

That friend had first asked him what he should send him home, and he had stipulated for this gift, — found by Mr. Forster among his papers after his death. The friend, on coming back to England, related to Landor that he had been much embarrassed, on going in search of the leaf, by his driver's suddenly stopping his horses in a narrow lane, and presenting him (the friend) to "La Signora Landora." The lady was walking alone on a bright Italian-winter-day; and the man, having been told to drive to the Villa Landora, inferred that he must be conveying a guest or visitor. "I pulled off my hat," said the friend, "apologized for the coachman's mistake, and drove on. The lady was walking with a rapid and firm step, had bright eyes, a fine fresh color, and looked animated and agreeable." Landor checked off each clause of the description, with a stately nod of more than ready assent, and replied, with all his tremendous energy concentrated into the sentence: "And the Lord forbid that I should do otherwise than declare that she always WAS agreeable, — to every one but me!"

Mr. Forster step by step builds up the evidence on which he writes this life and states this character. In like manner, he gives the evidence for his high estimation of Landor's works, and — it may be added — for their recompense against some neglect, in finding so sympathetic, acute, and devoted a champion. Nothing in the book is more remarkable than his examination of each of Landor's successive pieces of writing, his delicate discernment of their beauties, and his strong desire to impart his own perceptions in this wise to the great audience that is yet to come. It rarely befalls an author to have such a commentator: to become the subject of so much artistic skill and knowledge, combined with such infinite and loving pains. Alike as a piece of biography, and as a commentary upon the beauties of a great writer, the book is a massive book; as the man and the writer were massive too. Sometimes, when the balance held by Mr. Forster has seemed for a moment to turn a little heavily against the infirmities of temperament of a grand old friend, we have felt something of a shock; but we have not been once able to gainsay the justice of the scales. This feeling, too, has only fluttered out of the detail, here or there, and has vanished before the whole. We fully agree with Mr. Forster that "Judgment has been passed" — as it should be — "with an equal desire to be only just on all the qualities of his temperament which affected necessarily not his own life only. But, now that the story is told, no one will have difficulty in striking the balance between its good and ill; and what was really imperishable in Landor's genius will not be treasured less, or less understood, for the more perfect knowledge of his character."

Mr. Forster's second volume gives a fac-simile of Landor's writing at seventy-five. It may be interesting to those who are curious in caligraphy, to know that its resemblance to the recent handwriting of that great genius, M. VICTOR HUGO, is singularly strong.

In a military burial-ground in India, the name of WALTER LANDOR is associated with the present writer's, over the grave of a young officer. No name could stand there, more inseparably associated in the writer's mind with the dignity of generosity: with a noble scorn of all littleness, all cruelty, oppression, fraud, and false pretence.

A GREAT JEWEL ROBBERY.

IN TWO CHAPTERS. — II.

A MONTH passed when one cold January day I was in the show-room, and the same lady made her appearance alone. She still wore her respirator, but looked very pale, haggard, and troubled. The bold look seemed to have gone from her eyes; and as I recalled my thoughts, I felt that I had misjudged her, for she began to speak tenderly of her husband, Mr. Ross, who was lying very ill at the hotel.

"I have brought back the cross to be repaired," she said, drawing the little morocco case from her rich sable muff. "The ring was too slight, and it broke from my necklet the second time it was worn. I had a narrow escape of losing it; but Mr. Ross found, it himself upon the lawn, trodden into the grass. I thought I would leave it until we came up again. Of course, you can repair it?"

I expressed my sorrow, and promised to have it seen to at once.

"You need not hurry for a few days. Mr. Ross is in town to consult Sir Ealing Dean, and I fear he will send us to Madeira. This climate is killing my poor husband."

The distant hauteur was all gone; and in a lady-like, courteous manner, our customer bowed to my few sympathetic remarks, and hints of its being an unusually trying season, &c.

"Our friend was delighted with the little bracelet, a gift which Mr. Ross wishes to supplement with something a little more valuable. Perhaps I could be allowed to select a few things for you to submit to his choice at the hotel? I know his taste now pretty well, and it will save trouble."

"Anything you like to select shall be sent, ma'am," I said; and I then proceeded to open and display to their best advantage some very valuable bracelets, which were one and all rejected.

"Yes," she said sadly, "they are very handsome; but Mr. Ross would not like them, I am sure, and it is useless to take things on that he would not approve. His taste was always good; and as his health fails, it seems to have acquired an indescribable tone that I cannot explain, except that it is artistic and dreamy."

I brought out some plain but good pearl and diamond ornaments in suites, one suite in particular taking her attention.

"Yes; I like that. You might send that."

"It is a suite made to order; but it could be made again in a very short time," I said.

"That would not do," she said, "unless it could be supplied in a fortnight."

"I think we could get over that difficulty," I said with a smile; and then bracelets, rings, chains, and watches — certainly the most chaste and elegant we had — were selected and put aside.

"It is only fair to say," said the lady, smiling — at least, I could see that she was smiling, in spite of her respirator, — "that Mr. Ross will not purchase many of these elegant ornaments. I know he would like a watch and chain, and a ring. Perhaps, too, if he admired them, one of those pearl suites; but I thought it better to speak, as since his illness he has become, not, irritable but — but — perhaps a little hard to please, and I should be sorry if he rejected everything you brought."

So much delicacy was displayed in these remarks, that I could only courteously assure her that we should only be too happy to attend again and again upon Mr. Ross, till we had hit upon something he admired; and upon promising to send the selected goods on the next morning at eleven, our visitor rose to go.

"I would ask you to send this afternoon," said the lady on rising, "but I don't think Mr. Ross quite well enough. He saw our physician this morning, and the interviews are always very trying to his nerves."

I placed the little cross in the workmen's hands for repair; and the next morning, punctually at eleven, I was at Moore's Hotel, accompanied by a porter with a goodly assortment of jewelry.

A few words with the manager set me quite at ease, though my inquiries were a mere matter of form. Mr. Elliston Ross lived in Yorkshire, owned coal mines, and was in town to visit the court physician, Sir Ealing Dean; had been there once before for the same reason; perfect gentleman; his lady quite an angel, — waited on him night and day.

I was shown into the room where Mrs. Ross was seated, — this time without her respirator. She rose with a sad smile, and motioned me to a seat; while putting on her respirator, she went into the next room, remaining absent a few minutes, and then returning, requested me to bring in my cases for Mr. Ross to see.

I had left the porter down-stairs; so, taking up the two small leathern boxes, I followed Mrs. Ross into a slightly shaded room, where, looking deathly pale, the gentleman who had visited our place of business lay upon a couch reading the Times. He was attired in a blue cloth dressing-gown, and had a small table drawn up to his side, on which were a bottle, glass, and a carafe which seemed to contain barley-water. He, too, wore a respirator; but he removed it for a few moments to take a little of the barley-water, and then carefully replaced it, coughing hollowly the while.

"Sorry to bring you into a sick-room," he said, courteously. "Sorry, in fact, to bring you here at all, for I would much rather have chosen the trifle or two I wanted at your shop. I trust you have not brought many things, though?"

"Only a few that Mrs. Ross thought you — that your lady chose, sir," I said.

He nodded, and then listlessly examined first one and then another ornament, as I opened them out, but always with a dissatisfied air.

"Don't you like those, dear?" said Mrs. Ross, in rather disappointed tones, as I displayed in the best lights the pearl suite.

"No; not at all," said the invalid. "Too plain; almost vulgar."

"Might I be allowed to suggest," I said, earnestly, "that to see pearls to advantage, they must be worn. It is a well-known fact that pearls are gems which show to as great advantage upon a dark as upon a fair complexion; and if your lady —"

I paused here, and glanced towards Mrs. Ross, who smiled graciously, and then clasped the bracelets round her shapely wrist, the necklace over her fine throat, and placed the tiara in her hair, — looking almost regal as she stood before us.

"You see the difference," I said, drawing back.

"Yes, yes," said the invalid, impatiently; "they look well enough on her; but they are for quite a girl. — Take them off, Lilla."

Mrs. Ross obeyed, and the ornaments were replaced in the case; when I proceeded to display the other jewels, but apparently to find no favor.

"Here, Lilla, give me a glass of sherry. — Confound this thing, it almost chokes me." He tore off the respirator, and hurled it to the other end of the room.

"For my sake, dear," I heard her whisper to him, as, stepping lightly across the room, she picked up the respirator, and brought it back.

"Well, there; get out the sherry, then," he said, pettishly, as he took back the instrument.

"No, no, dear; Sir Ealing said —"

"Confound Sir Ealing! If I am to die, let me die comfortably, and not to be tortured to death. Get out the sherry, I say, — the port too."

I saw a tear trickle down Mrs. Ross's cheek as she fetched a couple of decanters from a sideboard where they stood with glasses.

"Haven't you some cake, or did you send it down?" he said, impatiently.

"I have it here, dear," said Mrs. Ross softly; and she placed a portion of a small pound-cake upon the table.

"Give me a glass of sherry," he said, impatiently. — "No, not that glass — the other — Mr. — I don't know your name — try that sherry." He sipped a little. "You'll find it very good."

"I thank you," I said quietly; "but I never take wine in business hours."

"Won't you try the port, then?" he said.

"I would much rather not," I replied.

"A little cake?" suggested the lady. "We are simple country people, and not much acquainted with London etiquette. Pray, excuse us if we trespass."

I bowed, and declined, when Mrs. Ross readjusted her husband's respirator, leaning over him the while.

"Now let me see that bracelet," said Mr. Ross, pointing to one upon the table. "But are these all you have brought?"

"Yes, sir," I said; "but I can easily bring a fresh selection," — though I had brought over two thousand pounds' worth.

"Hem, yes," he said; "of course! — Do you like that bracelet, Lilla?"

"Yes," said Mrs. Ross; "I picked it out particularly yesterday. That emerald is so beautiful."

"Put it on," he said, curly; and she clasped it upon her arm.

"How much?" he said, shortly.

"Thirty-five guineas," I replied.

"Dear," he said, — "very dear. The bracelet we bought at the shop was far more handsome at the same money."

"No, love; it was sixty guineas," said Mrs. Ross.

"Ah! was it? I forgot," he said, carelessly. "Well, lay that aside: I don't want you to come for nothing."

I hastened to assure him that it was the wish of the firm to satisfy their patrons, as well as to sell their jewelry, and that we should only be too happy to bring or send on a fresh selection for his choice.

He assented almost rudely, and turned over the various rings, asking the prices of nearly every article I had brought, when, suddenly throwing himself impatiently back, he exclaimed, "Good heavens Lilla, this room is insufferable; throw some of that vinegar about."

Mrs. Ross smiled faintly; and taking a flexible tube from the mantelpiece, she pressed it, so that in a fine shower a finely scented aromatic vinegar diffused a refreshing perfume through the room.

"That's better," he exclaimed. — "Now show me those pearls again. How much did you say they were?"

"Four hundred guineas the suite," I said, hastening to lay them before him.

"There, take them away!" he exclaimed. "I can't afford four hundred guineas: four hundred shillings more likely. That confounded doctor is ruining me. Let me look at the watches; or, stay, let me look at the pearls again. — No; never mind,

I won't have them unless you will take half the money."

I smiled and shook my head. "We are not dealers of that sort, sir," I ventured to say.

"I don't know — I don't know. I believe you jewellers get most terrible profits. Show me the watches."

I was hastening to place the half-dozen I had with me in his hands, when he exclaimed again: "Insufferable! Have you any more of that vinegar, Lilla?"

Mrs. Ross nodded; and taking a cut-glass bottle from her pocket, she placed it with a handkerchief by his side.

"No, no," he said, giving me back the watches. Sprinkle the room with another of those tubes, — Now you! I'll have that little plain watch. I'm getting tired of this. Let me have a chain to match — a fine one, mind — the thinnest you have — and that will do for to-day."

As I selected four or five chains, after putting the watch aside, Mrs. Ross took up another tube, unscrewed it, and then appeared to be taking especial notice of the chains which I bore across to the invalid.

"Those are sweetly pretty," she exclaimed. "I don't remember noticing them so much yesterday."

As she spoke, she stood close to my side, when, the invalid exclaimed impatiently: "There, pray, be quick, dear"; and at one and the same moment, he poured out the contents of his bottle upon his handkerchief and I felt a fine spray of a peculiar odor playing right in my nostrils.

I started back, gasping and astounded, when, leaping from the couch, the invalid exclaimed: "Good heavens, sir, you are unwell!" and he covered my face and nose with the wet handkerchief, forcing me backwards into a chair.

I believe that I struggled, but only feebly; for a strange, delicious, enervating languor was stealing over me; I saw things mistily but still with an understanding mind, seeing, though unable to move hand or foot, that the invalid was bending over me, while Mrs. Ross was hastily placing the various articles of jewelry in her pocket.

I saw all that, but in a dreamy, untroubled way, for it seemed then to be not of the slightest consequence, — not to concern me. Then I have some recollection of an intensely cold sensation as of water being poured upon my face, while my next impression is of hearing a closing door and the click of a lock.

How long I remained in that condition, I never knew; but by degrees I woke to a feeling of deadly nausea: my head swam, my temples throbbed, and everything I gazed upon was seen through a mist of dancing motes. But by degrees thoughts of the present began to take the place of the dreamy imaginings of the past. I started up and looked around, to find that I was still in the inner room; but the jewels — the cases — where was the invalid — where Mrs. Ross? Was it true, or was it some strange vision? It was impossible that I could have been duped like that.

I ran to the door, — fastened. The other door, — locked on the outside. I darted across to the bell, but in doing so, caught my foot in the long table-cover, tripped and fell, dragging the cloth on to the carpet, and revealing the whole of the jewel-cases beneath the table, just as they had been hastily flung.

I could not help it then, for my brain was confused, and, stooping down, I took the cases one by one, and opened them, in the fond hope that I had been deceived, and that I should find the jewels safe; but, save one ring, which had escaped their notice, everything had been taken.

I sat on the carpet for a few minutes holding my throbbing head, and trying to recall the scene, but almost in vain, for it seemed as if a portion of my existence had been wiped completely away. I was showing jewelry at one moment, the next it seemed that I was seated by the empty cases. I tried to clear my faculties, but in vain; and I should think quite half an hour had elapsed before, thoroughly awakened to the fact that I had been robbed, I rang the bell.

I had nearly arrived at the extent of my loss two or three times, but only to have, as it were, a veil drawn over my senses, just as if a relapse were coming on; and then mentally blind, I could do nothing but rock myself to and fro, trying to get rid of the remains of the strange stupor in which I had been plunged.

Before the waiter could ascend, I rang again.

"Where are Mr. and Mrs. Ross?" I inquired.

"Went out in a brougham some time ago, sir; and your lunch is ready."

"My lunch?" I exclaimed.

"Yes, sir; the lunch they ordered for you."

"O, thank you!" I said quietly; "I'll ring again. Send my porter up in five minutes' time."

The waiter did not seem surprised that the door was fastened on the outside, — it had not struck him then; but as soon as he had gone, I hastily repacked the empty morocco cases, and as soon as possible made my way back into Bond Street, and met the principal.

"We were just getting uneasy, Mr. Willis, and going to send after you. What have they taken?"

"Everything, sir," I said, almost fiercely.

"What!" he exclaimed.

I told all I knew, while he listened with blank amazement.

Then followed a visit to Great Scotland Yard, and to Moore's, to find that Mr. and Mrs. Ross had not returned; while so impressed was the manager with his visitors' respectability, that he laughed at the idea of there having been any swindling transaction. They were most respectable people, he said; paid their bill last time without a murmur: their portmanteaus and boxes up stairs were all in their rooms; and it was all a mistake, — "or something worse," he added, with a dark look at me.

That it was "something worse" was very soon evident from the tubes and bottles, and a wine-glass containing a few drops of a limpid fluid, found to corroborate my story. But though the instruments of the deception, even to a couple of respirators, lined with wet sponge, were found, the depredators had made their escape, and were never found; though I verily believe that if I had watched the lady-swindlers in the various police courts, sooner or later I should have encountered the interesting Mrs. Ross.

I need hardly add, that after so heavy a loss, the firm never seemed to take thoroughly to heart the idea of a junior partnership with respect to myself; while as to my brother assistants, they laughed in their sleeves at my downfall; though, after all, I cannot see that I was much to blame, this not being by any means the first Great Jewel-robbery.

ELEPHANT SHOOTING.

A GREAT number of even thoroughly practical people hold that "coming events cast their shadows before," and that good and bad fortunes alike can be felt as it were — or, at any rate, that their approach is known — before they actually appear. Now, my experience of life is quite otherwise. I allow that pleasures and troubles generally run in herds, and that one misfortune, or one piece of good luck, is pretty certain to be followed by more of the same kind. But I hold — or rather, my experience teaches me — that great events in life generally happen when they are least expected, and that it is just when you are thinking least about it, that what you have wished for, or what you have feared, comes to pass.

It was so, at any rate, with the only day of Elephant Shooting I ever had. Like every lad who has longed to visit the East for the sake of sport, my day-dreams had dwelt much upon elephant shooting. But where was I to get it? In the Upper Provinces of India there are certainly elephants to be found, but, as a general rule, only in remote jungles, to reach which the leave of absence and the purse I could command, were both too short. Ceylon — which is to elephant shooting what Leicestershire is to fox hunting — I was not likely to see; and the Cape of Good Hope I had, at the time I write of, very little chance of visiting. The same might be said of the great Walliar jungle, at the foot of the Neilgherry Hills. Elephants are to be met with there; and every year perhaps some five or six fall to the rifles of English sportsmen. But to go from Meerut to Madras, and enjoy a couple of months' shooting there, would require at least six months' leave and two or three thousand rupees (£200 or £300) in hard cash, and I was as likely to get one as the other, — which means that both were out of the question, and that there was no use hoping for either.

But a day's elephant shooting I did get, and that when I least expected it. A young civil servant named Bland, Neld, of the 3d Dagoons, and myself, happened to be on leave together at Mussoorie, one of the Sanatoriums on the Himalaya Hills. We all knew each other, having been for nearly a year at the same station, — Meerut; and, as we lodged at the Mussoorie club, and sat next each other every day at the table d'hôte breakfast, tiffin, and dinner, we got more intimate than before, whilst killing time in that most agreeable climate. Bland and myself, were both up on sick-leave, Neld on private affairs; so that, although the latter was perfectly justified in going where he liked, it was against the rules of both services that officers sent up to a station some 6,000 feet above the level of the sea, in order that they might profit by a cool climate, should, of their own free will, go down into the hot plains. I mention this in explanation why Bland and myself were obliged to keep silence respecting our sporting adventures; for if they had been publicly talked about, we should have been obliged to leave the Hills and return to our duty, — I to my regiment at Meerut, and Bland to his cutcherry (magistrate's office) at the same station. But Neld was under no such obligation. He, the happy fellow, could come or go where he liked. He had six months' leave on private affairs, and was under no obligation to remain on the Hills unless it suited him to do so; not that he was a very ardent sportsman, perhaps the least so of the three. Still, he liked the life in the jungle and preferred infinitely the freedom of living in tents to the routine of billiards, whist, flirtations, private theatricals, and balls, for which Anglo-Indians, when at Mussoorie or Simla, go in with such vigor and energy.

In order, therefore, not to get ourselves into trouble, and still to enjoy what sport we could before the rains came on, Bland and myself made our friend Neld always take with him to the plains our two tents, with such accommodation in the way of furniture as we required when under canvas. We always made our companion precede us by a day or two, and then, giving out that we were going into the neighboring hills to shoot a few jungle fowl, or look for some mountain pheasants, we followed Neld to his encampment, in the Valley of Dhera Dhon, or often lower, to the plains beyond Dhera pass. On the occasion of which I am going to give an account, Neld had preceded us by twenty-four hours, and we intended to join him at a village some eight hours' ride from Mussoorie, on the edge of the Terai jungle. I make special mention of this in order to show what hot-headed young fools we were. Bland had been specially ordered by a board of medical officers to sojourn for six months on the Himalayas. He had had a very bad attack of jungle fever the year before, and the climate of the Hills was considered the only cure that could be relied upon for his complaint.

Yet here he was, not only leaving the bracing, fever-dispelling air of the mountains, but actually going for his own pleasure to about the most unhealthy climate in all the Northwest Provinces, — to a district in which the very worst fevers abound, and in which — although not at the season when we visited the place — no European can, for eight months of the year, sleep a single night without risk of catching the most deadly of the various malarias engendered by malaria. A regular jungle fever, caught in the Terai, between the commencement of the rainy season in October, and before the following month of March, seldom fails to send an Englishman to his grave.

Nor was I an iota less foolish. The complaint for which I had been sent to the Hills was rheumatism, and the heat and exposure of shooting in the plains, together with the damp and dews of the night, was pretty certain to bring on an attack and do away with all the good I had received from a residence in a good climate. But when men have a mania for shooting, it is impossible to reason with them, and so, although at the risk of our lives, and with a certainty that, if found out, we should both be greatly censured, and remanded to our respective duties, we persisted in our intentions.

The Terai jungle is a belt of forest, more or less dense, which stretches away at the foot of the Himalayas, a distance of nearly three hundred miles, as far as the confines of the Nepaul frontier. This belt is more or less broad, but at the parts which are nearest to the Northwest Provinces the jungle must be about thirty miles wide. It was on the verge of this vast forest that Neld had pitched tents for himself and for us, and by the time we joined him there he had already enjoyed a couple of days' sport. We reached the village after a very long and hot day's ride, the heat being all the more felt as we came from a climate where the thermometer was never higher in the shade, even at mid-day, than 63° or 64°, to where it stood at 96° an hour before sunset. But what will men, who are really fond of field-sports, not go through in order to enjoy their favorite amusement, particularly when they are on the sunny side of twenty-five! And had we been ten times as tired as we were, the sight of what Neld had already shot, and his description of what he hoped we should yet do in the neighborhood, would have revived us. There was no need to ask many questions of our companion respecting the sport he had enjoyed, for in and around his tent were trophies that spoke for themselves. One of his classees, or tent-pitchers, was busy when we arrived pegging down the hide of a very large sambar deer, whose head, ornamented with immense antlers, lay a few yards off; and as we entered the mess-tent, we found Neld busy measuring and noting down the length of a skin which had just been taken off the body of a panther that had fallen to his rifle that afternoon; and four coolies, or porters had just arrived with a dead boar, which our friend had speared on the plains during the morning. "A panther, a sambar, two black buck, three spotted deer, and a boar, all in two days' sport, and I single-handed, is not so bad," said Neld, as we entered. And, indeed, the difficulty appeared to be what kind of game to select from, for both the plains and the forest, which was about a mile off, seemed to abound with every living creature that is not subject to the rule of man.

Our next day's work was, however, cut out for us. Neld's shikarie, a very trustworthy fellow, had brought in news that a large-sized tiger had been destroying the cattle of the villagers in the neighborhood, and the poor people had begged us to shoot the beast. This tiger had lately been in the habit of leaving the jungle in the night, killing a bullock, a calf, a sheep, or a goat, as the case might be, and returning to his lair shortly before, or sometimes shortly after, daybreak.

Neld had with him a couple of sporting elephants, which had been sent up from Meerut for his use. Upon these it was proposed we should start about three hours before dawn next day, and take up a position at some place which would intercept the tiger's retreat towards the jungle. All arrangements had been made; the villagers had tied a bullock to a tree not far from where he had killed one a night or two before, and, as we thought, nothing would be easier than to "pad" the brute before we returned to camp for breakfast.

At three A. M. we had mounted our elephants. One of these was a very stanch old animal, a thorough shikarie elephant, which could be trusted for steadiness under almost any circumstances. The other was also a good sporting elephant, but given at times to the worst fault an animal of the kind can have, I mean that of charging the tiger which his rider is pursuing. All that the sportsman wants a sporting elephant to do is to remain perfectly quiet when a tiger is found, and not to flinch if the brute tries to charge. As there was this inequality between the two elephants, Neld proposed that we should draw lots, and it fell to me to have the less steady of the two animals.

A tiger will never face the open flat country if he can possibly avoid doing so. In the present instance a ravine led from the outskirts of the forest to the village where the brute had been so often seen. At the bottom of the ravine, the banks of which were in no part more than twenty feet high, there ran, in the rainy months, a small current, and, even now, patches of damp sand here and there, seemed placed on purpose to receive marks of the tiger's "pug."

These had been carefully examined a short time before we reached the place, and the shukarie had given it as his decided opinion that the tiger had passed over the place, going away from the jungle, since nightfall.

It wanted now an hour of dawn, and we took the stations assigned to us. Bland and Neld, being on the best elephant, were placed near where a branch of the ravine diverged off, and where, unless the tiger (which was very unlikely) took to the open country, he would be sure to pass. My station was about a mile nearer the jungle. It was, so far, a better place than the other, that, hidden by a small clump of trees, I was pretty certain to get a clear shot at the tiger if my companions had spared him. Moreover, there was an old broken tank of clear water within fifty yards of where I stood, at which the brute would be safe to stop and drink, whether wounded or not, before he entered the jungle. Another advantage I had over my companions was that, as in the East, when the day has broken the broad light bursts forth almost immediately, it was pretty certain that by the time the tiger reached me, there would be daylight enough for me to take a steady shot at him.

Waiting in the dark, with nobody but two sleepy natives to talk to, and not able to smoke in case the smell might turn back the game, is not a cheerful way of passing the time. I knew that I should have to wait at least an hour, and it might be an hour and a half or two. I felt sleepy, and the atmosphere was very damp indeed. With me was the mahout who guided the elephant, and a syce, or horse-keeper, whom I had taken with me to look after my guns and ammunition.

This man, to whom, as will be seen presently, I owed my life that day, was not an Hindoostanee by race, although born in India. His own account of himself (and I believe it was perfectly true) and his parentage was as follows: His father was a pure born Seedee, or African, from the coast opposite Aden, who had by some means or other come to Bombay, and thence worked his way up to Gwalior, where he had taken service as horse-keeper with the Rajah of that place. Like the rest of his race he was a strict Mahometan, and on one occasion had left his master for a few months in order to perform the Hadze, or pilgrimage to Mecca. On his return thence he had visited his own country, and from thence brought with him to Upper India a bride of his own race. The eldest offspring of this union was my syce, Abdallah, who although speaking Hindoostanee exactly like a native of the country, had the curly hair, the snub nose, the thick lips, and all the other peculiarities of a decided African. A more faithful, or a braver fellow never lived. He had come into my service, as is the custom very often in India, with an Arab horse that I had bought from George Brown, the celebrated sportsman who was so long Judge at Mozuffernugur. Brown offered to keep Abdallah when he sold me "Gas-lights," and of course could afford to pay the man higher wages than he was ever likely to receive from the subaltern of a line regiment. Besides, in India, the position of the master is in a great measure reflected on his servants, and the syce of a Judge Sahib Bahadoor, to whom even the greatest of natives pay the most unbounded respect, is in a very different position—in the "society" he frequents—from the same servant on the establishment of an infantry sub. But Abdallah would not leave his horse. Where that animal went he would go, and although he had no fault whatever to find with his old master, he preferred to follow the fortunes of "Gas-lights," and at the time I write of he had been in my service about two years. Of course, after the custom of the East, he did nothing for me except look after his horse, except upon occasions like the present, when there might be danger to be met with. Moreover, Abdallah was a sportsman at heart. He was never so happy as when out intent on a shooting expedition, and could not only handle a smooth-bore well, but was no mean shot with a rifle.

I had been about an hour at my station, and, notwithstanding the strict injunctions given me by Neld when we parted, I had managed to smoke a couple of Manilla cheroots, when Abdallah, who was sitting behind me on the howdah, touched my arm and pointed to the east. There was just visible in that direction a faint glimmer of light, which, however, began to get wider and redder every moment. Just then I experienced the cold shiver which seems always to run through one's blood at dawn in India, and asking my henchman for the brandy-flask, was on the point of taking a pull at it, when, bang! bang! I could hear the report of a double shot, which sounded as loud as a small piece of cannon in the dead stillness of the morning. I knew as well as if I had fired them myself that it was Neld's two-ounce rifle that had spoken, and somehow I felt that he had done what he very seldom did,—had fired in vain. The shots—and it turned out that my reasoning was correct—had followed so quick upon each other that it was very evident the first had not taken effect; and had the second done so, I felt sure that there would have been a third. However, there was nothing to do but to wait, and, sure enough, in about five minutes I saw the tiger emerge from the ravine at the very spot which I had been set to watch.

I allowed him to get fairly on the edge of the nullah, when, at a distance of about sixty yards, he presented a beautiful shot, showing his whole side-length to me, and with the horizon for a background. In fact, it was a shot that no man deserving of the name of sportsman could have missed. I sighted my two-ounce rifle for sixty yards, and resting the weapon on the edge of the howdah, knelt down and took a pot-shot at him, aiming just behind the shoulder. Had the brute not moved, he would, as the Americans say, have "fallen in his tracks." But just as I pulled the trigger, he made a step forward, and although I heard the "thud" of the ball most distinctly, I could see that, although badly wounded, he was not killed. His roar of rage and pain was something fearful to hear. He turned to find out where the shot had come from, and as the damp of the morning had prevented the smoke of my rifle from rising, he at once charged towards us. But I could see that my ball had hit him in the spine, and that his hind legs were perfectly useless. However, the brute was still game, and kept moving towards us, roaring and tearing the earth with rage as he went. I intended to allow him to come within a dozen yards before I finished him off by a pot-shot, when the brute of an elephant on which we were riding turned tail, and in spite of all the mahout could do, fled over the plain with us on his back, and put at least a mile between the tiger and ourselves before he could be stopped.

Presently, however, we got the animal to return, and as he seemed now convinced that the tiger was no more to be seen, he went to the very spot where I had fired at the same. The animal was certainly gone, but the trail, or "pug," was so plain that a child might read it. The tiger had evidently been very hard hit, and one could trace quite plainly in the sand that his fore feet did their work properly, but that the hind ones overlapped each other, and must have moved as if the brute had St. Vitus's dance. Here and there it was evident that he had sat down to rest, and had again proceeded onwards. I was of opinion that he could not be far off, and this idea was confirmed by the conduct of our elephant, who would not move an inch beyond a certain spot.

Knowing that the tiger was dying, and anxious to prove to Neld and Bland that I really had killed the brute, I dismounted from the howdah and entered the thick brushwood, along which, until we reached a couple of miles into the forest, we could trace the animal by various marks. Abdallah, who was quite as eager as myself for sport, had stripped off all his garments except a waistband, and followed, with my second gun, close behind me. The more we advanced into the forest the larger the trees became, and the more open the underwood. The trail of the tiger we lost and found, and lost and found again, but at last could only make out that the animal had doubled back again. This puzzled us very much, for a wounded tiger invariably goes direct to his lair, and never attempts to deceive his pursuers. Fairly tired out, I sat down to smoke a cheroot, and consult with Abdallah as to what we had best do.

My henchman, who had somehow picked up the science of sporting, was of opinion that something must have headed the tiger. And yet what was there—unless, which was very unlikely, for we should certainly have heard of it, any other party of sportsmen was in the neighborhood—to frighten a tiger, who is certainly the lord of the forest in the jungles where no bison are to be found. Abdallah persisted in his opinion that the tiger had been headed or frightened back, and as we sat talking over the matter, a faint noise some distance off reached me.

Abdallah sprang to his feet as if he had been electrified, and then flung himself flat on the ground, with his ear close to the earth, whilst I, who had hardly heard what had surprised him so much, and had taken it for the screech of some forest bird, regarded him with no small astonishment. In less than a minute he was up again, his face fairly beaming with delight and excitement.

"Sahib," he whispered, as if afraid that even the trees would overhear him,—"Sahib, your luck is great to-day. Inshalla, we shall return to the tents, and be able to show Neld Sahib and Bland Sahib that we have killed something greater than tigers. You heard that sound just now? It is ten years since I heard it last, when I went with Judge Brown Sahib to the great jungle of Canara. But I thought I knew it again, and since I put my ear to the earth, I am certain. Sahib, there is a herd of elephants in the forest, and you will see them very shortly. They are coming this way slowly, and are grazing as they come. Inshalla, your rifle shall make some of them eat dirt before the day is over. Listen, Sahib, as I did just now; lie down, and put your ear to the earth."

I did so, and could distinctly hear the movements of several very large and heavy animals. They were coming towards us, but slowly, and pausing often as they came. Presently I heard again, and once yet more distinctly, the shrill cry which had first made Abdallah start up. As I lay listening with my ear to the earth, the huge brutes seemed to get nearer and nearer to us. At last Abdallah touched me on the arm, and pointed to the forked branch of a banian tree, on which I mounted, my companion motioning me not to go too high on the tree. Here I at once perceived, about forty yards in front of me, but still half hid by the forest, a very sea of black backs, indicating that the herd must be very large indeed. One old patriarch of a bull, very light-colored about the head, and of enormous size in the ears, stood within a dozen yards of me. His was the only head I could see out of the whole lot, and as he stood calmly looking at me with his mild eye, I almost felt that I had not the heart to fire at him. However, there was little time for reflection. I had never shot an elephant before, but knew that the only vulnerable spots of his whole body are just above where the trunk joins the head, and the eye. The latter is so small that it does not afford much of a mark, but still it was something at which to aim. Acting by Abdallah's whispered advice, which seemed to come from one well practised in that sport, I crept up within a dozen yards of the elephant, and then, taking great care to keep the trunk of a tree between us, I whistled. The brute moved his head round as if to catch the sound better, and in an instant a two-ounce ball was sent crashing through his eye into the brain. He reeled and toppled over like a falling tower, and came down with a crash that shook the very earth on which I stood. I never shall forget the pleasure of that moment. I quite forgot the rest of the immense herd that surrounded me on three sides, and it was only when Abdallah almost pulled me by force behind a tree, and I got out of the way of a female that would certainly have crushed me to death, and, as it was, my danger was not half over.

Abdallah had hardly uttered the words, and I had barely time to interpose the friendly shelter of the stem of the tree between myself and the quarter whence danger was to be apprehended, when the whole herd seemed to be on us. The jungle was so thick that it was impossible to see more than here and there the backs and heads of the monsters, but these were quite enough to convince me that enormous as was the male elephant I had killed, he was by no means the largest of his fellows.

They passed us in Indian file, crashing through the tangled underwood, and brushing aside the largest branches of trees, much the same as a Newfoundland dog would walk through a field of wheat. Every now and then one or other of the herd would raise their trunks and utter the short scream which is so certain an indication of anger. As near as I could judge there must have been quite eighteen or twenty of these enormous brutes that passed us, and the feeling was not pleasant that the least exposure of my person would have brought them down upon me. Abdallah had vanished, but I felt sure he had not abandoned me, and was not far off. Presently, when the herd had passed, my faithful follower came down from a high tree, and I could see by his face that he thought our position one which was still full of danger. He had seen plenty of elephants and of elephant shooting in Southern India; whereas to me the sport was perfectly new. I shall never forget his look of dismay when I proposed that we should at once proceed to cut out the enormous tusks of the dead elephant. "No, Sahib, no," he exclaimed. "Other hattie too much quickly come back, smell him dead brother, see master, and stampee, stampee master and Abdallah dead." In short, he very quickly made me understand, partly in his broken English, partly in Hindoostanee, and partly by signs, that if we valued our lives the only thing we could do was to make haste and get away from the place before the herd came back.

The sagacity of the elephant is wonderful, as even the most superficial readers of natural history know. But I had no idea until Abdallah explained to me, and what I afterwards found out—nearly at the cost of my own life—was true, that this animal's instinct is so near akin to reason. It will be remembered that when we first heard the elephants, what little wind there was, happened to be blowing from them towards us. The consequence of this was, that we were able to get near them, and to kill one of their number. They were quite aware that they had lost a companion, but owing to their being to windward, could neither make out by the scent where the dead body was, or where the enemy that had killed him could be found. The object they had in view, as Abdallah explained to me, in rushing past us in Indian file, was to take what sailors would call a good offing, and then beat up wind to find out where the slayer of their brother elephant could be found. This search, Abdallah said,—and his words proved perfectly true,—would be conducted in an extended line, and unless we could get out of the jungle, or at any rate out of their line of search before they came to where we were, it would most likely fare badly with us.

But what about the dead elephant? I asked, for I was loath to leave such splendid trophies as his tusks behind. To say nothing of the way they would authenticate the story respecting my sport that day, nor of the incredulity with which Bland and Neld would listen to my tale, if I brought home nothing to verify what I said, the tusks, I felt sure, were of considerable value for the ivory. Abdallah, however, was resolute. All I could get him to do was to cut off the tail of the brute, and to promise that he would "plenty make mark on tree," meaning that he would here and there blaze the trees we passed, so as to find his way back again on some future occasion, and then to recover the tusk.

It soon became evident that my follower was in the right, and that the herd was returning on their expedition. Abdallah stooped down with his ear close to the earth, and made me a sign to do the same. I could then distinctly hear the leisurely tramp of the herd, their occasional screams, and their continued breaking down of trees. Our object was to outflank them and get beyond the end of their line before they were near enough to smell us. Consequently, as they came slowly towards us from the west, their line extending north and south, we kept edging away towards the north, and trying to pass beyond the north end of their line before they reached us.

Unfortunately our progress was slow. To the north of where we were was the nearest edge of the jungle, but the brushwood, the roots of trees, the grass, and the hundreds of strong creepers that twist from stem to stem in every Indian forest, were so very thick that they caused us to stumble at every second step. My follower was not much impeded by his clothes, for he had nothing on him except a cloth round his loins; but I was hindered, and stopped, and my clothes torn every moment. Thus as we progressed slowly in one direction, whilst the elephants were evidently getting nearer and nearer to us from the other, our position was getting more and more dangerous. So long as we kept a certain distance from the line, the brutes would hardly be able to discover us by the smell, keen as is their scent. Very fortunately too for us, what little wind there was nearly died out, so that it would be much more difficult than it had been an hour previously for the brutes to discover us. But, as Abdallah said when he heard their screams, they were fully aware that some enemy or other was at hand, and they were bent upon finding out who the enemy was. More than once I urged Abdallah to make the best use he could of his legs, and leave me to shift for myself. But this he flatly refused to do. "What I say s'pose Bland Sahib and Neld Sahib ask, 'Where your master?'" was the only response I could get out of him.

Presently we seemed to get nearer the edge of the jungle, for the light between the trees became plainer and plainer. If we could only get out in the open, we should be safe, for even if the elephants had run they would hardly have followed us out of the forest. But, as Abdallah, who from time to time put his ear down to the earth, informed me, the elephants were evidently getting nearer and nearer, and there were several of their line that outflanked us considerably. So far as I could judge from the sounds of crashing through the trees, some of the herd were not more than fifty yards on our side, whilst the edge of the jungle was about a couple of hundred yards in our front. Had the ground been anything like open we could have easily got off in time, but we were fairly pounded. In front of us lay a mass of thick brushwood, intermingled with a perfect mass of creepers and twisted plants; to our right the ground seemed still thicker, and to our left were the approaching elephants. Go on we could not, and, as Abdallah said, the only thing for it was to turn back and climb a high banian-tree we had left behind us. There was not a moment to lose, for the herd was getting nearer and nearer. Abdallah was a few paces in front of me, and had already commenced to climb, when my left foot and right arm got entangled at the same time in one of those cable-like creepers which are to be met with in Indian jungles. I had got my right leg over a prostrate tree, but further I could not move without help from some one else, and Abdallah, thinking I was close behind him, had turned round the tree and was out of sight. To cry out to him would have only brought the elephants upon us all the more quickly, and they were getting nearer and nearer. Most fortunately for me the spot where I was held, as in a vice, was directly in front of the banian-tree, and this must have made some of the elephants diverge a few feet out of their line. Otherwise, judging from what I heard of their movements, one of the brutes must have walked right upon me, and my life would not have been worth five minutes' purchase.

But it was only when the danger was past that I knew of what value this friendly banian-tree had been. For some minutes—it appeared an age to me—I lay, or rather sat (I should have been much safer if I could have lain down), expecting every moment to be crushed to death, and unable to move either hand or foot. Nearer and nearer came the elephants, until at last I could feel the wind caused by the moving of their great bodies through the air. The earth, too, seemed to shake as they came nearer, for as Abdallah told me (he had seen them from the tree where he was perched), there were not less than a dozen large, and five or six small elephants, within twenty yards of where I was fixed and utterly helpless. A cold sweat burst out over me, and although I had often faced death in many ways, it seemed that all my courage gave way. I could feel that I was ghastly pale. My lips felt parched. My heart seemed to stand still. To be bound and helpless, with the certainty of a cruel end before one, is very different from meeting death face to face, and fighting for dear life with what energy and strength you have. I thought of home, of my poor mother in England, of friends I should see no more, of my regiment, of the chances of Abdallah escaping, of the improbability of it being known how I had come by my end, in the event that my follower should die, — all these among many more things passed through my brain, as I felt how utterly hopeless was my situation. My double-barrelled rifle was on my left hand, but I could not use it — could not get my right hand to where my left was. Had I been bound by ropes to the stake, I could not have been more effectually hindered from helping myself in the very least.

Fortunately it did not last long. The last thing I can recollect was hearing an elephant crash through the underwood within a few feet of me, and I must then have fainted. When I came to myself I was loose from the creepers, and Abdallah who had evidently cut them away with my hunting-knife, was pouring some brandy from my flask down my throat. There was not an elephant to be seen or heard. Abdallah told me that it was only when he had got some way up the tree that he found I was not with him, and felt sure I had got behind or into another part of the same tree. He did not like to call to me, for it would not have been safe to do so. When the elephants had passed him a little something seemed to have scared them, and he could hear them making off towards the interior of the jungle much faster than they came, screaming as they went. He then searched for me, and discovered me not four feet from where the largest of the herd had passed. I was in a dead faint, with my head hanging down, and as the poor fellow expressed himself, it was "plenty much time" before he could bring me to my senses.

Now that the danger was past, we became curious to know what it was that had frightened the elephants, and Abdallah went beating about here and there, whilst I sat still smoking a cheroot, and silently thanking God for having delivered me from so great a danger. Presently there was a shout of triumph from Abdallah and then another calling me from about fifty yards off to come to him.

In a moment I was on my feet, and when I reached the man found him dancing a sort of waltz, whilst in front of him, under a big bush, where it had evidently crept to die, lay the tiger I had shot about two hours before. Thus to come upon the body of what I feared had been lost forever, was an immense piece of luck, and I was not the least surprised that Abdallah felt rejoiced at finding it.

But it was high time to return to camp. Now that the excitement was over, there came upon me a kind of reaction which was most painful. I felt hardly able to drag one leg after the other, and no wonder. With the exception of a cup of coffee before daybreak, I had tasted nothing since the day before. My clothes were almost torn off my back, and I was bruised and cut by stones in many places. However, I took care to make Abdallah blaze the trees as we went along, and promised him a backsheesh of a hundred rupees (£10) for his day's conduct. The elephant from whose back I had shot the tiger was fortunately found within a few yards of the spot where we had left him, and I have no doubt his driver would have kept him there a week if I had not returned. By the time we reached our tents it was considerably past noon, and never did bath, clean clothes, and breakfast appear more grateful to famished sportsman than they did to me that day. At first Bland and Neld would not believe a word of what I told them either about the tiger or the elephant. When I showed them the fresh-cut-off tail of the latter, and Abdallah, on being cross-examined, corroborated every word I said, their astonishment knew no bounds. To think that a herd of elephants should have come so far from their usual haunts, and that two of the most experienced sportsmen in the Northwest Provinces should have been within a couple of miles of them and not even know of their presence was most annoying, and I am quite sure that either the one or the other of my companions would have given a hundred pounds to have had my success on that day.

A long sleep — after a hearty breakfast, which had been preceded by a bath and a thorough change of clothes — made me feel another man.

Shortly before sunset the villagers we had sent out with one of Bland's peons to bring in the skin of the tiger, and the tusks and skull of the elephant, returned to camp, and many were the congratulations I received when the size of these trophies was seen. The tusks I sold some months later for a round sum in rupees; and the tiger-skin was the carpet of my tent in India, afterwards of my barrack-room in England, and now that I have given up soldiering, does the same duty in my study, reminding me of the first and last day of elephant shooting I ever enjoyed.

USELESS KNOWLEDGE.

EVERY clever young man, I believe, passes through a stage of extravagant ambition. He keeps his day-dreams to himself if he has either common sense or modesty; but at moments — and very pleasant moments they are — he sees himself enshrined in the memory of a grateful world, revolutionizing systems of thought, embodying the aspirations of mankind in undying verse, or scattering plenty through a smiling land, and reading his history in a nation's eyes. It is well if, when those dreams dissolve under the pressure of real work, they leave him content with the modest share of glory or good conscience which falls to the lot of most of us. Whilst they last the youth is frequently troubled, amongst other weaknesses, by a hankering after omniscience. No bounded field of knowledge satisfies his buoyant sense of unused power; he is ready to plunge into scientific researches, to study universal history, to be a profound theologian and metaphysician, to be familiar with law and politics, and to soften his severer studies by an accurate acquaintance with poetry and the fine arts. It is an act of bitter self-denial when he first forces himself to recognize the fact that the human intellect is limited, and that the essential condition of utility in this world is to restrict one's self to a narrow field of labor. All knowledge is too vast a province for any one in these days; we must be content to work in the confidence that our energies will be supplemented by those of our fellow-laborers, and be satisfied if we have done any real service, however humble, towards helping on the improvement of the world. In time it becomes a positive source of pleasure to reflect upon the vast fields of thought in which we are never called to exert ourselves. I have heard a man of great ability express a sense of humiliation on walking through one of the Universal Exhibitions; at every step, he said, he met something which painfully reminded him of his own ignorance, and brought vividly before his mind the narrow limits of his knowledge. I confess that the effect upon me is very different. I have walked through acres of textile fabrics, miles of ingenious machinery, tens of thousands of square yards of painting, vast accumulations of all the countless products of human ingenuity, and silently given thanks at every step. Here, I have exclaimed, is yet one more branch of knowledge on which I am, and shall always remain, hopelessly, profoundly, and contentedly ignorant. Here, for example, is a steam-engine: I have not the faintest notion how it is made, or what conditions are necessary for its success. If, by some reversion of the ordinary laws of nature, the tide of time would flow back with me, and set me down, say in the fifteenth century, I could not convey the slightest information to the curious people who would doubtless flock round me. Somehow or other, I would say, if you put water into a boiler and light a fire under it, and make a complicated arrangement of wheels and pistons, the thing will move, and carry you in a couple of hours from London to Dover; but if you want to know how it is done you must wait for two or three centuries. It is, perhaps, wrong to rejoice at not knowing something which, as people are always saying in public speeches, ought to be familiar to every school-boy of fourteen; but I pity that imaginary school-boy, and rejoice sincerely that so many people are laboring to remove from me every necessity of investigating the matter for myself. In the ingenious romance of Sandford and Merton, a story is told of a gentleman and a carpenter, supposed to be cast away on a savage island; and a moral is drawn for the edification of youth from the fact that the carpenter is much more valued for his power of making baskets than the gentleman for his knowledge of Greek and Latin. The true inference would, of course, be that the savages were very stupid to value basket-making more than scholarship; and it is a main advantage of civilization that it enables some classes to free themselves from mechanical toil. Yet, though we no longer share the delusion of the eighteenth century as to the superiority of man in a state of nature, we all too often listen to exhortations conceived in much the same spirit. What a shame it is, people exclaim, that we go through life knowing nothing of the most ordinary processes that are going on around us. What a comfort it is, I always reply to myself, that I can get on perfectly well without knowing how to plough, or to make my coats, or to cook my dinner, far less to make an electric telegraph. "When Adam delved, and Eve span, where was then the gentleman?" He was an impossibility, and that circumstance must have been a decided drawback to the state of society in Paradise.

So far, my confession may, perhaps, be regarded with indulgence. One may take a certain epicurean pleasure in the sight of the vast fields of knowledge which one is never destined to tread, and yet feel gratitude for those who consent to explore them. I may hug myself on my ignorance, and feel no grudge against the knowing part of mankind. Yet I confess that I sometimes go a little further than this. There is something depressing in the monstrous accumulation of facts which is going on all round us. There is a loss, as well as a gain, in the results of all this amazing industry. We cannot but envy the great men of old days who could be at once statesmen, and soldiers, and philosophers, and artists, and regret that it is daily becoming more difficult to be anything but an infinitesimal wheel in a machinery of boundless complication. All the societies for the acquisition of useful knowledge, which spread and flourish around us, seem at times to be hostile to a genuine cultivation. We are aghast at the enormous quantity of things with which it is possible, and sometimes necessary, to be acquainted. Undoubtedly all such societies—not including the Social Science Association—have their uses. We laugh at them, and protest against them, and end by admitting that they do good service in their way. Yet I have sometimes thought that there will soon be room for another society, which might be called the Society for the Suppression of Useless Knowledge,—not so much as a direct opponent, but as a necessary corrective to the energy of its rivals. The first meeting might be held in the Reading-room of the British Museum.

Scholars sometimes lament, or affect to lament, the burning of the Alexandrian Library, yet I cannot help fancying that they are occasionally laughing in their sleeves; and that, if it depended upon a word, they would hesitate before tumbling out upon the world those masses of manuscripts which are, fortunately or otherwise, beyond our reach forever. Consider the countless volumes which encumber the world, and daunt all but the most energetic students, and which owe their existence to the ancient literature now in existence; multiply them in proportion of the remnant to the mass which once existed, and ask whether, by this time, we should not have been forced to do some burning on our own account. The British Museum itself always gives me a melancholy sensation. Suppose that any one should read industriously for ten hours a day, he might, we will suppose, assimilate two or three average volumes in the time,—assuming that he has previously acquired the sciences requisite for their due understanding. Even so, many single volumes would take months rather than days of labor. Let us admit, however, that in a year he has thoroughly digested a thousand volumes. In thirty years of uninterrupted labor at this rate he would have got through a very small fraction of the huge stores of literature which crush the shelves of that enormous collection. He would have traversed one region of the great ocean of knowledge, and would still see a boundless expanse extending before him. It is enough to damp the appetite of the most determined bookworm to think of the liberal provision made for his consumption. So far, however, the employment is innocent enough; the most indomitable of literary gluttons feels that an ample feast is provided for him, and may, if he pleases, gloat over the prospect. He may even bestow upon the world the result of his labors, and publish one of those books in which the mere list of authorities at the foot of the pages sends a shiver through the reader's marrow, — especially if the reader is unaware of the display which may be cheaply made by the help of a few skilfully manipulated books of reference. But there is a more painful conclusion behind. Let us think, for example, of what history is rapidly becoming. Formerly, a man might be content if he dashed through a few centuries in as many pleasantly written octavo volumes, remembered a short list of dates of royal accessions and battles, and some of the floating anecdotes which have become proverbial. Now it takes as long to write history as to live it. Lord Macaulay began swimmingly, and took us through some thirty years in a couple of delightful volumes; but, as he continued, his plan expanded, and it became evident that, if he had happily been spared to complete his original plan, he must have lived a century longer, and would have found that materials were accumulating faster than he could write down the results. The ideal history seems to be one in which we could trace everything that happened to everybody, and know what he thought about it, and how far he was right or wrong. We are required to study all the State papers that were written, to follow the details of every negotiation, to form an opinion of every actor, to know all about the contemporary literature, and, in short, to be as familiar with all the events of some past epoch as the inhabitant of Little Pedlington with the gossip of his charming village. If the plan continues, it is awful to think of the fate of historians in the year 1969. They will have to read through all the daily, weekly, monthly, and quarterly publications of the period, from the lists of births, deaths, and marriages to the parliamentary reports; to study all the blue-books as conscientiously as a newly elected M. P.; to read all the despatches of all the secretaries of state and ambassadors, and everything that was said in answer to them or about them by observers in foreign countries; to study parish registers, and law reports, and tables of statistics; to go through the literature of the period, from ephemeral novels up to works on metaphysics; to plunge into masses of manuscript letters and memoirs; and, after taking in this and much more, to digest it into some comprehensive whole. The history of a year, instead of being squeezed into a paragraph, will expand over a long series of folios. The materials for such portentous labors are being conscientiously preserved and ranged in due order in the most accessible shape. Every private person of any sense has a periodical jail-delivery, and burns the heaps of correspondence which would otherwise make our houses uninhabitable, and choke every cupboard and available receptacle. The nation, so far from imitating this prudent precaution, preserves every scrap of paper — useless rubbish or invaluable document — as though print were more sacred than human life. Are we not laying up stores of knowledge which will go far to drive some future philosopher mad? Would not such a society as I have mentioned be discharging a useful function if it were to burn, sink, and destroy some ninety-nine hundredths of the waste-paper which, as it seems without hyperbole, the world itself will scarcely be able to contain?

When we were at school, history was surely a pleasanter thing. We did not, it is true, know so many facts as are now considered essential to a well-regulated mind. If we complain that our memories are in danger of being swamped, and impatiently tax our remorseless crammers with pedantry, we are, I know, sternly reproved. A love of truth, it is said, is desirable in itself. No pains that are suffered in the service of truth are superfluous; and truth of all kinds is desirable for its own sake, and a sufficient reward for the patient inquirer. The argument surely confounds two very different things. It is not a question between truth and fiction; but between knowledge and ignorance. There are many things which ought simply to be consigned to oblivion, because they are of no real use to any human being, and are so much dead-weight on the memory. A very similar confusion is constantly turning up in disputes about art. If we complain of the photographic style of painting, in which every trifle is conscientiously imitated, in the apparent belief that our eyes are microscopes, we are taxed with a want of love for truth. Truth has nothing to do with it.

The ultimate object of art is to affect our imaginations, not to record the greatest possible number of facts. Labor bestowed upon subsidiary objects is not only thrown away, but positively weakens the effect by distracting our minds. It is undoubtedly necessary that whatever is represented should be represented faithfully, for otherwise it would have no interest for us; but it does not follow that as many things as possible should be represented. History, in the same way, if it is understood to mean an account of everything that ever happened, would include vast masses of rubbish that ought to be left to unbroken repose in the dust-hole. Dryasudst and his brethren have filled libraries with profoundly learned speculations, and, when they did not abuse each other like pickpockets, have kept up an exchange of elaborate compliment, which the poor innocent public has naturally taken in good faith. Who wrote the letters of Junius? Who was the man in the iron mask? Where did Julius Cæsar land in Britain? To these and hundreds of other questions of a similar kind, many persons would answer simply, "We don't care." It does not make the very slightest difference in any possible way. Somebody wrote Junius who was dead and buried a good many years back, and their influence on politics was just the same whoever was the author. The simplest plan would surely be to follow the precedent of the naval captain, who makes it twelve o'clock. Let us assume, in future, that Sir Philip Francis was the writer; the S. S. U. K. would be intrusted with the destruction of all evidence and all arguments making in a contrary direction; the future historians of the eighteenth century would be relieved from a very thankless task, and nobody, so far as I can see, would be one penny the worse.

In the same way I would decide, once for all, that Julius Cæsar landed (say) at Deal, and insist upon the question being finally laid on the shelf, and antiquarians turning their energies to some more fruitful field. Such disquisitions have had their use, like the pieces of imaginary gold for which the old man in the fable advised his sons to dig in the vineyard. They have incidentally produced a great turning-over of original authorities, and thrown light upon more important inquiries. But this is an inducement for children: we are old enough to know what is really valuable, and to seek for it systematically and straightforwardly. It is useful to give boys puzzles to exercise their arithmetical talents; but when they grow to be real mathematicians the puzzles sink to their proper place as mere playthings. It must be added, too, though here I confess that my ground is logically weaker, that there are some cases in which the weakness of the flesh leads one to prefer fiction to truth. Whilst we grow doubly anxious to investigate useless matters of fact, we remorselessly sweep away all the charming fables in which we once rejoiced. To say nothing of Romulus and Remus, of King Hengist and Horsa, and of all the pleasant heroes who had the one fault, and that fault shared with many of the most delightful companions of our school-days, of having never existed, we are in real danger of losing all our villains. Tiberius and Caligula are being changed into amiable monarchs. Richard III. was an excellent uncle, who spoilt his nephews, instead of smothering them; and in the words of the poet, "Never a monster need now despair, and every knave has a chance." It is true that, by way of compensation, some excellent characters are being sadly mauled, and the romance ruthlessly stripped off our ancient idols. It is impossible to see the process without some regret.

All visitors to Oxford may remember the grotesque heads, covered with grime, and with highly comic expressions, produced by various accidents to their noses and cheeks, which used to stand upon pedestals round the theatre. The last time I paid them my respects, I was shocked to observe that they had been going through the process which we facetiously describe as restoration. Their green visages had been scraped, chiselled, and filed down, till they wore a most irreproachable and insipid simper. To my eyes their beauty had entirely departed, and they looked the noble savage of fiction, dressed up in a black coat and a white tie. The process deserves imitation in one respect; for it would be a great saving if, instead of erecting new monuments to recent benefactors of their species, we could plane down some of the old ones into new forms, and, for example, convert an ugly old Charles I. into a bran-new George III. But I confess that the change conveyed, on the whole, a melancholy moral to my mind. That is the process, I said to myself, through which all our dear old villains are being replaced in history. The ancient monuments are being scrupulously restored, which, in official language, means destroyed, or at least flayed alive. Before long we shall not have a villain to quote in a paragraph. Every old hero, who cut his rivals' throats, strangled his wives, and massacred his subjects, is being converted into a likeness of a comfortable, well-dressed citizen, with everything handsome about him. It does them no good, and deprives us of a great deal of harmless amusement. When our descendants have to refer to Robespierre, instead of loading him, like our grandfathers, with every epithet that indignation and horror could suggest, they will be obliged to speak of him as that amiable, if misguided patriot, whose excellent intentions sometimes led him into measures which, if we only knew what they were, we might possibly condemn from our improved point of view, but which seem to have been, on the whole, in harmony with the moral code of the times. For when it is impossible to deny that a man has committed crimes, it is always open to us, to point out that crimes in one century cease to be very criminal in another. What with softening down shadows and slurring over lights, the clear distinctive history of former days, in which every man was a saint or a ruffian, is being toned down into a monotonous record of commonplace people without a single deviation from the average standard. Surely it is permissible in those days of universal respectability to regret the change for a moment. If Richard did not smother his nephews, he ought to have done it, — or, at least, he ought to be held to have done it, — just to increase the pleasure with which infant minds are initiated into history.

I must admit, however, that this is a digression, and, perhaps, will not bear a very strict inspection. Let us have the truth in matters which have any bearing upon history; but do not let us suppose that because a thing really happened, it is a sufficient reason for its never being forgotten; or, which is a parallel case, that because a thing exists somewhere in the universe, it is important that we should know all about it. We have lost as well as gained by the progress of scientific knowledge. Though I have heard some bigoted conservatives curse the memory of Columbus, we may take it to be a good thing that America was discovered. It is as well that we should know where are the sources of the Nile, and be able to construct a tolerably trustworthy map of Central Asia. In short, we cannot seriously complain that our planet has become a very limited place, in which every hole and corner has been pretty well explored, and laid down in perfectly accessible ground-plans. Yet the loss of mystery is a real loss to our imaginations. There is no room for the anthropophagi and men whose heads do grow beneath their shoulders. Prester John and the land of Eldorado have not so much as an unoccupied acre of ground left to hold on by. Once we were like children living in a corner of some huge rambling manor-house, and fancying that all kinds of ghosts and phantoms might be lurking in the remoter rooms to which they had never penetrated. We have grown up and walked through every passage, and peeped into every closet, and find that it is all very commonplace, and that the haunted palace is not much more romantic than an ordinary lodging-house. This is a small set-off, it may be, and yet I think it is a set-off against the practical advantages: the completion of the Pacific Railway, and the establishment of regular lines of steam-communication with the most remote islands of the ocean. The process, indeed, would not stop here, if it depended upon the goodwill of men of science. We have lately heard immense rejoicings over the discoveries which have extended our knowledge even beyond the solar system. It is unspeakably gratifying, it seems, to be able to say that some sort of gas (I entirely decline to write down any specific name, lest I should expose myself to the laughter of all well-informed persons) is to be found not only in this ridiculously small planet, but in the sun, and in Sirius, and in various stars up and down the sky. That the discoverers have shown remarkable powers of mind, I am most willing to believe; but I can't yet derive much comfort from the knowledge they have gained. Suppose that it is plainly made out that, at a distance of more millions of miles than the mind of man can conceive, there is some unpronounceable stuff, which also exists here, how am I the better for that fact? I do not mean, how will it increase my income, but how shall I be the happier or the wiser? Everybody was in a great state of excitement last summer to hear something about certain red prominences which appear round the sun in eclipses, and to know what they were made of. What, I ask, are the red prominences to me, or I to the red prominences? The moon was always one of my illusions, and it has been cruelly put down by these men of science. We are now informed, if I am not mistaken, that it is nothing but a big burnt-out cinder, which is some use in getting up tides (not that I know very clearly what is the good of tides), but totally unsuitable for intending emigrants, even if they could get there. Every one who has had a proper value for the moon, considered in a poetical or æsthetic point of view, must regret that it turns out to be nothing better than a second-hand earth, with a large quantity of mountains, and not even the ghost of an Alpine Club to climb them. Here, I am aware, I am upon ticklish ground. There is no name of greater power at the present day than that of science; and it is as awkward to say anything against the pretensions of men of science, as it once was to be a heretic of a different order. You cannot, it is true, be burnt alive, or put into an inquisition, but, which is almost as bad, you can be made to look extremely foolish. The men of science regard you through their spectacles with an air calculated to strike terror into the boldest heart, if you venture to question the advantage of their most trifling speculations. Anything which by hook or by crook can be brought under the mantle of an 'ology is a sacred object not to be touched by the profane vulgar. A poor savage sees a civilized being, capable of producing thunder and supplied with unlimited quantities of firewater, devote himself for years to the pursuit of bugs, — using that word in the American sense. This strange creature will live for months in a wilderness, and be amply rewarded by collecting a boatload of creeping, crawling things, which are not even good to eat. The savage thinks that the white man must be little better than an idiot: and the white man, when he comes home, writes his book, and holds the savage up to the derision of an enlightened public. — "Here," he says in effect, "is a poor creature so ignorant as to think me a fool for spending a month in discovering the Holonechrononthologus Jonesii, — an animal which differs from all other Holonechrononthologi in having two more spots on his nose, and an extra claw on his hind leg." Is it so plain that the white man has altogether the best of the argument? Suppose that the beast in question had remained unknown, would the human race have been materially the worse? Or, to put it more moderately, could not the month have been spent to more purpose in some other field of labor? Some distinguished martyr to science once planted a colony of some loathsome insect in his thumb, and heroically travelled to Europe with his burden, in the hopes of discovering some new facts about the way in which the animal laid its eggs. Unluckily, if I remember right, the thumb mortified and had to be amputated within sight of land; and we have ever since been called upon to admire the zeal and heroism of the sufferer. I am willing to do so, just as I admire St. Simeon Stylites for standing for twenty years on a column, and saying his prayers 1,244 times a day. Only I cannot help asking, in each case, whether so rare a quality of heroism could not have been turned to some better account? Zeal is not a commodity of which we have such an abundance that we can complacently see it running to waste. Science often means nothing more than accurate and systematic knowledge of facts; and the question always remains whether the facts are really worth knowing.

If a man of genius spends years in investigating the habits of a microscopic animalcule, it does not follow that the game was worth the candle, simply because we give to the knowledge gained the mystic name of science. I have been amused in watching a controversy which has sometimes been carried on upon a trifling point of this nature. A harmless race of lunatics has lately taken to amusing itself by climbing the Alps, and has even formed a club for the purpose of stimulating the natural zeal of Englishmen to scramble up difficult places at the risk of their necks. If enthusiasts frankly say that they climb because they like it, they are sternly reproved, and told that they are unpardonably rash. If they more judiciously swear by the name of science, their critics take off their hats and retire with a graceful bow. But what is the difference? If I go up Mont Blanc to improve my digestion, and have a good time generally, I so far increase the sum of human happiness. If I take a barometer with me, and discover once more that the pressure of the air on the summit is fifteen inches less than at the bottom, I add one more infinitesimal fact to those already known. I advance science in so far as I increase by a microscopic amount the mass of raw material upon which philosophers are to reason. But the effect of my observation upon the virtue or happiness of mankind is so inconceivably minute as to be inexpressible in language or figures. In one case, I directly add to my own happiness and health; in the other I add one more trifling bit of information to many millions already accumulated, and may possibly do some indirect good to somebody. Is the difference between the two actions so enormous that one should be unparingly condemned and the other held up to general admiration? Has science so mysterious a power that the most homeopathic expression of scientific intention converts any quantity of equivocal conduct into pure virtue? If people would only remember that science is nothing but knowledge put into formulæ, they would free themselves from this superstitious awe, and see that the line of demarcation is not so broad as they sometimes imagine. It is an historical fact that I walked down the Strand at twelve o'clock on the 1st of May, 1869; it is a scientific fact that the thermometer on that day stood at 60° in my study; but whether either of those facts be worth recording must depend upon the influence which the knowledge of them would exert upon human happiness. The thermometrical fact is, no doubt the most interesting in the case supposed, but it is possible to have too much of thermometers.

In saying all this, I do not mean for one moment to sneer at scientific people. I love and admire them. I rejoice to see blue flames and electric sparks, and to hear loud explosions, and even to smell disagreeable odors at the Royal Institution or at the Polytechnic. I even like to flatter myself that I am making a scientific observation when I tempt the appetite of the hippopotamus at the Zoological Gardens with nuts, or offer a rusty nail to the ostrich. Nothing is more gratifying than to watch the ardor with which men throw themselves into disputes as to the origin of species, and the shape of a monkey's brain. I am perfectly content with being a man, and cannot see that it makes much difference whether my remote ancestors were apes or human beings. Still, it is pleasant to see people so keen on the subject; and to remark, at the same time, the strong brotherly love which always prevents them from growing bitter in the ardor of controversy, and accusing each other of plagiarism or want of candor. I remember the old grammarian who wished to send his brother's soul "to eternal perdition, for his treatise on the irregular verb," and am glad that a scientific heresy cannot excite an equal degree of animosity. I revere even mathematicians, though totally unable to understand them, and especially unable to make out why the elaborate investigation of some theories is at all more respectable than the discovery of problems in whist or chess, or the invention of Chinese puzzles. But, to be perfectly candid, I think that men of science have one trifling fault. They are apt to be a little arrogant, and to presume upon the respect which they have fairly won. For the genuine leaders of thought this is at least pardonable, but they have introduced a rather unpleasant style amongst persons who, without due authority, love to clothe themselves in their mantle. Every penny-a-liner is ready to twaddle about the "inexorable laws of supply and demand,"—generally in the most complete ignorance of what those laws really are,—and to indulge in platitudes about the infallibility of economic science. For a similar reason I was truly pleased at reading the other day (I know not whether it was accurate), that the Gulf Stream had been proved to be a delusion. The Gulf Stream was almost as great a nuisance as Macaulay's New Zealander, or the German who evolves things from the depths of his consciousness. One could not mention the weather without giving a chance to somebody to clothe himself with the true scientific swagger, and hurl the Gulf Stream at your head. There are certain remarks which nobody ever makes without a certain air of superior wisdom: such as the political commonplace that the tyranny of a mob is as bad as the tyranny of a despot; and the man who affected familiarity with the Gulf Stream always seemed to feel himself six inches taller in consequence. I should have real pleasure in learning that the Gulf Stream had been definitively exploded.

What is the real moral of these remarks? Ought we not, in spite of sophistries, to rejoice in every extension of knowledge, and to believe that sooner or later it will turn to some account? It is all very well to ridicule absurd pretensions, and to groan over accumulations of fact, which threaten to increase the difficulties of learning; but we are not setting ourselves against the general current of improvement, and objecting to a process which, whether we like it or not, must take place if civilization is to improve? The answer, if we are to speak seriously, seems to be very simple. Professor Owen startled us some time ago by the assertion (I quote from memory) that to display properly the various species of whales, there would be need of fourteen galleries, each a mile or so in length. A museum on such a scale might well appall chancellors of the exchequer and sightseers of ordinary appetites for knowledge.

Yet if the whales were conveniently placed, they would undoubtedly be worth seeing. Now our difficulty at the present moment seems to be that we have got whales enough to stretch for fourteen miles, but that they are not properly arranged. Our capacity for accumulating materials has outrun our powers of putting them in order. No amount of whales would be too great, if they were only classified on intelligible principles: but we are in danger of being swamped by a disorganized chaos of whales. We have so many facts that we don't know what to do with them. Our Dryasdusts have accumulated such vast heaps of rubbish and of valuable matter, that our powers of sifting them and bringing them into shape are unequal to the gigantic task. No one can be familiar with more than a fraction of the whole field of history or with more than some minor branch of scientific inquiry. In time we must be content to get rid of the worthless material, and to arrange what is left on some comprehensive schemes. We want historians who can deduce some living principles from history, and men of science who can reduce the vast masses of observation to some general laws. When that is done, we shall be able to catalogue the facts from which the theories have been deduced, and to put them away for further reference, or destroy some of them altogether. Just now we are in the uncomfortable stage which some of us have experienced when a whole cartload of books—good, bad, and indifferent—has been shot down in our room, and we have not had time to put them in order on shelves. The worst of it is that people are constantly bringing in more, and raising shouts of triumph over their wonderful industry and virtue in bringing in, it may be, a mere mass of waste-paper. All that we can do is to have patience, and submit even to a little unnecessary arrogance, in the hopes that we shall not be quite overwhelmed before some one arises to put things straight.

UNDER THE CHANNEL.

PERHAPS there is no journey so well known to so many people as the water journey that has to be made in passing between England and France. Perhaps there is none which, with a fair reference to its length, excites such strong feelings of repugnance in so many travellers. It is wonderful that the many inconveniences attendant on the passage across the British Channel should have been so long and so patiently borne. Rich and poor, sea-sick and sound, dukes and Cook's excursionists, pleasure-seekers and men of business, no matter; the same brush is prepared for their general tarring. To the complexion of being made thoroughly wretched for a certain (or uncertain) number of hours, must we all come, who wish now and again to improve our minds or estates by foreign travel.

Consider the arrival of the train from Paris, facetiously termed of grande vitesse, at the Railway Terminus at Boulogne, on a wet night when there is a nice breeze blowing. It is not comfortable, that omnibus drive to the boat which has to be achieved after you have extricated yourself from the railway carriage of the Chemin de Fer du Nord. To slide and stagger down a wet and slippery ladder with the rain beating in your face, and the wind madly striving to get rid of your hat, is not pleasant. To dispose safely and satisfactorily of the small articles of luggage which it is necessary to carry in the hand, is troublesome. It is a sorry business to watch your pet boxes, marked, it may be "with care," forming part of an avalanche of luggage crashing down a wooden slide on to the wet deck. But these are minor difficulties, and may occur under many other circumstances. It is when the boat clears the pier-head and takes that first convulsive leap at the bar, like a buck-jumping horse at an unexpected hurdle, that you may look for the commencement of your real troubles. You, Mr. Reader, are travelling with Mr. Writer and Mr. Friend. It has long been notorious to Mr. Writer's family and friends that he has a gift of becoming sea-sick on the shortest provocation. It accordingly affords you no surprise to find your friend diving hurriedly into the cabin, obviously surrendering himself to his fate. But, if it so happen that you are strange to the boats appropriated to the service of the Southeastern Railway, it will surprise you to see him very shortly tumble up stairs again with horror depicted on his pale face; and you will be astonished to see him cast himself down in the rain by the side of Mr. Friend, who, equally seasick but more knowing, has not attempted the cabin. A sniff — one sniff will prove the fact — down the cabin stairs will explain all. The Black Hole of Calcutta would have had few terrors for an acclimatized steward of a Channel boat. Perhaps, being yourself a good sailor, you are prepared to enjoy the passage? No expectation could be more fallacious! The narrow boat, built for speed alone, is driven through, not over, the tumbling, chopping waves of the Channel, and takes whole seas aboard at every pitch and roll. Add the driving spray, and from being wet through there is no escape. The cabin is already crammed with victims, too miserably ill to be conscious of the villanous atmosphere they breathe, and there would be no getting into it even if you wished. You must stay on deck exposed to the tender mercies of the weather. In all directions are ladies, prone and prostrate, vainly endeavoring to protect themselves with shawls, or rugs, or oil-skin garments, lent (for a consideration) by the crew, who drive a brisk and profitable trade in such articles. Clothes are spoilt, tempers suffer, and a dripping and moody band emerge on the Folkestone pier. The two hours' railway journey up to town, with salt water sticky in your hair, stiffening your clothes, and running out at the cuffs of your many coats; with evil suggestions of stale cabin pervading your fellow-travellers; and somebody in a middle seat becoming retrospectively ill on peppermint drops, and plunging at the window, is a weariness to the flesh. The excellent general arrangements and the marvellous punctuality of the run between Paris and London, stand a great chance of being forgotten in the remembrance of the horrors and discomforts of the middle passage.

In dry weather it is not so bad; but, even in dry weather, if there be any sea on (and the vexed waters of the Channel, like the course of true love, rarely run smooth), to remain on deck is to be drenched with spray, while to go below is as repugnant to the mind of any one with even rudimentary ideas of cleanliness and ventilation, in dry weather as in wet.

It is amazing that while the land service improves so much and so steadily (a little more liberality in some of the train arrangements on the French side being now almost all that can be asked for), the sea arrangements should remain absolutely barbarous. Except in the matters, important enough no doubt, of speed and safety, the Channel steamboats are as far behind the age, and the requirements of the service on which they are employed, as if they were so many Margate hoys.

In a greater or less degree the Boulogne and Folkestone passage is representative of all, with one strong point in its favor. It is the shortest.

It would seem, on the face of the case, that the remedy for this disagreeable state of things is simple. The employment of larger and more commodious steamers seems the first thing to ask for.

Unfortunately, the greater number of the Channel harbors on either side, are not suited for the reception of very large vessels; and, to combine comfort with the high rate of speed which the travelling public has learned to insist upon, steamers of considerable size would be necessary. This consideration would shelve the whole question with many people. They would be satisfied to go on with the existing system, however wretched, comforting themselves with the reflection that there is no help for it, and that people whose business or pleasure leads them across the Channel must make the best of what they can get there.

But there is another and an important point to be considered, — a point which, as it touches the pocket, is likely to receive very respectful attention from two great commercial countries. Business men have long complained sadly of the great cost attaching to the rapid carriage of goods between France and England, owing to the heavy extra expenses attendant on transshipment. Experienced heads have been laid together, to endeavor to devise some scheme by which a continuous railway service between London and Paris might be secured. As in most cases where some great change is involved, or where some strikingly novel application of the arts of the engineer is required, the general public has smiled rather contemptuously on the suggestions made, and have looked upon some of the schemes proposed as purely visionary. But those whose business it has been to discuss the question practically, and who are well aware of the vast amount of money that is yearly lost, not only in shipping charges, but in actual damage to goods in the various loadings and unloadings to which they are subjected, are convinced that the time has arrived when this important question must be seriously taken in hand. Moreover: the passenger traffic alone shows an increase sufficiently great to warrant considerable improvements, even of a costly nature. It is, and has been for some years steadily increasing at the rate of ten per cent per annum.

Three plans have been proposed to effect the desired object.

The first, which naturally grows out of the instinctive cry for larger steamers, can scarcely be called a plan for a continuous railway. It is proposed to employ very large steam vessels of a peculiar build, on to which the trains shall be run bodily. The ferry vessel will then steam across to the opposite side, where the train will be run off it and on to the shore line. All trouble and discomfort attendant even on a change of carriage will be avoided. A truck may be loaded in London, and, untouched by the way, be unloaded in Paris.

At first sight this seems a sufficiently ingenious plan. Mr. Scott Russell has clearly demonstrated its practicability on a considerable scale, by the example of the Lake of Constance, across whose occasionally stormy waters heavy trains have been successfully ferried daily for some months.

But, unfortunately, the running of the trains on to the steam-vessels, the running of them off again, the lashings on the one side and the casting loose on the other, must occupy a considerable time. And the question of time is one that in this matter must be steadily kept in view. Again, this plan does not get rid of the Channel, and it may reasonably be argued that the difficulties arising from tempest, fog, or other delay and danger-bringing causes would be incomparably greater in the Channel than on the Bodensee. After all, then, the ferry plan, though in many respects a good remedy, is a partial one only: while the expense of constructing harbors of sufficient magnitude, and of building steamers fitted for the great strain they would be called upon to bear, would be very large.

Is it possible to construct a really continuous railway between France and England? And is it possible to do the work at a cost admitting of a remunerative profit? These are the two questions to which it is of importance to obtain satisfactory replies.

An eminent French engineer proposed some years ago a magnificent scheme for the construction of no less a work than a railway bridge across the Straits of Dover. Ingenious calculations, elaborate plans, and highly colored drawings, have not been wanting to attract public attention to this scheme. Royal personages are reported to have looked upon it with favor. It received close and careful attention from experts and others interested in the matter. But, however pleasant the prospect of being able to cross the Channel with no break of gauge, with no apprehension of sea-sickness, and with no burrowing or tunnelling in the dark, the plan developed formidable difficulties when it came to be practically examined; the closer the criticism, the more serious and obvious the objections. In the first place the engineering difficulties were found to be of a most startling description. For the purposes of the ordinary navigation, such a bridge must be at least two hundred feet above high-water mark.

The piers, which would have to be carried up some four hundred feet, would require to be strong enough to withstand, not only the weight and vibration of the traffic, but the violence of the most furious winter storms. In addition to these piers (in themselves a serious addition to the difficulties of a navigation already sufficiently overcrowded and hazardous), the engineer proposed the construction in mid-channel of an island and port of refuge, the existence of which, in such a situation, would probably have proved a fruitful source of trouble and danger to passing vessels. Apart from these considerations, the question of cost, by no means to be lost sight of even in the consideration of magnificent proposals such as this, was found to be decidedly against the adoption of the plan, or any modification of it. Piers four hundred feet high, artificial islands, harbors of refuge out at sea, and divers works on a similarly grand scale, are not to be constructed for nothing, especially, when the distance to be spanned is some four-and-twenty miles. Even supposing the engineering difficulties to be surmounted, — and with the wonderful examples we have before us, it seems difficult to believe that there is practically any limit to engineering achievements, — then it became a question whether the over-channel railway bridge could ever be successful, commercially. The estimated cost of such a bridge was some fifty millions sterling, — so hopeless a sum that the plan was speedily relegated to the limbo of abortive projects.

If you have to cross the sea in a railway carriage, and can neither cross on the water in a ferry vessel, nor over the water on a bridge, the only remaining way lies either in the water, or under the water.

The cross in the water would necessitate the sinking of a tube or tubes. Of that operation the practicability is, to say the least, doubtful. Even when you had got your tube to the bottom of the sea, its troubles would only begin. It would always be liable to external injury; and it would be next to impossible to protect it from continual leakage. Continual leakage would in no long time prove fatal to its usefulness, and, finally, to its existence.

What, then, about passing under the water? What, in a word, about tunnelling below the bed of the Channel from coast to coast?

The conditions on which the success of such an enterprise depend are comparatively few and simple. The first condition relates to the geological formation in which the work would have to be done.

It has frequently been pointed out, and there appears to be no difference of opinion on the subject, that there are to be found, on opposite sides of the Channel, tracts of coast presenting geological features almost identical. The English coast between Deal and Folkestone, for instance, corresponds in every particular with three miles of the French coast, a little to the westward of Calais. That the same formations continue under the bed of the sea is a probability that has been noticed in a report to the Geological Society on "the Chalk Ridges which extend parallel to the Cliffs on each side of the Channel tending towards the North Sea," by Captain J. B. Martin, in 1839. Careful geological investigation has been made with a view to discover whether the chalk formations obtaining on each coast continue unbroken for the whole distance dividing them; and there appears no reasonable cause of doubt that this is the case.

Impressed by these facts, Mr. William Low, an engineer who for many years had been confident of the feasibility of connecting the English and French railway systems, by means of a sub-channel tunnel, set himself earnestly to examine for himself the geological formations of the two shores. After most careful examination, Mr. Low became satisfied that the deductions of the geologists were correct. His examination of the borings for several artesian wells on both sides of the Channel, strengthened his opinion as to the regularity of the strata. It became his firm conviction that along a certain line, about half a mile west of the South Foreland, and four miles west of Calais, the tunnel could be made entirely through the lower, or gray, chalk, which, owing to its comparative freedom from water, and other qualities, would be a most desirable stratum in which to work. With the result of these investigations, and with plans of the tunnels he projected, Mr. Low, in 1867, betook himself to the Emperor of the French, who, giving the English projector a most cordial reception, desired him further to organize his plans, and to come again when he might be prepared to submit definite proposals.

In 1856, M. Thomé de Gamond, a French engineer of repute, who had for many years been advocating the construction of a tunnel between England and France, obtained, by order of the Emperor, an investigation of his plans at the hands of a scientific commission. This body, satisfied with the substantial accuracy of M. de Gamond's geological conclusions recommended that his investigations should be practically tested by sinking pits on the two coasts, and driving a few short headings under the sea at the expense of the two governments. Owing possibly to the backwardness of the Great British Circumlocution Office, this recommendation does not appear to have had any practical result. In 1857, M. de Gamond published the upshot of his researches, and the report of the commission: and at the Paris Exposition of 1867, he publicly exhibited his plans. It was very natural that Mr. Low, after his interview with the emperor, should put himself in communication with M. Thomé de Gamond. This gentleman unreservedly placed his experience at Mr. Low's disposal, and, after a time, the results of their joint labors were laid before Mr. James Brunlees. He, after careful examination, consented to co-operate with the two engineers in the prosecution of the work. A committee of French and English gentlemen of influence and position was, by desire of the emperor, formed to further the project; and it is by the executive committee of this body, under the chairmanship of Lord Richard Grosvenor, that the matter is now practically brought before the public.

But the opinions of Messrs. Low and Brunlees, and of M. Thomé de Gamond, received further confirmation.

Mr. John Hawkshaw, whose name is well known to the public at large and to the engineering world, was induced to test the question, and to ascertain by elaborate independent investigation the possibility of a sub-channel tunnel. With characteristic care and caution he took nothing for granted, but went himself over the whole ground already traversed by Mr. Low and by M. de Gamond. His geological researches led him to the same conclusions, and his expression of opinion in favor of the gray chalk was very decided. Not even satisfied with the theoretical results of these investigations, carefully though they were made, Mr. Hawkshaw held it necessary to make borings on each coast, at the precise points at which the ends of the tunnel would be situated. Thus Mr. Hawkshaw and the French commission came to the same decision. Now, the well at Calais, from which a considerable part of the geological inferences had been drawn, was at some distance from the spot where it was proposed to begin the tunnel on the French side, and possibly the strata might, in the precise place indicated not run as anticipated.

This did not, however, turn out to be the case. The actual borings conclusively proved the correctness of the views entertained.

The boring on the English coast was commenced at St. Margaret's Bay, near the South Foreland, in the beginning of 1866, and was satisfactorily completed in 1867. It was carried completely through the chalk and into the green sand, which was reached at a depth of five hundred and forty feet below high water. The boring on the French coast, three miles westward of Calais, was carried to a depth of five hundred and twenty feet below high water. It was intended to pass through the chalk as on the English side, but accident frustrated this design.

Simultaneously with these borings the bottom of the Channel was carefully examined by means of a steamer provided with all suitable apparatus. The main useful results established by these experiments appear to be, that on the English coast the depth of chalk is four hundred and seventy feet below high water, — of which two hundred and ninety-five feet are of the gray formation, in which it is proposed to work; that on the French coast, the depth of chalk is seven hundred and fifty feet, — four hundred and eighty being gray; and that there appears to be no room to doubt the regularity of the strata between the two shores along the line proposed.

So, it would seem, firstly, that the chief condition is satisfactorily insured, and the geological formation of the sea's bed is such as to admit of the excavation of a tunnel through the lower gray chalk; and, secondly, that it is not necessary to go to a depth unsuitable for railway traffic. It is calculated that the approaches to the tunnel can be constructed at gradients not exceeding one foot in eighty.

The next point of paramount importance to the travelling public is the question of the safety of the tunnel when made. The dangers most carefully to be guarded against are two: any possible irruption of water from the sea, or from unexpected land-springs; any deficiency in ventilation.

There need be little apprehension of spring waters. The difficulty in sinking wells through the chalk, on either side of the Channel, has been, not to keep the water out, but to get at it. A well sunk at Calais to the depth of a thousand feet, failed to find water at all; and in sinking deep wells at Dover, water was not to be found either until the driving of headings was resorted to. Even the Castle well, which is three hundred and sixty-three feet deep, and below high-water mark, is pumped dry by a thirty horse-power engine in three hours. Firm chalk, in fact, not split by fissures and defects, is not a good water-conducting stratum. In the Paris district, for instance, the artesian wells have been sunk through the chalk, which is there at least thirteen hundred feet thick.

If the dangers of land-water, so to speak, be thus slight, the dangers to be apprehended from sea-water appear to be even slighter. The proposed excavation would be nowhere nearer the bed of the sea than a hundred feet. It would seem to be most unlikely that the sea should make its way through this thickness of chalk. Many Cornish mines extend for considerable distances below the sea, and their comparative immunity from inroads of the sea is remarked by Pryce in his treatise on Minerals, Mines, and Mining, published in 1778. His explanation is, that such fissures as may possibly exist, and which might be permeable by water, have been, in long course of time, filled up by some impervious substance deposited by the action of the water itself, and thus a massive ceiling, as it were, of concrete has been formed above the mines. In the opinion of the eminent engineers who are advising Lord Richard Grosvenor's Executive Committee, this is probably the case in the Channel gray chalk; and, looking at this circumstance and at the nature of the chalk, they do not anticipate being troubled with more water than can be easily disposed of by ordinary pumping operations.

The financial part of the question may be considered with the ventilation question. At present, with the imperfect data we have to go upon, it is matter of great difficulty to say what such an excavation would be likely to cost. Given no unforeseen impediment, given no incursion of unexpected water, given no back in the strata, a trustworthy calculation might be arrived at.

But in the face of the unknown possibilities lying at the bottom of the sea, the committee wisely abstain from yet addressing themselves to the cost of the tunnel, or to the commercial questions of profits, capital, and dividends. They propose, first, — following the suggestions of their eminent scientific advisers, and the original proposal of Mr. Low, — to commence their work by sinking pits on each shore, and by driving thence two small headings, or galleries, from each country, connected by transverse driftways. Ventilation would thus be secured in the manner customary in coal mines and works of a similar nature, and the feasibility or otherwise of connecting England and France by a submarine tunnel would be proved. When this is done, or when so much of it is done as fairly to prove the case, then the committee will consider the time arrived for carrying out their great enterprise in all its magnificent details. All points relating to the permanent tunnels would be settled by the experience gained in making the headings. The point of ventilation could be satisfactorily determined in the preliminary workings. It is computed that to preserve perfect ventilation in the completed tunnel, currents of air should be driven through it at the rate of ten miles an hour by steam-engines of from six to seven hundred horse power.

The cost of these preliminary headings is reckoned, upon careful calculation, at two millions sterling; and to that amount the loss, in the event of non-success, would be confined. For the purpose of raising this sum of money, the committee ask for a joint guarantee from the two governments, of interest at the rate of five per cent on any amount they shall expend up to two millions,—that is to say, for an annual guarantee of fifty thousand pounds from each. It is not necessary that the whole of the two millions should be expended; for should the guaranteeing governments be dissatisfied with the progress of the works, or with their nature or results, they would at any time have power to stop the works. At the worst, and supposing the whole sum to be expended and no satisfactory result attained, fifty thousand pounds a year for a certain number of years (for the operation of a sinking fund would in process of time replace the capital) is not a very large sum for a great nation to expend in so great an attempt. If the preliminary headings turn out successful, there will be no difficulty in raising the capital necessary to complete and to work the tunnel, and the guaranteeing governments will speedily be released from their obligations.

As relates to the French Government, the committee have, it is understood, every reason to be satisfied with their prospects. On this side of the Channel things progress more slowly, and Circumlocutionism is a little difficult to move. The matter has lately been brought before the President of the Board of Trade, and will probably, at no distant period, assume a definite shape. The six gentlemen who sign the report to the Executive Committee, on which we have largely drawn in this paper, distinctly express their opinion that the risk in Channel tunnelling is confined to one contingency only, and that is the possibility of sea water finding its way by some unforeseen fissure into the workings, in quantities too great to be overcome. Otherwise, they consider that the work may be done with comparative ease and rapidity.

If the scientific advisers of the two governments be satisfied with the exactness of these gentlemen's researches, and with the soundness of their deductions, it is probable that the Channel Tunnel will, before long, take its place as one of the things to be tried, at least.

SENSIBILITY.

We have been made familiar, by Archbishop Trench's manuals and by other useful compilations, with the death of words in one meaning and their resurrection in another. Words like "feature," "favor," "indifferent," "resentment," will readily occur as examples. It is not less interesting to notice a word which, though not yet defunct in an older sense, is on the wane, and is leading a sort of double life between two meanings. Such is perhaps the condition at present of the word "sensibility." No really well-educated person would be at a loss on meeting with this word in precisely the connection in which Addison or Milton, or even Shakespeare, would have placed it. But a great number of people who have some claim to pass for well-educated would experience a slight check if they so encountered it. There are a good many daily papers, we should suppose, addressed chiefly to that large section of society, which would never employ the word sensibility when it might be necessary to express susceptibility of nerve, of intellect, or of emotion. They would instinctively avoid it. They would substitute for it, perhaps, the term susceptibility itself, or else feeling, or delicacy, or impressibility, or even sensitiveness, none of which would do the work so directly or so completely as the older term.

It is quite easy, without the aid of dictionaries or glossaries, to trace in the most familiar sources the full meaning of this word. When Claudio speaks of what he shudders to imagine,

"This sensible warm being to become A kneaded clod . . ."

he is talking of physical impressions, of the countless influences received through the senses,—that is, through the actual nerves. When Mammon, in Paradise Lost, thinks that an atmosphere of torment may grow familiar, and that the "piercing flies" may become

"As soft as now severe, our temper changed
Into their temper, which must needs remove The sensible of pain," he is speaking of exactly the same thing. When Delilah, giving specious advice to Samson, says

"Only what remains past cure
Bear not too sensibly, nor still insist
To afflict thyself in vain," the word is, by the easiest metaphorical adaptation, removed scarcely a step from the same signification. It has hardly done with pain of body while it touches on the agonies of mind. Pope's well-known portrait of the "Lady at Court," who presented

"An equal mixture of good-humor And sensible soft melancholy," carries the word a little further on in the same metaphorical line of meaning. But by and by a change comes. And, though we ought to apologize for introducing this quotation in company with those before, there is really no place where the transition is more concisely marked than when, in one of Marryat's novels, Captain Kearney says to a subordinate, "Make me sensible, Sir," and is told in reply, "Maybe that's more than I or anybody else could do." We are here getting away from the region of the senses and of their metaphorical suggestions, and getting into the region of common, shrewd sense, and the associations thence developed. And so the process goes on. We have been confining ourselves to the adjective "sensible," as the instances are so completely familiar. This word, in the earlier meaning, is dead; "insensibility" survives in the physical connection, occasionally doing duty for "torpor" in the metaphorical uses; and "sensibility" is altogether on the wane. We must guard against being supposed to convey that the later signification of the word "sensible" is never to be found in writers of the eighteenth, seventeenth, or even of the sixteenth century. Benedick, if we remember rightly, was a "sensible" man very much in the meaning which that word would now convey, and other similar passages of Shakespeare might be adduced. But this does not affect the general proposition that, whereas two hundred years ago the first meaning naturally understood from the word was allied to the impressions of sense, intellect, and emotion, the present meaning is something altogether different, and touches rather on caution, shrewdness, and, by implication, on self-regard.

It is almost always unscientific to fix upon any single cause in accounting for verbal changes, more especially when one has to speak of any cause so indefinite as a presumed social tendency. But, if we can be sure of any social phenomenon whatever, if our eyes and ears deserve to be trusted at all in the observation of contemporary humanity, the present generation is not behindhand in setting a value on the practical and the material, and is specially open to the operation of those instincts which are usually known as self-regarding. And it is, at any rate, a curious phenomenon that precisely among our own generation the change of this word from a more analytical to a harder and more practical meaning should have taken place. Several indications concur in suggesting that a decay in the power of sensibility has gone pari passu with a disuse of the older signification of the term. The rise of the words "sensation" and "sensational," in their recent uses, denoted that a more than ordinary stimulus was required to rouse a more than ordinary dulness in the faculty of receiving impressions from without. Sensational novels, and dances, and piano-forte music, all show that this dulness has been remarked in the field of amusement, and has been treated, not from within, but from without; the external applications have been made as far as possible more pungent.

For anything we can see to the contrary, the decay of conversation that has so often been remarked as a feature of the present generation, is another symptom of want of sensibility, in the region of the finer social instincts. The French have a higher degree of sensibility, at any rate, in matters that lie on the surface of life, than ourselves, and they beat us out of the field in conversation. There is a story told of Madame de Staël, that on one occasion she was engaged out to dinner in company with a young and beautiful girl, who was not, however, otherwise remarkable. On their entrance, the hostess observed that she was charmed to welcome wit and beauty in each other's company. "Well," replied Madame de Staël, "do you know I never was praised for my beauty before." The fine sensibility which provoked this answer, perfect as coming from a plain and elderly woman of genius, is always more common with the French than with ourselves; but it was formerly more common in English society than it is now.

Setting aside certain very small and privileged and exceptional portions of the social whole, it is fair and true to say that the external and superficial in life has been during this generation so actively and zealously cultivated that the finer and more permanent parts of our nature have suffered in proportion. Conversation would naturally be à priori a faithful criterion in changes of this kind. For though the material of all conversation deserving the name is the commerce of thoughts, yet the atmosphere of conversation is generated from sensibility, and will be bracing or depressing exactly as sensibility is developed or repressed. The aspect, the simple outside appearance, of London is powerfully suggestive of the conditions of intellectual life in which, speaking generally, and allowing a wide latitude of variety, its inhabitants are placed, and which, in still more various degrees, gradually beset provincial life as well. There is no other capital city in Europe which presents to the eye, as London does, the spectacle of the intense pursuit of intensely material objects, with very little apparent tertium quid (we are speaking only of what meets the eye) between what is rigidly and unswervingly practical and reliefs of the lower and grosser sort. This external barrenness has its counterpart in the region of intellect and emotion. Nor is barrenness all; there is bewilderment also; and beneath the double pressure sensibility decays. As was said before, the word is waning, and the quality represented by the word has not the life and freedom that once it had:—

"For though the circles widen, fainter gleam
All new emotions on the mirror-stream."

If there were no other symptoms that this is the real condition of things, there are at least these two,—the rise of clamorous efforts at artificial sensation, and the enfeebled state of the power of conversation.

No one has perceived all this more clearly than Mr. Matthew Arnold. But in some of his essays, following what seems with him to be essential instinct of style, he has introduced certain well-known and characteristic terms which have probably done more than he meant them to do, by way of diverting attention from the primary facts. Philistinism is not far from being synonymous with the absence of sensibility under differing conditions, and culture is little more than development and direction given to sensibility. The want of this quality underlies many, if not all, of the weaknesses which were visited by the tranquil criticisms that have rendered those words stock terms. And not social weaknesses alone; but intellectual weaknesses quite as much. For an age like our own, which has and boasts to have an unusual number of intellectual irons in the fire, becomes victimized by hurry and bewilderment in this department, just as similar causes conspire to produce the same kind of result elsewhere. Everything being taken into account that may fairly influence the question, it is hardly too much to say that ours is an age, considering its attainments, of very considerable intellectual rudeness. We do not, it is true, use exactly the language which Luther would have employed against an antagonist in theology, and Bentley in scholarship. That has gone out of fashion. But we have very little real care for other people's feelings, not much taste nor power of reticence,—for sensibility is at a low ebb.

Under no other conditions would a book like Bishop Colenso's have been prematurely hurried off to the printer's hands; under no other conditions should we find politics and the intellectual aspects of religion handled as they are by writers, of whom perhaps Mr. Bradlaugh may be taken as the extreme type. As regards politics, it is but a short time ago that a Cabinet Minister showed the world what force of argument and what graces of style might be attained by a complete freedom from the trammels of sensibility. And lessons of the kind are not thrown away upon the newspapers. In the true spirit of appreciating imitation, a journal of congenial sentiments remarked lately in these wise and conciliatory terms on the relations between the Lords and the Commons: "The Lords will have no more chance than a common fishing-smack against a Cunard liner. The smack knows this, and will get out of the way." Nothing is gained by this kind of writing. Nothing, as far as we can see, is even hoped to be gained, except the transient pleasure of annoying those with whom you happen to be in antagonism. It is the manner of America, without the extenuation which America might claim on the score of being a young country, and of being peculiarly destitute of influences which operate, as old institutions and time-honored associations do in some degree, to keep sensibility alive in public speaking and writing.

In general literature, translation presents the best possible scope for the exercise of sensibility in many kinds. So much has been written and said on this branch of literary work, that it is no part of our present intention to add to what has already been uttered. On the whole, however, looking at the large number of translations which have been lately made, and are still making, from ancient and modern literatures into English, it may be said without prejudice that the quality is not on a par with the quantity. The rare and felicitous union of qualities, of receptive and responsive power, of elasticity and native vigor, which combine to make up true intellectual sensibility, is seldom found in a translator. The degree to which the practice of translation draws out and cultivates these powers, is the strongest recommendation which it can have as an element in mental discipline. On the same ground we base a confidence — which it now requires some courage to avow — in the practice of verse composition in the dead languages. The best apology for verse composition that we ever remember to have heard, came not from a classical scholar or student, but from an eminent and successful teacher of English history and modern languages. To him the intelligent rendering of the best models of English, whether of lyrical or dramatic poetry or of prose, into languages of which we possess perfect models, had been demonstrated by examples among his own pupils to be one of the completest and most efficient lessons in English. Be this as it may, the topic is a somewhat outworn one, and we will pursue it no further. We will content ourselves with repeating what has been the substance of the foregoing remarks, that, coincident with the wane of the word we have been discussing, there seems to be observable, in literary as well as in ordinary social life, a decay of the valuable quality, or union of qualities, which it denotes. And if this decay could be arrested, and the processes reversed that cause it, there would be reason to hope for a very advantageous change in the styles of composition, in the atmosphere of discussion, and in the life and interest of conversation.

EQUALITY IN HEAVEN.

VERY few, indeed, of the popular notions about "Heaven" — using that word as the popular synonyme for the future life, and not as the alternative to Hell — will bear the most ordinary or momentary investigation. As a rule those notions are the merest condensations of widely diffused hopes, which hopes, again, are often the product of certain disgusts at circumstances which in this world cannot be removed. The notion, for example, that Heaven is perpetual peace, a place where "congregations ne'er break up, and Sabbaths ne'er shall end," a long or eternal rest, is the result of the weariness which all good men must feel of their never-ending struggle with the world, the flesh, and the devil, a hope no more in accordance either with reason or revelation than Hawthorne's that he might be permitted a good long sleep of about two thousand years as a siesta before he was set to work again. If the word Heaven has any meaning, it means a state of existence in which we shall do the Lord's work more perfectly than at present, in which we shall struggle more ardently against sin, and probably against misery (though that thought is subject to the rider that misery may be merely discipline), and certainly against ignorance of Him, all of which duties involve work, willing work, or happy work, but still Work and not Rest, which again is absolutely incompatible with the increased desire of the "regenerated," but still finite soul to know Him the Infinite.

The struggle up a mountain may be the happiest effort of our existence, but except by a perversion of words it cannot be called Rest. Nor are we able to perceive that at rest or at work the condition of the soul can be one of absolute and complete happiness. A priori, he only can be perfectly happy whose knowledge and whose power are synonymous, synchronous, and contemporaneous, because otherwise he must either make mistakes, or wait, — or be disappointed. But this cannot possibly be true of any finite being; and with regard to the especial finite being called man, there can be no solution of continuity, otherwise he is not an immortal being, or a being capable of a future life, but only a being who, like a wheat-grain, is capable of reproduction in a different stage. Increased, indeed, happiness may be, for us so increased that, in comparison, it may be called perfect; but absolutely perfect, in any arithmetical sense, it cannot be. If there is no solution of continuity, there must be memory, and with memory, regret, and with regret, shame, and with shame, suffering, however modified in degree by a clearer perception of the infinite purpose which, though regulating all things, has yet, as one great action in pursuit of that purpose, left human will in freedom. Again, there is the notion, most magnificent and productive of all the unproved ideas, perhaps greatest and most fruitful of all ideas proved or unproved, that we shall in Heaven "know God." How should we know God? That we shall know Him better may be conceded easily, for an inborn conviction tells us, even without revelation, that the flesh acts as a veil between us and the Maker, just as it acts, to use an unworthy simile, as a veil between many minds and absolute mathematical truth; — and that we shall know Him much better follows from the certainty that half the obscuring influences will have in another world no place, that, for example, as Southey sang, avarice could not continue even in hell, — "earthly that passion of the earth"; but, nevertheless, the eternal truth will remain that He is infinite, we finite; that the finite, however near its comparative approximation, is still infinitely distant from the Infinite; that, though to use Paul's glorious simile, here "we see through a glass darkly," — his "glâss" was a sort of semi-transparent slag, not our artificial crystal, — and shall there see face to face, yet when we see even a human being face to face we do not, therefore, know its owner, may mistake him, always fail to know more than a fraction of him.

Of all the popular ideas of the future state, however, perhaps the most popular and most erroneous is that expressed in the common saying, "We shall all be equal there." That saying is as old as Christianity; it appears in the Epistles, though St. Paul did not mean his words to bear so wide an interpretation; and it has for ages been one of the few grand consolations of the poor, the oppressed, and the suffering. We are not sure whether it has not exercised as great an influence as any of the incidental ideas of Christianity; whether it has not, for example, greatly contributed to mould the organization of all churches, the Roman Catholic Church more especially, and to form the ideal of all social reformers outside as well as within the pale of belief. There is something in it which suits human nature, — the instinctive sense every man occasionally entertains of his own nothingness before the Almighty, — and also, perhaps, — one must speak frankly to speak truthfully, — the instinctive wickedness, or rather feebleness of human nature, its incapacity of freeing itself wholly of jealousy, envy, self-consciousness, pride, the wish that the next world may reverse in some visible manner the unjust judgment of this. The contrast between the real and the apparent, between the relation of a man to men and his relation to the Omnipotent, has struck all religious legislators, and we do not, therefore, wonder at the universal diffusion of the thought, and yet how little can it have to rest on! It is a certainty, if anything can be a certainty, that if Heaven or a future state exists at all, there can be no permanent solution of continuity, no change of identity; for, if so, not only is the human period wasted, — and God does not waste, — but God's justice and mercy are alike rendered imperfect, and His glory dimmed. On what is styled the orthodox view we should have the awful sight of a being condemned to torment without knowledge of the cause, out of what to him seems caprice; and on what seems to us the truer view, we should have the equally awful sight of a being held back through eternity by influences which, being unconscious of them, he cannot overcome.

Yet, if there be no solution of continuity, if the soul which is here is also there, how can there be equality in the next world? The soul cannot escape the influences which have modified it here. It may, no doubt, escape the passions, some of which at least are fleshy and depart with the flesh, — which latter may be lying in the British Museum, a subject for intellectual speculation, — but how be free of that portion of the effect of those passions which dwarts or smirches, or, it may be, expands and elevates the soul? Avarice, for instance, is, if we agree with Southey, of all strong passions the one most directly earthy, — having in it less of entrain than lust, the most carnal of all, — and avarice can hardly continue in the next world; yet how can the effect of avarice, if it has modified the mind and soul, be lost if there is no solution of continuity? Or how can the effect of a noble impulse, say that of self-sacrifice for the cause of God, be wholly taken away? If it is taken away, what use in virtue or in strife? And yet if it remain, where is the equality? Many, perhaps most of our readers, however, would acknowledge moral inequalities in Heaven, and a large section of them would rejoice in them, but in what way do they propose to get rid of inequalities of intellect and knowledge? The intellect must continue if continuity continues, and with intellect its inequalities, or Hodge becoming suddenly Newton or Newton Hodge, the freed soul ceases to be that either of Hodge or Newton.

The smallest differences of culture, of knowledge, of those intellectual circumstances which create impulse, must have their effect, however small, and their effect much in the direction they had in this world, or otherwise the continuousness of the sense of moral responsibility, that is, of the fact of moral responsibility, — for the sense is the fact, or an idiot would be responsible, — would, pro tanto, be weakened. No doubt, these differences would, under the new light, seem so small as to be almost imperceptible, — though light, by the way, reveals rather than covers differences, — and no doubt, also, the differences there and the differences here would be judged by widely different laws, but still they would exist. To take the most visible, and, perhaps, the most important of all superficial distinctions among men, that which we call refinement, is that to be abrogated? Nine tenths of it, probably, would be, as either artificial, or hypocritical, or the result of physical tendencies; but that other tenth, which seems in this world to affect even the soul, and which certainly affects the moral nature, if only in the self-restraint it breeds, is that to disappear? How can it disappear without an erasure of the past, fatal pro tanto to the very idea of continuous responsibility? Infinitesimal, it may be; but still the infinitesimal is not the non-existent, and for so much there is in the earthly sense a grade in Heaven, a little step in the road towards the ideal by which John starts in advance of Thomas. Then there is the hunger to advance, to inquire, to accumulate new knowledge, is that to go?

It is possible, indeed, easy, to conceive of a Bengalee who is a Christian up to the spiritual level of any Englishman, yet lacks this hunger entirely; is he the equal at first in Heaven of the man who, having all he has, has this besides, and, having it, diverts its direction — as he would in the new light divert its direction — into a pursuit of the one object of Heaven, closer relation in all respects to the Divine? And if not the equal at first, why is he to be the equal at any time? Why is he, to speak in non-theological terms, to catch up the competitor as eager as himself but less weighted?

Let us take the extreme case, for that, after all, though not the only way of arguing such speculations, is the only way of making such arguments large enough to be intelligible. The popular theory assumes that in the next world the ordinary idiot of Earleswood and Sir Isaac Newton, or, say, Melancthon, start fair. Why do they start fair? Surely, if they do start fair, such a miracle has been wrought on one or other of them that there has been a virtual new creation as of a new being, disconnected either with the Idiot or Sir Isaac. Take any view of idiocy you please, that, for instance, it is the result of mere bodily malformation ending instantly with death, — quite the most probable view, — and still the loss of the life's experience of volition must, if life be continuous at all, and soul and mind related, have been a loss to the soul, leaving it behind as a child's might be left behind in the great race. The ground may be caught up quickly; but surely it is not caught up through the intervention of miracle, else why not similar miracle as to moral status, but through some process of spiritual education and slow enlightenment. The possibility of education must exist in Heaven, and the possibility of education involves ex necessitate inequality. Earthly position may be reversed; of course, in many cases, must be reversed, — one could not conceive, for example, of the royal caste occupying any but a very low position in the new life, but grades there must still be. The theory of equality is nothing but an effort to express the inexpressible, — the distance which must exist between the highest creature and the Creator, a distance so great that all other distances beside it seem as the inequalities in fine sand. Still, no two grains of sand are of the same size.

NEVER PLAYED OUT.

I. CURATE OF MARL HILL SCRIBIT.

No; I am not in the fens, old friend, though you may smell them when the wind blows from the sea, and though a considerable portion of the largest estate in the parish is certainly marsh land, as yet unreclaimed. Marl Hill proper is really not called so in satire; it is on rising ground, the first wave of the wolds: the house I live in is at least eighty feet above the sea-level. The land all about is thoroughly drained and highly cultivated; and if you will come to see me, I will insure you against ague, unless, of course, you get it by voluntarily going into its strongholds to shoot wild fowl.

It is a trifle dull, I must confess; so that you must expect to get long-winded, old-fashioned letters in exchange for your occasional penny-post notes. One cannot read all the long evenings and all the mornings too; and sermon-writing is not a difficult style of composition here, for it is impossible to be too simple; you must talk rather than preach if you want to catch the attention of the people. These are scattered about, living in disgraceful cottages, upon the different estates. There are one or two small farmers, but the greater part of the land about here is let out and cultivated in a wholesale way, and one farm of a thousand acres pretty well takes up a parish. That is why the vicar has two, I suppose. He is one of the old school, and took things pretty easy: had morning service in the one church, and evening service in the other, every Sunday; married, buried, and christened when obliged to do so, and bothered himself no further. He has been ordered off to Madeira for his health, by a homœopathist, one would say, and on the principle that like cures like, if, as scandal reports, his ailments are traceable to his fondness for that too seductive wine. At any rate, he required a curate to take his place, and here I am. After the fashion of new brooms, I want to perform some sweeping, but it is very difficult to do anything. The people are more heathenish than I had any idea was possible in this Christian country; but the job is to get at them. The women and children are out at work almost as much as the men; and district-visiting is impossible when the cottages are locked up and empty, or in the charge of a young girl, who also has to look after her small brothers and sisters. Drunkenness is not very prevalent, because the beer-shops are few and far between; but the devil does not lose much, for opium-eating is a common habit. It is a fact, I assure you. When you come here, you shall be taken to the chemist's in the nearest village on Saturday evening, and see the piles of opium pills he sells to the laboring classes. I tried tracts, but found that very few could read them. However, I have managed to double my congregations, and have established a Sunday school, which is a beginning. I hope to get up an infant school for week-days next. You asked me what sort of life I led, you know, so if these matters bore you, I am not responsible.

I should like a little more civilized society, I confess, for, not being able to afford a horse, I am well-nigh neighborless. The property about here belongs nominally — for I believe it is mortgaged as heavily as it will bear — to a Major Holcombe, who lives with his only child, a daughter, at the Marl, which must have been a nice place once, but now — I do not know how to describe it to you; think of Hood's Haunted House. The stables are in ruins; the garden is a wilderness; there is good feed on the drive up to the front-door, which is never opened, the people going in and out by the back ways. As for the master, he has just recovered from an attack of D. T., but is dying. He has something on his mind, I think, or I doubt whether he would care so much for my company, or listen so patiently to all I have to say on religious matters, especially as I must seem a mere boy to him. I was rather stumped at first, but he soon began to talk scepticism, and arguing set me all right. And then I do look ten years over my age; that is one of the advantages of being ugly. He is constantly on the point of telling me some secret, only I do not encourage him, and he often says that he will write something down, and leave directions for the paper to be given me after his death. What is my duty, I wonder? If one were a Roman, I suppose it would be clear; but you see I am not even in priest's orders yet, and altogether I had rather be without his secret. But probably it is all nonsense.

A man just out of D. T. is never right in his head; and yet, I dare say, his conscience is bad enough, for he has led a queer life, by all accounts. He has run through three fortunes, they say, — two of his own, and one of his wife's, whose heart he also broke, they say; but "they" always do say that of a spendthrift. When his wife died, he disappeared for a while, — went yachting to dodge his creditors, and placed his daughter, who was but ten, at school. He was away for eight years, and then he returned here, and brought his girl with him. And a strange life that poor young lady must have led, considering that she is not a Di Vernon. Only men came to the Marl, and those of the fastest. Major Holcombe wanted her to marry one of them, the son of an attorney and land-agent who had made his fortune, named Naisley; but Miss Lucy would not have him. Perhaps, however, she would have been bullied into it, only Naisley got a fall out hunting which injured his spine.

I can see you grinning, but you are quite out. I do not believe that I should ever fall in love with her. She is good-looking, no doubt, and friendly enough; but she has got some great sorrow weighing upon her. Her father's state would of course account for a certain melancholy; but there is more than that; there is mystery, suspense, expectation of something which never happens, and which yet may happen, in the expression of her face. I have not made my meaning clear, but no matter; I could not if I tried for a twelvemonth. Miss Holcombe is my only ally in the small reforms which are being attempted; without her aid, I doubt whether the Sunday school would ever have become a fact. I close this in haste, for a messenger has come to say that this same Major Holcombe is in extremis, and calls for me.

II. THE UNFINISHED RUBBER.

The strangest thing has happened, Brown: Major Holcombe is dead. The paper he talked about leaving for me to read is lying before me, and it affords a clew to our mystery, — I mean about poor Godwin. Do you remember the minute details of that evening? I think I do, and propose to jot them down here. If I am incorrect in any particular, perhaps you may be able to set me right: then, please send this letter on to Thorpe, and ask him to supplement our memories still further. I want to have the account very accurate, because legal proceedings may follow upon the steps which I shall feel bound to take.

Our happy Cambridge life was drawing to a close; indeed, I had taken my degree, and only remained up because I had a scholarship to run out. You others were still undergraduates, but were going in for your final examinations in the winter, and it was late in the October term. To be precise, it was on the 4th of November 1840, exactly three years ago. You came up to the B. A. table in hall, touched me on the shoulder and said, "Come to my rooms afterwards, and have a rubber." I accepted at once, for you had brought some very excellent port wine from home with you, and there were a few bottles still left. Just then Thorpe passed, and you invited him.

Thorpe fancied that he could play very well at whist, and did not like to sit down with an inferior performer; so, before giving a decided answer, he asked you the fourth was. "Hylas Godwin," you replied. "All right," said Thorpe; "I'll come." Who first called Godwin, Hylas? It was a capital nickname, for it just hit off his style of beauty. What a good-looking fellow he was, certainly the handsomest man of our time. Rather conceited, perhaps, as youngsters who are admired by women are wont to be, and finikin in his dress. Yet he was clever too, though, maybe, not such a genius as we esteemed him; and I do not think that I have ever met with a more agreeable companion. Gerrard said better things, but in so confused a way that they lost their pungency in the uttering: he always went shy in the middle of a joke. But Godwin rattled out any absurdity that came into his head in a manner which was irresistible. And he was in particular good cue at the whist-table, — not that he ever spoke during the play, he was far too keen a lover of the game for that, but between the deals he made amends for previous silence, and generally kept his three companions on the grin till the hands were sorted and the first card led.

He was in his usual spirits that evening, nor could we afterwards recall a word or look which seemed to show that he had anything on his mind, or any presentiment of evil.

We sat for a little while round the fire, drinking a glass or two of your port, and then opened the card-table, and cut for partners. It was you and Thorpe against Godwin and myself. The cards fell very evenly, and the first rubber, which you won, was very protracted, so that we had hardly finished the first game of the second when we heard the chapel bell going, and Thorpe cried that he was short of his chapels for the week, and must keep that one.

"I have had a notice from the dean too," said Godwin, "but I'll cut chapel and finish the rubber for all that, if Thorpe will."

But Thorpe was firm. We abused him for his laziness in not getting up for morning service, and so securing evenings of unbroken comfort; but he prided himself on his sloth, and took our sarcasms for compliments. When he actually rose and threw his gown on, it became evident that our rubber was really to be interrupted, so we all agreed to wipe a chapel off our score, leaving the cards on table, and returning to finish the game directly service was over.

Do you wonder at my writing down these minute details? I am purposely allowing my mind to dwell on every little particular, because, to tell the truth, I can think of nothing else, just now, and I find my memory very vivid. I can see the counters I had just stuck under a candlestick to mark a double; the patterns on the back of our pack and of yours. I can see Godwin's face as he said to me: "Now don't you go rushing off to your rooms for a pipe after chapel, as you are so fond of doing. Come straight back to Brown's, and don't keep us waiting. I will give you a cigar if you have forgotten your baccy." And then in a loud aside to Thorpe, as he ran across the court: "He never can resist smoking another fellow's cigars. O, I know where to have him!"

We were just in time to get in before the chapel doors were closed, and as we were walking up the aisle, he whispered in my ear: "If you do admit a secular thought during the next half-hour, partner, let it be a meditation upon the propriety of leading trumps when you hold five."

Though three years have elapsed, I think I could swear to those being his exact words. How little I thought at the moment that they were the last I should ever hear him utter.

We all missed each other in the crowd on coming out; and when you, Thorpe, and myself met again at your door a few seconds afterwards, Godwin was not there. We went in and lit the candles, and laughed at his being the last, after the fuss he had made about the punctuality of others. You said that the porter had met you in crossing the court, and had given you a letter; so we concluded that the same thing had happened to Godwin, and that he had gone to his own rooms, to see what it was about, before joining us. We speculated upon its being a billet-doux, and joked about Hylas and the nymphs, speaking finally rather harshly of the supposed lady, whose letter we assumed to have caused this delay in resuming our rubber.

It is curious to note how the first thought of suspicion or alarm comes into the mind with a flash, — by instinct apparently. No doubt, some reasoning process has been going on with such subtlety as to be unfelt, and that which we often call a presentiment, is merely a logical conclusion. For some time on that evening, we never doubted but what the absent man would come in from minute to minute. The open card-table, with its two lighted candles, the cards, and the counters upon it, stood as it had been left. The sofa was drawn up in front of the fire, and you lay on it; Thorpe and I sat in two easy-chairs on either side; and so we remained, smoking and chatting, for upwards of an hour.

And then I perfectly remember experiencing a sudden uneasiness, which caused me to look across at Thorpe, and I read a similar feeling in his eyes. We both turned to you, and the expression on our faces must have been very plain, for you at once said: "What! you do not expect there is anything the matter with him?"

"Of course not," replied Thorpe. "But — there would be no harm in going to his rooms to see."

We went, and found the outer door sported; and while we were hammering and shouting, the gyp came by and told us that Mr. Godwin had gone out of college, not wearing his academical dress, and carrying a carpet-bag. On going to the lodge, we heard this story confirmed by the porter, who also said that there had been a letter for him. We learned next day that he had left a note for his tutor, saying that urgent family matters obliged him to leave immediately, but that he would return or write as soon as he could. And that was the last of him.

He was a man who seemed pretty well alone in the world, so far as relatives were concerned. He had entered himself at college, and the tutor knew no one to communicate with. Of course a man could not disappear like that without causing some sensation in the university, but all inquiries were fruitless, and the majority of his acquaintances soon forgot him. The mystery of the affair struck us three, however, with a sort of awe; besides that, being his most intimate friends, we were naturally the most anxious to learn what had become of him. We even, you may remember, made a note of the state of the game of whist at the time we rose from it, and agreed that, if ever we could meet with Godwin again, we would play it out. That can never be. For here, on the borders of the Lincolnshire fens, I have unexpectedly come upon the traces of our old friend, and the cause of his disappearance. I will copy out Major Holcombe's — confession I suppose I must call it, though I hate the word, and will send it you, but you must not show it to any one, at all events at present.

III. THE PATRICIAN'S CONFESSION.

It is true, it is true, that which you have preached to me, that which I believed when I was a child, that which I have scoffed at as an old wife's fable. All is not over when this machine of flesh and blood stops. When a young man goes to the money-lender, the present pleasure seems so very real, the future burden so distant and intangible, that the idea of self-denial is to him like grasping at shadows, and missing the substance; but pay-day comes, and ruin. "A short life and a merry one," cries the lad; but the merriment evaporates, leaving the nerves shattered, the body diseased, the heart full of bitterness and misery; and I feel a conviction that this is part of an inexorable system which extends after we are able to trace it. In whatever direction we seek to probe the mysteries that surround us, we are lost in infinity. Space is infinite, and time, and life. Motion is infinite; the moon revolving round the earth, the earth round the sun, this solar system round another, till the brain reels: is not retribution infinite likewise? These thoughts are new to me; I but grasp them vaguely, express them crudely, but they burn in my soul. O, the innocent hearts into which I have infused the germs of evil! O, the weak ones vacillating between good and bad whom I have drawn devilwards! Repent of my own sins? Ay, if that were all; but how to account for the eternal wrong I have done to others? And the one great crime which renders my conscience sensitive to the sins which I might otherwise have forgotten, on this side the judgment at least, how can I atone for that? By confessing it to you? No, no; and yet I have a thirst to do it, a desire not new to me. I have written the details in the form of a narrative, which will be placed in your hands at the same time as this letter. I began this account, of what it was the one remaining object of my life to hide, some months ago, carefully stopping at those details which would criminate me. I have not finished it now even, as I write this; but I will before you have it; yes, if my head keeps clear, and my strength holds. Criminate me? What do I mean? Nothing I could say would do that. But my nerves are not what they were; it is years and years since men first began to notice that I craned at my fences; and I see visions since that illness. For weeks a young man stood over against me night and day, with a bloody bruise on one side of his head, and a look so pitiful and reproachful, that it was a miracle I did not go mad. Will faces come around one like that hereafter?

I was what prudes and parsons call wild, I suppose; not worse, perhaps, than my neighbors, but more careless. I never could think economy anything but mean; and I confess to having been a fool in money matters. Though a younger son, I had a fair portion, quite as much as any man in my regiment, — and I spent every penny of it. Then my elder brother died, and I came into the estates, and soon had them pretty well dipped. To get clear, I married a woman with money, whom I never liked so much as she deserved, for she loved me well, and stuck to me through everything, — ay, to the very last. If it had been left to her, there would have been no settlements; but her people insisted on my tying up a few thousands for her and her children, — she brought me but one, a girl, and died a few years afterwards. I was again involved in money difficulties by that time, so I put Lucy at a good school, and went to the Mediterranean in Lord Plunger's yacht. He was shirking the bailiffs too; and we cruised about together for some years. It was only in '39 that I could return to England, and then I settled here, and began to look about me. There is a deal of marsh-land on the estate, and I had a mind to try draining a part of it, as many landholders have done in the county, to the great improvement of their property. But there was no capital to start with, and Marl Hill would not stand another mortgage; so then I thought of Lucy's money, which was lying idle in the funds. The estate is not bound to go to the male branch, but will come to her after my death, so the tied-up capital could not be laid out better for her than in reclaiming this fen. One of the trustees was dead, and the other very ill at the time, — only had a bit of one lung, people said; but it seems to have grown again, for he has got better, they tell me. He was living in Devonshire, and there was a difficulty about communicating with him, as also about the transaction altogether; there always is in such matters, I believe. However, it was got over, and a part of the money was withdrawn, and applied in the way which promised to be so much more advantageous.

There was not much to start such an undertaking with; and I had to begin in a small way, and do it cheaply. I found a man named Bradley, who professed to understand draining, and bargained with him to keep a party of five men at work on the place most favorable for a start; and they built some wooden huts on a dry spot in the marsh, so as to live close to their operations. Whenever he had an opportunity, Bradley was to add to the number of his workmen, so that sometimes there would be ten or twelve employed, but never less than five.

The draining did not go on fast, but then the wages paid were very small; the truth being that Bradley and his gang carried on more profitable business, and found working for me useful as a blind. This got suspected, and the fellows were called "Holcombe's Rough uns" by their own class, "Holcombe's Ruffians" by mine. I got rather a bad name amongst certain people; but what did that matter to me? Everybody is liable to that.

Bradley's gang were a bad lot, no doubt. They drank a good deal of spirits, to keep off the ague, and were suspected of brewing their own medicine. They were clever poachers, and never got caught; they kept up communication with vessels in the Humber, and made use of a small but navigable stream about four miles off for smuggling purposes. Some very queer fellows hid for awhile in those wooden huts sometimes, I dare say. But I do not preserve, and hold no office in either the Excise or Customs, so I got my draining done cheaply, and asked no questions.

Lucy was too old to be kept at school any longer, so I sent for her to the Marl; and a few days after her arrival a man named Naisley, the son of a Louth lawyer, who has bought land near here, and wishes to be thought a county-gentleman, saw her, and fell in love with her. Naisley is rich, and the marriage would have been a good thing on that account; but besides that, he knew all the rights of the difficulty I had had about that money which was tied up by settlement, for he was still a sort of sleeping-partner in the legal business, and the firm had transacted all my affairs, so that Naisley had opportunities of making any inquiries he chose, and suspected something not quite right. I had reasons therefore for taking up his cause pretty warmly; but there was a difficulty. As I was not on good terms with any of the distant branches of my family, there had been no one to receive Lucy during her holidays, and I had made arrangements with the schoolmistress to let her remain with her all the year round. But when the girl grew into a young woman, she formed romantic friendships with other girls, whose parents asked her to their homes; and when the matter was referred to me, I saw no reason to forbid her accepting such invitations. On one of these visits she met a young man, who fell in love with her; and when Naisley began to show her attention, and I backed him, she told me that she was engaged to this lad, who was a Cambridge undergraduate, and would not be in a position to marry probably for years. It was annoying; but I took it for granted that she would soon get over this girlish fancy, and made light of it at first. But the more I reasoned, the more she pleaded; and she would hardly treat Naisley with common civility. Then I lost my patience, and spoke harshly; and Lucy, who was very different from her mother, grew more obstinate as I insisted. Matters might have gone differently if she had respected me; but how should she think much of a father who was constantly drunk? Hardly a day passed without some violent scene; and in a short time we felt a positive aversion for each other, — for I have always come to hate any one who opposed my will, and my feelings towards her reached almost as far, though she was my own child. I judge of her sentiments to me by her shrinking, as if she expected a blow, whenever I came upon her unexpectedly.

In the summer, during the long vacation, her lover came to Lincolnshire to see me; and, learning from his own mouth that his patrimony was but a small one, I told him that I had other views for Lucy; that I disapproved of long engagements; and finally I forbade him to hold any further communication with her. He left the house without saying whether he would obey me or not, but hung about the neighborhood, and contrived several clandestine interviews with my daughter before I discovered what was going on. Then there was a quarrel, and blows were struck, though I confess that he was as forbearing as possible, and only threw me to the ground in self-defence. Still, I hated him for it, — hated him keenly and personally now, not merely as the cause of my plans being thwarted, and my safety endangered. I caused Lucy to be closely watched after this, for if she eloped with this Godwin, who must now look upon me as an enemy, he would make inquiries after a time about the property secured to his wife by her mother's marriage settlements. So, while her lover was in the neighborhood, I kept her a close prisoner in her own apartments. Soon after this, Naisley became pressing, and almost threatening, affecting to suspect that I was playing him false, and not doing my best to force Lucy to listen to him.

Early in the following November, I went up to Lucy's room one morning, with the intention of trying what conciliation would do, now that it was evident that she could not be compelled. She had been writing, and as I entered, she closed her blotting-book on the letter. After talking quietly for a little time, I alluded to this, and expressed a hope that she was not corresponding with the man who had made use of personal violence towards her father. Then she made a false move; had she remained quiet, it would never have occurred to me to examine what she had been writing; but she darted towards her blotting-book, and so roused my suspicions; and the next moment, in spite of her struggles and despairing cries, the letter, which was finished and signed, and the envelope, which was directed, were in my hands. She was accustomed to put on a quiet, protesting, persecuted-heroine air in her interviews with me; but now she fell at my feet, and clasped my knees, imploring me not to read what she had written. By which, of course, I knew that it was very important that I should do so; and when she found me determined to disregard her entreaties, she went into hysterics.

A glance showed me the purport of the letter. I then rang the bell, and told the servant to remain with her mistress till she recovered, and to lock the door upon her on leaving the room. Then I went to my private room, and studied the letter. Where could a young girl have got such boldness and such invention? It seemed that this lover of hers, Godwin, — to whom, of course, the letter was addressed, — had endeavored to persuade her to elope with him on one of those occasions when they had met in the summer; but that she had refused to take so serious a step, urging that he himself would think the worse of her afterwards for it. She now alluded to this, in order to own that she had been wrong: my tyranny, as she chose to call it, had become insupportable. I was determined to force her into marrying a man she positively hated. Then followed her reasons for thus hating Naisley, which showed considerable power of discerning character, and she positively appealed to her lover to come and save her from the cruel fate I designed her. But the most astounding part of the letter was the cunning and carefully studied plot which she had framed for the evasion. She knew that Godwin could not come undisguised into the neighborhood without my receiving early intelligence of it; so she directed him to dress himself as a navvy, and demand employment of Bradley. Men on the tramp to or from Hull often took a spell of work on my fen; and his making a similar application would excite no suspicion, or even particular attention. She was to disguise herself as a peasant, and they were to meet at a certain spot at eleven o'clock at night, and go off wherever he chose. Nothing was forgotten, she calculated the first possible night of his arrival, and said she would be at the appointed place on that, and if he were not there, on the next, then the next till he came. She gave him a pass-word; told him the times of arrival and departure of the ferry-boats from Hull to the nearest town on the Lincolnshire side,—in short, the whole thing might have been arranged by a Leporello or a Figaro.

I was nearly mad with humiliation and rage when I had read that letter carefully through. What had I said or done to drive an innocent young girl to plan and write it? Something probably inspired by drink and fear, which I remembered nothing of now I was sober. I cursed myself for my folly; I cursed Naisley, who had goaded me to it; the girl herself; and above all, this man who had interfered to thwart my plans. I had spoiled this one scheme; but could I always make sure of equal success in the face of such method and such determination? Yes, if I could keep clear of drink; but drink was as necessary to me now as air.

I went up to the fire to throw the letter into it, when suddenly a thought came into my head,—clear, distinct, inspired by the devil. Instead of burning the letter, I put it into the directed envelope, sealed it, rode over to the nearest village, and posted it with my own hands.

Then I visited the place where the draining was going on, called Bradley into one of the huts, and—

No, I will write down what I said to him when I have told everything else. Not yet, not yet. But I swear, and I know that I am a dying man, that I did not intend that to happen which did.

A week afterwards, I saw Lucy for the first time since the day that I intercepted her letter, and told her that her determined opposition to my wishes had at length convinced me that they would not tend to her happiness, and that I was ready to give way in anything, rather than drive her to so disgraceful a step as an elopement. If this marriage, which she had so set her heart on, must take place, let everything be done decently and without scandal. She should no longer be imprisoned or watched, but might correspond with her lover, and even tell him that I was willing to let bygones be bygones, and see him, if he still continued in the same mind, and would come to the Marl.

Ah, that burst of gratitude! I have led a hardening life, but my heart is not quite seared; and it was an agony to hear her self-reproaches, her promises of filial duty, and her auguries of a happy future,—an agony to see her step lighten, and the flush of health come back to her cheek; for I was a traitor, and I knew the sickening disappointment which was in store for her.

She wrote, and waited for an answer, which never came. She wrote again,—a third time,—still no response.

She sickened and pined; her eyes seemed to grow preternaturally large, and were turned on me at times with a look of mournful inquiry which was haunting. I can write no more now; I am giddy; the letters are confused. To-morrow.

IV. THE PLEBEIAN'S CONFESSION.

I read the first part of this unfinished manuscript, left for me by the man who now lies dead at the Marl, as the mere raving of a brain disordered by dreams, till the name of Godwin caught my attention; and then a comparison of dates showed that this improbable story tallied exactly with our friend's mysterious disappearance, and I could not doubt that he had met with foul play.

I write calmly now; but I was thrown into a terrible state of excitement at the time. The confession was incomplete, and he who had volunteered it could not write another line or utter another word. I am sorry, my dear Brown, that you cannot come here to pay me a visit at present, and I own that your reasons are valid; but had it been possible, you would have been of the very greatest assistance to me. I knew you would feel the interest you say you do, and I will send you a continuous narrative of my success or failure in tracing what I fear will prove the last footsteps of our poor friend. The first thing will be to find this Bradley. Of course, it will be impossible to speak to Miss Holcombe till after the funeral; and if her late father's account is to be trusted, it would be inflicting needless pain to trouble her with the subject at all, except that she could confirm or contradict the various statements in that account of which she has cognizance, and so enable us to judge of its general trustworthiness.

Three weeks have elapsed since Major Holcombe's funeral, and I have strange news for you. I will not enter into the minor details of my proceedings, but leave them to be talked over when we meet, and confine myself now to results. I did speak to Miss Holcombe as soon as it was decent to do so, and she was much overcome on hearing that I had been poor Godwin's friend. It was also a great shock to her to learn that her late father had sent the letter he took away, which she was sure that Godwin had received, because the later ones had been returned through the dead-letter office. It was not an easy matter at first to gain any tidings of Bradley, so I went to Hull, and put the matter in the hands of the police there, and they were able at once to trace him, as he was undergoing a sentence of imprisonment at Lincoln, to which town I proceeded. Then it appeared very doubtful whether any magistrate would commit him on any charge of murder, with no stronger evidence to go upon than the obscure hint of a man whose brain had been disordered; but Bradley, whose nerves seemed shaken by confinement, was so alarmed at the idea of such an accusation, hanging over him, that he volunteered a confession of all he knew about the matter, which was taken down in writing, and here is a copy of it.

That there gentleman as came to the Marl Fen in November, 1840, murdered? Don't you believe it, sir; he were n't no more murdered than you are. I am an unlucky beggar, and always was, but to get into trouble along of having done for a bloke, as for all I know is a-eating of his dinner comfortable at this present moment, is too bad, it is. Ay,

I know Major Holcombe thought he was dead; I let him think so for a reason, but bless yer, it was all kid. Ask Bill Blazer, Joe Keggs, Lushy Noggins, or Abe Snarein; ask Captain Blobber of the Slosure. — How was it? Why, this is how it was.

I was digging in the Marl Fen one arternoon along with my mates, when the major rode up and called me; and when I got to him he beckoned with his head, and said, low like: "Come here," so that I should go up quite close. So I did, and put my hand on the horse's neck like, and he bent a bit and said: "Bradley," says he, "I know, of course, that you and your mates would not drain my land at the price you're a-doing of it, unless you found the situation, and the excuse for living in these out-of-the-way huts, convenient. Well, that's naught to me," says he; "it's a mootoal advantage, and I'm not a-going to see you fall into a trap for want of a word o' warning. The custom-house people is arter you; they've got an idea there's a bit of running done in these parts, now and then, and that Holcombe's rough uns have summut to do with it. And there's a spy a-comeing to-morrow, or the day arter; he will be dressed like a navvy, and come to you to be took on at the draining, so that he may live in the huts here, and find out everything. Be all friendly and mate-like until he gets the chance to betray you, you understand?"

"Thank ye, major," says I; "now we shall know how to make him comfortable. He shall have a pleasant evening, and I dare say he will be in a hurry to come back for another."

"Well, Bradley," says he, "money ain't plentiful here, but I do so hate a spy — special when he comes a-interfering with my workmen — that I think I could find a ten-pun note somewheres if he got a warning to mind his own business done clever, so that there ain't a noise about it."

When the major spoke of paying, I saw he was up to a game, so I says; "If we should make a mistake, major, and we found arterwards he were not a preventive at all, that would hurt our feelings uncommon, and you would make it fifty, then, would n't you?"

"P'raps I would," said he, and rode away.

Well, I explained the matter to my mates, for there was only us five reg'lar ones working at the time; that is, I told them a preventive spy was coming, and kept the idea that the major might have a grudge against the chap to myself, — there warn't no call to speak of that. We agreed what we'd do: that were, to receive him friendly and unsuspicious; get drinking, and start a quarrel, quite promise'ous like, and then give it him stiffish, — all under seeming of a pleasant quiet fight, and no malice.

He came the third day after, I think it wor, but I won't kiss the book to the actooal day. There was no mistaking him; he was dressed like a navvy, sure enough, but he'd small delicate hands, muddled over artificial; and he were n't used to the heavy boots he'd on, for his steps did n't drag. He acted his part very well, though; sat down and blew his baccy quite friendly, and offered to stand a couple o' gallons to wet his footing.

"There ain't a public nearer nor a couple o' miles, worse luck," says Joe Keggs.

"Have n't you got a drop of something handy, in stock, as it were?" says the stranger; and I saw my mates look queer at that; it made 'em feel sartin this were the preventive spy.

"Well," says Joe, "there is a couple o' bottles o' stuff which was sent to us from the Marl, in case one of us should feel a touch of the rheumatics coming on."

"Let's have 'em," says the stranger; and we did. But he tried to shirk drinking hisself, and that made an excuse for a quarrel.

I'm not going to deny that that stranger got something for hisself; two of my mates had drufk as much as they could do with, and punished him more than we meant. And just then the major came down and had a look into the hut; none of the others twigg'd him, but I did. He had been lushing pretty free, as he always did, and I suppose could n't keep away. But he looked precious scared at what he saw, and I expect it pretty well sobered him. The stranger was lying on the floor of the hut, face upwards, senseless, with a nasty place on his temple. He did look uncommon dead, surely. But he warn't, bless yer, not a bit. When the major was gone, — and he only held the door ajar, gave a look in, and was off, — I washed the chap's bruises, and made him tidy with a hankercher round his head. And then we played him a trick. The day before, Captain Blobber, of the Slosure, — which is a whaler, and he her skipper, — comes to me and says, "Do you know one Jack Sherks, who lives hereabouts? Because he came to me and engaged himself, and I gave him an advance to clench the bargain, and we sail on Saturday, and he has n't turned up."

Now I knew Jack Sherks well enough, and that he did n't mean to sail in the Slosure. He'd been a whaling once, and did n't much like it; but being down on his luck, he engaged to Captain Blobber, and then heard tell of something he liked better, and was hiding till the ship was off. But I was n't going to split on an old pal, for Jack and I had done a little together in the smuggling way; so I says, "No, I have n't seen him lately; but if I do, I'll bring him if I can."

"If you will," says he, "I'll reward you handsome, for I'm full short of hands. Or if you bring me any other sailor, and there's many has a friend hereabouts," says he, hinting delicate at my character for a bit of contraband, "I'll make it worth your while."

I thanked him, and said I'd do my best, and forgot all about it till that night, when the stranger was a-lying stupid on the floor of the hut. It was Friday, and the Slosure sailed next day, for the wind was favorable. Captain Blobber had only set eyes on Jack Sherks once, and could n't know him well; so the trick I thought of was to take the stranger down to Grimsby in a spring-cart I knew how to get the loan of, and see if we could get him shipped for Jack. Well, we fetched the cart, and put the stranger into it. He had come round a bit, and groaned now and then, but did n't know where he was, or what we were doing with him; and we got him to Grimsby, where I found Captain Blobber at the house where he told me to ask for him. I said that I had met Jack Sherks at a public disguised as a navvy, and he had got drunk and been fighting, and got a knock on the head, but I did n't think it would be much, so I had brought him. The skipper got a lantern and came outside the town where the cart had been left; and when he looked at the man's head and felt it, he said he would be all right for a eut like that in a day or two, and he was so short of hands he'd take him. So he got his boat and took him aboard ship at once, and the Slosure sailed next tide; and that's the last I ever heard of the matter. Every word as I've said is the truth, so help me.

How does this story of Bradley's sound to you, Brown? I confess that I am inclined to believe it. Credo quia, — it is so improbable; the man could never have invented a lie so circumstantial. Besides which, I have made inquiries, and a whaler named the Slosure, Captain John Blobber, did sail from Grimsby on Saturday, November 7, 1840. The fact is easily verified, because it made a considerable stir in the neighborhood at the time; for the Hull whalers generally start for Greenland in the spring and return in the autumn. But John Blobber had some private dodge of his own about wintering in an uncomfortable proximity to the north pole, and securing the first of the fishing when the ice broke. A chosen party, who had made several ordinary trips with him, fell in with his views; but it was a small one, and he had considerable difficulty in getting outsiders to have anything to do with so wild a proceeding as starting northwards at that time of year. This would account for his rash advance of money to the able-bodied seaman Sherks, and also for his taking him (as he supposed) on board though he was temporarily disabled.

One more point adds to the credibility of Bradley's account, or, at any rate, throws a difficulty in the way of disproving it: the Slosure, alas for our poor friend! has never been heard of since.

V. WHAT'S TRUMPS?

You will be surprised to see my handwriting again, my dear Brown, so soon after my last budget, especially as there is a chance of this letter crossing one of yours on the road, and you know my objection to such accidents. But you express so much anxiety to hear the latest particulars of anything which may throw light on Godwin's disappearance, that I will not let a post go by without sending you word of what has happened. Miss Holcombe has not shut herself up, or professed any great grief on account of her father's death. She feels that madness would have been so far greater an evil, that the actual event is evidently a relief to her mind. Of course she has regrets and pictures to herself that her father might have become reformed, and given up his habits of intemperance, if he had recovered his health; but still I fancy that she has too strong a conviction that the probabilities are all the other way for that sorrow to penetrate very deep.

Her position is a singular one. I do not understand much about the laws of my country, and fancied that land always went to males; but what Major Holcombe said in his confession is quite correct, it seems, — he actually had the power of leaving Marl Hill to his daughter by will, and has done so. As she is just of age, therefore, she finds herself the mistress of a house and an estate, both half in ruins, and requiring a vast amount of care and judgment to set them right: while she is so ignorant of affairs that she looks up to me — a fellow who knows no more what ought to be done in any legal or agricultural jointure than an Ojibbeway — as a perfect oracle. Common sense told me one thing, that she ought to have some motherly, middle-aged lady — a widow for choice — in the house with her; and as she saw the propriety of that, I looked about, and secured a comfortable sympathetic dame, the relict of a clergyman, poor and without encumbrances, who was glad to accept the position of chaperon and domestic economist.

So soon as matters were thus in a measure settled, Miss Holcombe redoubled her efforts for the improvement of the poor around her; for she was able to spend a little money now, while at the same time she felt her responsibility as an owner of the soil in addition to a desire for some end and aim to live for. Coals, candles, and blankets have been distributed; the infant school is a permanent establishment; and she even entered into a little fancy I had for dressing up the church for Christmas. The edifice is so dull and gloomy that I am always longing for the power of painting it up a bit, clearing out the horrible old pews, and so getting rid of that gloomy air of depression which I fancy seems to affect the spirits of every parishioner who enters it. However, I am utterly unable to do anything permanent myself, but I thought a little temporary cheerfulness might be infused over the place in honor of the happiest of Christian festivals. Plenty of laurel, holly, and red berries could be had for nothing; nor were children wanting who entered into the spirit of the thing, and were delighted to bring the evergreens to the church; the only desideratum was the taste to arrange them, and for this I had to appeal to Miss Holcombe, and her new companion, Mrs. Wing. They answered readily enough: the younger lady brought originality; the elder, experience; I, superior strength and a longer reach.

It was past three o'clock in the afternoon, and our task was fortunately approaching completion, for the light already began to wane, and the snow, which was falling in large soft flocks, silently gathered over the windows, and obscured it still further. The two ladies were at the east end of the church, putting the final touches to a bower of mistletoe which festooned over the marble medallion of the late Sir Timothy Wetherbel, Bart., — as if any one was likely to want to kiss him!

"One little bit more holly for the reading-desk, and I think we shall do," said Miss Holcombe; and I went to the church porch to select a bough from the heap which had been thrown there.

The door stood ajar; on swinging it open, I saw a sailor standing in the porch, peering through into the interior, and supposing that he was attracted by curiosity, I told him to go in if he liked. "We are smartening up a bit for Christmas," said I.

He made no reply, but looked me steadily in the face.

"Is there anything the matter?" I asked. "Am I wanted?"

"What's trumps, Stacey?" he said; and then I knew him.

"Hush!" whispered I, grasping his hand. "She is in there. She has lately lost her father and —"

Before I could finish my sentence, there was a rustle behind me, and Miss Holcombe, who had heard and recognized the first tones of the sailor's voice, stood in the doorway. She gave a great gasp, and fell almost senseless in Godwin's arms, to the great surprise of good Mrs. Wing, who had followed along the aisle to see what was up. I explained the state of the case in a few hurried words; and then the sympathetic matron began to cry.

Hylas Godwin rather marred the impressiveness of the scene by staggering under the weight of Miss Holcombe, who is a very fine girl, and sitting down on the holly: having tight sailor's trousers he got up again pretty quickly.

You must positively come now, Brown, and hear Godwin's yarns. He has been catching whales and exploring countries which are all hummocks and bears; and he has lost two toes from frost-bite, and been shipwrecked, and travelled half over the globe before he could get here. And of course he will marry Miss Holcombe as soon as it is decent; for she does not mind his being a toe or two short, not she. He will write to you in a day or two, for he wants you to be another witness to his identity, as he has been reported dead, it seems, and has certain formalities to go through to get at his own property. Whether he will complete his college career in the legitimate manner ("make his exit B. A.," he calls it), is uncertain, for he doubts whether he could pass after three years' estrangement from classics and mathematics. Just as I was closing this, your letter came in announcing your intention of coming to see me at last. You will have to sleep on a sofa, as Godwin has taken possession of the bed reserved for you, but you will not mind that! Come along, old fellow; I wish Thorpe could be here too. Why, we might finish the rubber!

FOREIGN NOTES.

MR. SOTHERN, it is stated, intends to retire from the stage next year.

IT is rumored that a Manchester gentleman has purchased London Punch.

MISS NEILSON has made her appearance at Drury Lane Theatre, in a new drama by Mr. Dion Boucicault.

M. ALEXANDRE DUMAS is preparing for the Ambigu-Comique, Paris, a version of his romance, "Joseph Balsamo."

THE paper on Landor in the present issue of EVERY SATURDAY is evidently from the pen of the conductor of All the Year Round.

LAMARTINE's property at Monceaux, near Macon, as well as the chateau of Monceaux, has been sold for the benefit of his heirs-at-law.

THE needle manufactory of Schleicher in Schonthal, near Duren, on the Rhine, exported in the year 1868, 840,000,000 sewing needles.

THE cupola of St. Peter's, Rome, needs repairs to its lead covering; the new material is to be partly gilt, as in the time of Sixtus the Fifth.

ASCHER, the pianist to the Empress of the French, has died in London, aged thirty-nine. He was a pupil of Mendelssohn, Moscheles, and Thalberg. He lost his reason some time before his death.

A MISS LAMARA, of Vienna, is creating great excitement in the musical circles of Paris by her surpassingly beautiful voice. Adelina Patti told her, after hearing her twice, that she was destined to become the queen of the Italian Opera.

MR. WILLIAM MORRIS will publish a further portion of his poem "The Earthly Paradise" in November, instead of waiting till the whole of the work is completed. The volume to be published in November will comprise the tales for Autumn; the final tales for Winter will follow in May next.

So many deaths from sun-stroke have taken place on the East Indian Railway, India, that the directors have ordered a supply of coffins to be kept at the various stations on the line. A cheerful sight for passengers.

Not long since a picnic-party in Japan was attacked by a mob, upon the charge that the pleasure-seekers had met together for the purpose of eating little children. Whether or not the party had indulged in infant sandwiches does not appear.

A YOUNG woman in Newcastle, England, recently died from a disease communicated by the chignon she wore, which is supposed to have contained some of the hair known to be supplied to chignon makers from the cemeteries and hospitals of the East.

THE Empress Eugenie will be accompanied to Egypt by a complete staff of writers and artists, charged to reproduce by the pen and the pencil the principal episodes of the excursion. At the head of the draftsmen figures Gustave Doré, and of the chroniclers, Théophile Gautier.

SEA-SICKNESS does not seem particularly susceptible of dramatic treatment. Its manifestations, however, supply the comic interest of a new farce at the Strand, "The Chops of the Channel." The intrigue is conducted in the intervals between spasms of sickness, and the humor depends upon the fun to be extracted by the passengers from the doleful situation in which they are placed.

THE proprietors of the English line look with unfavorable eyes on the success of the French Atlantic Cable. Not so the English press. The Spectator remarks: "There are now three of these lines in working order. By the time there are thirty, M. Reuter will probably be ready to give the public a little non-commercial news from the States, where they publish every morning whole columns of news from Europe. Our Press is rapidly becoming the least spirited in the world, and submits to anybody who offers to save it sixpence."

M. OFFENBACH is, it is said, growing ambitious, and intends writing a Guillaume Tell, after which he will be satisfied. Like Alexandre Dumas fil, he is tired of his reputation. The world has only recognized in him a master of frothy, catchy, attractive melodies, the illustration of indelicate subjects. Now he protests that he writes musical tomfooleries like La Périchole and Tulipatan for the simple reason that they pay better than any other form of composition. Having amassed a handsome fortune, he designs to produce one important work and then throw down his pen, in imitation of the recently deceased maestro Rossini.

THE death of the well-known Count of Chateaullivard has given rise to almost as many necrological articles in the French papers as Lamartine. The Count's fame was principally due to the fact of his having once ridden up the stairs of the Jockey Club, and played and won a game of billiards on horseback. But when the memory of these and other similar eccentricities has passed away his Essai sur le Duel will still remain the Hoyle of duelling, the undisputed authority consulted by all the seconds implicated in these meetings. The Essai sur le Duel contains rules providing for every contingency, and terminates with an account of all the decrees issued against duelling, which are equally remarkable for their severity and their inefficiency.

A LONDON publishing house having applied to a Madrid firm, with a view of introducing juvenile illustrated books into Spain, received from their correspondent the following reply: "To find any sale here the books should be printed in Spanish, but Spanish works printed abroad cannot be imported here. But even if this latter obstacle should be removed, which is not unlikely to be the case at no very distant period, children here are not what they are in other countries. Precocious as Spanish children generally are, they are very early infected with the excitement-loving spirit of their parents, have no thought for anything but outward show, theatres, bullfights, &c., and they seldom ever acquire a taste for reading. Hence there scarcely exists any juvenile literature in the Spanish language, and most parents would begrudge sixpence or a shilling for a juvenile book, whilst they squander the amount in amusing their offspring senselessly and even objectionably. Children here will not be children long, and do not like to be treated as such."

WILLIAM JERDAN, a veteran critic and writer, died last month at his residence, near Bushey Heath, at the ripe age of eighty-eight. He was for many years editor of the Literary Gazette. Ten or twelve years ago he published, in several volumes, his "Autobiography," and he has still more recently issued a volume of reminiscences called "Men I have known." Mr. Jerdan will be remembered in political history as the person who seized Bellingham, the assassin, in the lobby of the old House of Commons. In recent numbers of Fraser's Magazine are contributions from his pen, and the last two parts of the Gentleman's Magazine contain an article on the celebrated Beefsteak Club, which no other living man could have written from personal knowledge. For several years recently he has contributed to the Leisure Hour a series of reminiscences of distinguished men, illustrated by characteristic letters. Of the Royal Literary Fund in its early days he was a zealous advocate, and by his influence greatly aided its prosperity. His kindly help was always afforded to young aspirants in literature and art, and his memory will be cherished by many whom he helped to rise to positions of honor and independence. Late in life he received a pension of £100 a year for his long services to literature.

THE London Athenæum speaks thus pleasantly of Mr. Piatt's "Western Windows and other Poems": "There is sweet and genuine poetry to be found in this unpretending volume. It bears the impress in its tones and in its imagery of Western forests and Western progress,—the old primeval forests giving place to the pioneer, and he again to cities and 'the busy hum of men.' The pictures of bygone life,—of old hearthstones and graveyards relapsed into solitude, whilst the train and the railway carry the new generation far beyond them to new settlements. 'The Pioneer's Chimney,' 'The King's Tavern,' 'Fires in Illinois,' 'A Lost Graveyard,'—are all voices speaking of long ago, and linking it with the present. 'The Mower in Ohio, 1864,' is the poem we like the best,—an old man, whose four sons have gone to the war, and left him to mow his field alone. A whole life-history is put into a few stanzas, the pathetic and the heroic mingle together; few will read it without a mist in the eyes and a lump in the throat. It seems to us that since the War the American people give utterance to deeper and nobler thoughts in their poetry; they have gained an individuality of their own, and their verse is not the reflex and imitation of other poets in distant climes. Occasionally Mr. Piatt gives us an echo of Longfellow and Tennyson, but his best poems are his own, and recall no remembrance or shade of the poetry of others."

THE Invalide Russe, organ of the Russian War Office, has just completed a series of articles urging the necessity, for strategical purposes, of improving the railway communication between the various parts of the empire. It points out that there are as yet no railways connecting the interior of Russia with the Vistula, the Crimea, the Caucasus, or Central Asia; that there is no safe and rapid means of transferring troops from one point on the frontier to another; that the communication between the provinces where the irregular cavalry is recruited and the frontier is very defective; and that the important positions on the coasts of the Baltic and Black Sea are not connected, as they should be, by lines of railway. The only line which is really important from a strategical point of view is that from Charkoff to Rostoff, which enables the Cossacks of the Don to be moved rapidly and at short notice to the frontier. As against Prussia, Russia has only a line running parallel with her frontier and too far distant from it to be of any military use, while Prussia has three lines parallel to the northern frontier of Poland and two at right angles to it. The Invalide Russe concludes from the above facts that it is absolutely necessary for Russia to complete her network of railways on the west and southwest, and that she should begin with the latter, as a conflict is to be expected with Austria and Turkey sooner than with Prussia.

THE Morning Star says: "A curious illustration of the saturating and distorting influence which religious prejudice may assume is to be found in the last number of the Dublin Review, the Catholic quarterly. One would suppose that Mr. Browning's last poem, to whatever other charges it may be open, is at any rate not very fanatically Protestant or anti-Catholic. Caponsacchi, the hero, is a priest. Innocent XII., one of the noblest characters in the poem and in all art, is not only priest but Pope. Pompilia, the exquisite heroine, is unimpeachably devout and faithful. Yet the writer in the Dublin Review considers the poem as only one more instance of the calumny to which Catholics in this country have learnt to grow callous. Mr. Browning is the dupe of fantastic prejudices, and, as the writer all too broadly insinuates, caricatures priests and others in order to commend himself to a prejudiced public. It is true that the author of the 'Ring and the Book' has depicted some egregious scoundrels, and that, as Italy happens to be emphatically a Catholic country, the scoundrels happen to be Catholics too. But this is uncommonly strange proof of his bigotry. We should hardly take it as an ill-humored satire upon Protestantism, if a poet, writing about England or Scotland, should introduce Protestant villains. Mr. Browning is an artist, and in high art there is no room for religious antipathies. It is a thousand pities that people of strong religious feelings do not more honestly cultivate this quality of the artistic temper."

THE LEGEND OF THE PRINCESS TARA-KANOF.

MANY of the visitors of the Paris Exhibition of 1867 will remember a striking picture in the Russian section, representing the interior of a cell in the Petropavlovsky Fortress at St. Petersburg, during the great inundation of 1777. It is a picture which cannot fail to produce a strong and a very painful impression on all who see it. Through the broken window of the cell the turbid water is pouring in a great wave: the room is already half flooded, and will soon be completely submerged. On the bed a young girl is standing, pale, and evidently half fainting with fear, and a number of mice are swimming towards it, or, like her, have already taken refuge upon it. The bare aspect of the dreary prison-chamber contrasts strongly with the richness of the young girl's dress, worn and faded as it is, and so does the wild look of despair upon her face with the beauty of the features and the grace of the form of one who seems to have been fitted for far other scenes, for a widely different fate. Few of the spectators who saw this picture of Flavitaky's turned away from it without a wish to know something about the story which it illustrated, and which the catalogue informed them was known as "The Legend of the Princess Tarakanof." That story we now propose to tell. It has often been told before, but—as far as English narrators are concerned—always wrongly, and yet it is well worthy of being told aright. But its true nature has not very long been made known even in Russia. It was not till Alexander II. came to the throne that the papers were allowed to be examined on which the book is founded, and from which we are about to take our facts.* It is not wonderful, therefore, that the old legend should not yet have been displaced in England by a true version of the story.

The legend runs as follows. After the Empress Catharine II. had mounted the throne, she discovered that a rival, whose claims might become dangerous to her, existed in the person of a Princess Tarakanof. This princess was the daughter of the Empress Elizabeth by her marriage with Count Razumovsky. She had been brought up abroad in great seclusion, and was living at the time in Italy.

Catharine determined to get hold of her, and sent Count Alexis Orloff to Italy, on purpose to entrap her. He contrived to gain the confidence and to win the heart of the young girl, who was very beautiful and exceedingly charming. Having deluded her by a false marriage, he got her entirely into his power, inducing her to believe that he was going to espouse her cause and make her Empress of Russia. One day she went on board his ship at Leghorn. At first she was treated with the honors proper to royalty, but was suddenly arrested, loaded with irons, confined in the hold, and carried off to Russia. On arriving there she was thrown into a fortress, and treated in the most barbarous manner. Six years afterwards she perished in her prison, during an inundation of the Neva. Such is the legend. We pass on now to the true story.

The Empress Elizabeth was of a very impressionable character. Early in life, some time before she came to the throne, she fell desperately in love with a young officer named Shubine, and wished to marry him. But before the marriage could be brought about, he was suddenly arrested, and banished to Kamschatka, by the reigning Empress Anne. Elizabeth consoled herself as she best could, but she did not forget her former lover, and after her accession sent a confidential agent all over Kamschatka in search of him. For many months that officer travelled about the country seeking him in vain; all his inquiries were fruitless. No one had ever heard of such a name as Shubine. But at last one day, while he was talking to a group of exiles, he happened to mention the name of the Empress Elizabeth. "Is Elizaveta Petrovna now on the throne?" asked one of them. The officer replied in the affirmative, but the exile seemed to doubt the fact, until he was shown an official document in which Elizabeth was named as Empress. "If that is the case," said the convict, "the Shubine whom you are asking about is standing before you." Elizabeth's long-lost lover was found at last. On his arrival at St. Petersburg Elizabeth received him very kindly, made him a major-general, and conferred various other honors upon him. But the years he had passed in exile had produced a great change in him. His bodily health was shattered, and his thoughts had turned to religion, and especially to its ascetic side. He soon retired from the court, and before long he died. His last days were spent in the country, on an estate which the Empress had given him. There, in the village church, are preserved to this day a costly picture of the Saviour and a precious relic, both presented by

* The book was published last year at St. Petersburg, under the title of "Knyazna Tarakanova i Printsessa Vladimirovna." P. Melnikova [Princess Tarakanova and the Princess of Vladimir. By P. Melnikof], but its substance had already appeared in some of the Russian periodicals. A German translation of part of it had been published at Berlin, under the title of "Die vergebliche Tochter der Kaiserin Elisabeth Petrovna."

Elizabeth to her former lover in remembrance of her early attachment.

After Shubine's banishment Elizabeth had turned her attention to another lover. In the same year with herself, in 1709, a certain Alexis Razum had come into the world, the son of a simple Cossack in Little Russia. As the young Alexis grew up, it was discovered that he had a magnificent voice, and he became one of the choristers in the village church. There he was heard one day by an agent collecting singers for the imperial chapel, by whom he was at once transferred to St. Petersburg, where Elizabeth saw him, and took a fancy to him.

As soon as she mounted the throne she began to confer on him the first of a long series of honors. The young Cossack Razum soon became the great noble Razumovsky, Count of the Roman as well as of the Russian empire. In the year 1744, the Empress first made him a field-marshal and then married him. From that time till the end of her life he bore himself very discreetly, and never lost his influence over her. After Elizabeth's death, the Empress Catharine II. sent Count Vorontsov to ask Razumovsky to produce the papers bearing on his marriage with her predecessor, and offering to confer on him the title of Imperial Highness. Vorontsov went to Razumovsky's house, and found him "sitting in an arm-chair by the fire, and reading the Bible." After the usual compliments Vorontsov explained the cause of his visit. Razumovsky did not utter a word, but silently rose and opened a cabinet, from a secret drawer in which he produced a packet of papers enveloped in rose-colored satin. These he began to read, still keeping silence; when he had finished reading them he raised his eyes, which were swimming in tears, to the sacred pictures which hung overhead, crossed himself devoutly, and threw the papers into the fire. Then he resumed his seat and began to speak. According to his account the late Empress had never had any relations with him beyond those of a monarch with a devoted subject, and the story of the marriage was nothing but an idle legend. For himself, he wished no more than to end his days in prayerful seclusion.

There can be no doubt, however, that the marriage really took place, and that two children were the fruit of it. Of these one was a son of whom nothing certain is known, but tradition relates that he lived till the beginning of the present century, shut up in a distant monastery, and always bitterly lamenting his unhappy lot.

Of the daughter more has been ascertained. Of her early life nothing is known, but in 1785, when forty years old, she was sent by the Empress Catharine II. to the Ivanovsky convent at Moscow. There she lived for some five-and-twenty years, leading so secluded a life as to see scarcely any one beyond a few priests. A private corridor and staircase led directly from her cell into the convent church, and so she could go into it unseen. When there mass used to be said privately for her, and on such occasions the church doors were closed and no strangers were admitted. The curtains behind the windows of her cell were always drawn; and if any of the passers-by loitered near and tried to look in, they were immediately driven away. There has been some slight dispute as to the date of her decease, but her tombstone states that she died on February 4, 1810, in the sixty-fourth year of her age. The Governor of Moscow and the other great officials attended at her funeral in full uniform, and the crowd of lookers-on was enormous. She was not buried in the cemetery of the convent in which she had lived, but in that of the Novospassky monastery. It is a fitting resting-place for one who had led a quiet life, for it is a very quiet spot, although lying close to one of the large streets in the out-kirts of Moscow. The graves seem somewhat huddled up together, and have rather a neglected look, but there are trees which throw a pleasant shade on them, and in the fine weather of spring and early summer the birds sing pleasantly and flowers grow around in profusion. Even an acknowledged princess might find a worse place to sleep in.

So much as regards the real Princess Tarakanof, of whom but little has been written. Now for the pretender to the title, on whom much ink and sympathy have been expended.

About the year 1771, a certain Van Toers, the son of a Dutch merchant, fled from Ghent, where he left a wife and several creditors, and took up his residence in London. With him came a Madame Tremouille, — a lady who had been living in Berlin under the name of Franck, and in Ghent under that of Schöll.

She is said to have been very beautiful, although with a slight cast in one eye; and as she was both clever and accomplished, and had a singularly fascinating manner, she succeeded in charming most of the persons with whom she was brought into contact. She and Van Toers lived in great style in London, but before long fresh creditors obliged him to leave England. In the spring of 1772 he appeared in Paris, under the title of the Baron Embe, and thither he was followed a few months later by Madame Tremouille, who now began to call herself the Princess of Vladimir. Her story was that her parents, with whose name she was unacquainted, had died while she was very young, and that she had been brought up in Persia by an uncle. This uncle was taking care of her property, which was of fabulous value, and she herself had come to Europe for the purpose of looking after a rich inheritance which had accrued to her in Russia.

Alina, as she called herself, spent the winter of 1772 very pleasantly in Paris, where she added greatly to the number of her admirers and of her creditors, prominent among the former being Oginski, the Polish Ambassador, with whom she became closely allied. But before long Van Toers again became crippled by debts, and in 1773 he had to fly with Alina and some of her friends to Frankfort. Even there his creditors persecuted him, and he was put in prison. Fortunately for Alina, there arrived just then in the city a very foolish sovereign, Prince Philip Ferdinand of Limburg. The fair foreigner was introduced to him, and almost at the first interview completely won his heart. He paid her debts, and treated her with such royal magnificence that she soon deserted her other admirers for him, and in the beginning of June, 1773, she left Frankfort and went with him to his castle in Franconia.

There she led a life of luxury and extravagance which exactly suited her, and there she discovered for herself a new family history and provided herself with a new title. She became now "the Sultana Alina," and as the daughter of a Turkish Sultan was styled "Princess of Azof"; moreover, she founded the Order of the Asiatic Cross. A little later, however, she explained that she was only "a lady of Azof," not the princess of that country, and that she would soon be recognized in Russia as sole heiress to the property of the house of Vladimir. Meanwhile the Prince of Limburg became more and more infatuated with her, and at last asked her to marry him. She consented, and it seemed as if, after all her wanderings and adventures, a quiet and enviable life was about to open before her.

But about this time a young Pole named Doman-aki began to make his appearance at Oberstein, where the "Princess of Vladimir" was holding a kind of court, and before long she was in close correspondence with several of the Polish nobles, especially with Prince Charles Radziwill. Poland was then smarting under the injustice of the "First Partition," and Radziwill was taking an active part in the proceedings of the Polish committee into which the leading members of the late Confederation of Bar had formed themselves. The successes gained in the east of Russia by Pugachev—the insurgent chief who pretended to be the Emperor Peter III.—had raised the hopes of the Poles, and they were anxious to take advantage of them in order to set a western insurrection on foot. How far their advice may have swayed the action of the "Princess of Vladimir" is not known, but before long rumors began to spread abroad to the effect that she was no less than rightful heiress to the throne of Russia, being the legitimate daughter of the late Empress Elizabeth by her marriage with Count Razumovsky; and that Pugachev, who was the count's son by an earlier marriage, was her half-brother. With an imperial crown in view no wonder that she disclaimed the merely princely coronet of the ruler of Limburg, and in the spring of 1774 she left him never to return.

From Germany she went into Italy, settling down for a time at Venice, where, under the name of the Countess Pinneberg, she set up a kind of little court. She lived in the house of the French Resident, spent her money freely, and allowed herself every indulgence. Her principal visitors were Poles, but the captains of two Turkish frigates, Hassan and Muhammad by name, were often at her receptions, and so was a well-known English traveller who had a strong taste for all manner of eccentricities,—Edward Wortley Montagu. After a time she determined to go to Constantinople, with the idea of trying to persuade the Sultan to support her claim to the Russian throne. Accordingly, she and all her court embarked on board one of the Turkish vessels, the commander receiving her with the greatest respect, and treating her as a royal personage. The ship set sail, but contrary winds drove it to Corfu, whence its captain determined to return to Venice. Several of the followers of the Princess went back in it, entreating her to accompany them; but she would not do so. They left her, and she embarked on board another Turkish vessel, and a second time set sail for Constantinople. But a second time a storm arose, and the ship was obliged to take refuge in the harbor of Ragusa. In that city the Princess took up her habitation, being lodged there, as before at Venice, in the house of the French consul. The French king was said to look with no unfriendly eye on her opposition to the Empress Catharine.

At Ragusa the Princess matured her plans. By way of confirmation of her story, she now produced certain documents of a very suspicious nature, amongst them the wills of Peter the Great and the Empress Elizabeth, on which she founded her claim to the throne of Russia. She also wrote a letter to the Sultan, suggesting an alliance with him against Catharine, and saying that Sweden and Poland were willing to take part in it; and she sent the Grand Vizier a copy of the letter, which she asked him to forward to her half-brother, Pugachev. She did not know that Pugachev was at that moment a fugitive, soon to be betrayed to the Russian general; nor did she suspect that her friend Radziwill had given secret orders to his agent at Constantinople not to forward the letters she sent to his care for the Sultan and the Grand Vizier.

In her letter to the Sultan, the Princess spoke of an address which she had communicated to the Russian fleet at Leghorn. That fleet was commanded by Count Alexis Orlof, and it was to him that she addressed herself, sending a letter to him which she intrusted to the care of Mr. Wortley Montagu. In it she called upon Orlof to espouse her cause, styling herself Elizabeth II., Princess of Russia, and distinctly claiming the throne as hers by right. Orlof received the letter with delight, and immediately sent it on to the Empress Catharine, telling her that he intended to enter into communication with his correspondent, and that as soon as he could get her on board his ship he would sail straight away with her to Cronstadt.

Catharine sent word to Orlof to get hold of the pretender at all risks, even telling him—if his own account of the matter may be taken as correct—that he was to bombard Ragusa in case the senate of that republic refused to give her up. On the receipt of this letter, Orlof sent an agent to make inquiries at Ragusa about the Princess Elizabeth, and was about to proceed there himself with his squadron, when he learnt that she was no longer there. By this time her affairs were in disorder, and her prospects sadly overclouded. Peace had been concluded between Russia and Turkey, and Pugachev had been taken prisoner and executed, so that Catharine was freed from her most serious apprehensions. Radziwill, seeing that his plans were no longer practicable, abandoned the unfortunate adventures, whose cause he had pretended to espouse so long as she seemed likely to be useful to him. But when asked to betray her, he utterly refused. That act of baseness he left for Orlof to perform. But he did not shrink from leaving her at Ragusa alone and without resources.

From Ragusa the Princess went to Naples, where she made acquaintance with the English ambassador, Sir William Hamilton, through whose influence she was enabled to obtain a passport, with which she immediately set off for Rome. There she lived for some time, giving herself out to be a noble Polish lady, and professing to wish to lead a life of great seclusion, making few acquaintances, and never going out except in a carriage with closed windows. The truth was, her health had begun to give way, and for a time she really did lead a quiet life in acquiescence with her doctor's advice; but so uncongenial a mode of passing her time did not long satisfy her. Meanwhile, she was not unmindful of her interests. Announcing herself as a penitent schismatic desirous of entering the Roman Communion, she tried to make friends at the Vatican. At this time there was no Pope at Rome, for a successor to Clement XIV. had not yet been elected. Cardinal Albani was talked of as likely to be chosen, and the Princess was very anxious to obtain an interview with him. At last on January 1, 1775, one of her Polish companions managed to convey a letter from her to the Cardinal, who sent an abbé named Roccotani, to confer with her. On him she produced a very favorable impression, and even the cardinal, in spite of the state of preoccupation in which he then naturally was, could not help being interested in the fair convert, who explained that she was likely to become the Empress of Russia, and would do her best in that case to wean back her subjects from the errors of schism. But she succeeded only in getting a small amount of money from him. Further assistance he would not give, nor would the Polish Resident at Rome, who treated her with marked coldness. As she had taken once more to leading an extravagant life, keeping some fifty servants, and opening her rooms to a large circle, chiefly persons of artistic tastes, she was soon in want of money. In her distress she bethought herself of Sir William Hamilton, and wrote him a long letter explaining her claims to the throne of Russia, her present impecunious position, and the absolute necessity of her borrowing a little money. This letter alarmed the English ambassador, who had no wish to compromise himself in the eyes of the Russian authorities, and he determined to make amends for his error in obtaining her passport. So he sent on the letter to the English consul at Leghorn, Sir John Dick.

Throughout the whole of this story our countrymen figure to little advantage. Sir John Dick plays a very sorry part indeed, but he had always been on very friendly terms with the Russian authorities, and especially with Orlof, who procured for him the much-valued decoration of the Order of St. Anne, — the only instance of a Russian decoration being conferred on an English subject in the eighteenth century.

Sir John Dick seems to have been ready to do anything for Orlof, and at once handed over to him Sir William Hamilton's letter. Up to this moment Orlof had been unable to trace the movements of the victim he was hunting down. Now he knew where to find her. A few days later he was able to send word to the Empress Catharine that one of his officers, Khristenek by name, had been sent to Rome to try and induce the pretended Princess to leave that city, and to place herself within reach of the arm of Russia.

A few days later an English banker named Jenkins introduced himself to the Princess, and offered to open an unlimited credit at his bank for her. At first she thought he came from Sir William Hamilton, but he explained that his employer was Orlof, to whom he had been recommended by Sir John Dick. A vague suspicion flitted across her mind, and at first she refused the tempting offer.

About the same time a stranger had been observed curiously gazing at the house she occupied, and asking questions about its inmates. She immediately suspected that he was a Russian agent, and she sent to Cardinal Albani to ask for protection. But the stranger presented himself to her, and explained that he had been sent by Orlof to proffer her his services. At first she told him, as she had told Jenkins, that she did not require them. She justly suspected danger, and kept herself aloof from the toils. But, unfortunately, it was only for a time. A few days later she yielded to the temptation, listened to Khristenek's advice, and, in accordance with it, set out to meet her doom. About the middle of February, after having had her debts paid by Jenkins, from whom she also borrowed 2,000 ducats on her own account, she set out for Pisa, where Orlof was anxiously awaiting her. On her arrival, he received her with the greatest respect, had her magnificently lodged and entertained, and treated her as a royal personage. The suspicion she had felt at first with regard to his sincerity soon vanished, and before long she believed in him implicitly. A little later she learnt to love him also. Nor is that to be wondered at, for Orlof was one of the finest and handsomest men of his day, and a consummate master of the art of making love. Intriguer and adventuress as she was, the Princess was entirely taken in by his feigned attachment, and abandoned herself to him with as enthusiastic a devotion as if she had been an artless and inexperienced girl. Orlof played his part well, and refused her nothing. Relying on this, Khristenek was guilty of the unexampled baseness of asking her to obtain for him his promotion to the rank of colonel. She consented at once, and he received his commission from the hands of the unfortunate woman whom he had helped to betray, and whose doom he now felt was sealed.

After a few days, which she passed very happily, Orlof told her that he must leave her for a time. His useful ally, Sir John Dick, had written to tell him that his presence at Leghorn was absolutely necessary. The Princess tried to induce him to stay in Pisa, but he told her that it was impossible. "In that case," she said, "I will go to Leghorn with you." Orlof wished for nothing better. At last, he felt, she was on the point of being in his grasp.

The morning after her arrival at Leghorn, Orlof sent a message to Sir John Dick, to say that he was coming to dine with him; and in the afternoon he appeared with Admiral Greig and several other friends. With him came the Princess, who was received with the greatest apparent respect by the consul and his wife. In the evening she appeared at the opera, where she was naturally the centre of attraction. Every eye was turned towards her, and to almost every spectator her position must have seemed a most enviable one. They little knew that she was then standing on the threshold of a dungeon.

The next morning the English consul entertained his Russian friends at breakfast. The Princess was the queen of the feast, every one striving to do her honor, and none, it is said, more than Lady Dick and the wife of Admiral Greig. After breakfast the conversation turned on the subject of the Russian ships, and the Princess expressed a desire to see them. Orlof suggested that she should pay his vessel a visit, and she consented at once. The Admiral's barge was got ready, and the whole party embarked in it. In a short time Orlof had the delight of seeing his victim set foot upon the deck of his flag-ship.

It was a beautiful day. The waters of the bay were calm and bright, and the whole spectacle offered to the poor adventuress was very gay and enlivening. The people flocked to the shore in crowds expecting to see the fleet execute some of the manœuvres to which Orlof had accustomed them, and pleasure-boats came off to the ships in numbers. The Russian vessels were decked out with flags, their officers appeared on deck in full uniform, their crews manned the yards, and, amidst the roar of cannon and the cheering of the sailors, the doomed woman was received on board the vessel of her betrayer.

She was in high spirits, and thoroughly enjoyed the brilliant spectacle got up in her honor. A little time passed, and then the vessels began to manoeuvre. The Princess stood looking on in silence. Suddenly she heard a harsh voice demanding from her Polish followers their swords. She turned, and saw that Orlof and Greig had disappeared, and that in their place stood a file of soldiers under arms, whose commanding officer was in the act of arresting her friends.

"What is the meaning of this?" she asked.

"You are arrested by order of the Empress," was the reply.

The terrible truth suddenly flashed upon her mind. She fainted away, and during her state of insensibility she was carried down to the cabin. Her followers were removed to another vessel.

When she recovered her senses, and asked for Orlof, she was told that he also was a prisoner, and was thus induced to believe that he was sharing her fate. She fully trusted in him and in his love for her, and he was anxious that she should not be undeceived, for he feared that she might commit suicide if she lost all hope, and he was very desirous of gratifying Catharine by providing her with a living victim. Meanwhile the news of her imprisonment had spread far and wide, and the greatest indignation was produced by it in Leghorn. Some of the boats which surrounded the Russian ships, in spite of the threats of the sentries, got near enough to the Admiral's vessel to enable their occupants to see the pale face of the unfortunate prisoner at one of the cabin windows. The story of Orlof's audacity and treachery became known at Pisa and at Florence, and the Grand Duke of Tuscany protested vigorously against the act of violence committed within his realm. But the Russian Court paid no attention to his protests.

The day after her arrest Orlof went to see Sir John Dick, and asked for some books for the Princess to read. He looked pale and excited, said the English consul afterwards, — and he well might be. The next day the Russian fleet put to sea, but Orlof set off for St. Petersburg by land. This was in the second week of March, 1775.

Before very long the fleet arrived off Plymouth, and remained at anchor there for some little time. It was during this stay in English waters that the poor woman whom Orlof had betrayed first learnt his perfidy. Up to that moment she had remained tolerably calm, always hoping that he would manage to rescue her. But at last, while the vessel lay in Plymouth harbor, the full truth was revealed to her, and she was made aware that Orlof's love for her had been feigned throughout; that he had all along been merely leading her on to her fate, and that he had now gone to Russia in order to claim his reward for having ensnared her. And this was the man who had professed such devotion to her, whom she had so fondly, so blindly loved. After the first stunning influence of the shock had passed away, she made a desperate attempt to escape. An English vessel was lying alongside the Russian man-of-war on board of which she was confined, and she tried, but tried in vain, to get to it. Then she attempted to fling herself into the sea, and was only withheld from doing so by force. On two or three different occasions she tried to drown herself, and at last Admiral Greig was obliged to quit Plymouth Roads sooner than he had intended, so nervous was he about the proceedings of his now desperate prisoner.

On the 29th of April the Russian fleet reached the Sound, and on the 22d of May cast anchor off Cronstadt. On the 4th of June an officer named Tolstoi was sent for by the Governor of St. Petersburg, Field-Marshal Galitsin, and, having been sworn to eternal secrecy on a copy of the Gospels, was sent to Cronstadt to receive Admiral Greig's prisoner, and to convey her to the Petropavlovsky fortress at St. Petersburg.

Silently, by night, the vessel which bore Tolstoi on his errand dropped down to Cronstadt. During the ensuing day that officer remained in concealment on board the Admiral's flag-ship. The following night, while all on board the surrounding shipping and all the inhabitants of the neighboring shores were fast asleep, his vessel silently made its way back up the stream to St. Petersburg. Before the sun rose on the 6th of June Tolstoi had handed his prisoner over to the commandant of the Petropavlovsky fortress, who conducted her to one of the casemates in the Alexief ravelin.

During the month of June the nights are delicious at St. Petersburg. The air is full of a kind of magic light, and long after the sun has sunk beneath the horizon, and long before it reappears, the sky is tinged with delicate pink and amber hues on which the eye is never tired of gazing. Seen from the opposite side of the river, the waters of which are bright with reflected light and color, the fortress, with its long, low walls and its tall and graceful spire, rises dark against the eastern sky. Very dark and dreary it must have seemed then to that unfortunate woman, who, just as the sunlight began to fall on the gilded domes and spires of the sleeping city, passed within the granite walls of that prison-house from which she was destined never to emerge.

As soon as Catharine heard that her enemy was at last in her power, she ordered her to be subjected to a close examination, in hopes that some light might be thrown upon the intrigues with which she had been connected, and the supposed conspirators of whom she had been the tool or the ally. Accordingly Prince Galitsin examined and cross-examined her and her fellow-prisoners, — for her Polish followers were also lodged in the fortress, though not allowed access to her, — but without arriving at any satisfactory result. She maintained that she did not know who her parents were, that she had been at first brought up in Kiel, but at nine years old was taken away into the interior of Russia, where some one gave her poison, from the effects of which she suffered for more than a year; that she was then sent to Bagdad, where a rich Persian took charge of her till she was eleven, when she was removed to Ispahan, where she passed under the care of a Persian prince, who told her that she was the daughter of the late Empress Elizabeth of Russia. That at the age of seventeen the Prince took her to Russia, and thence to Germany and England. That she spent two years with him in London, and afterwards went to Paris, and that she soon afterwards met the Prince of Limburg, to whom she became betrothed.

All these statements she repeated many times, and it was found impossible to obtain any other story from her. This obstinacy on her part so greatly irritated the Empress that she wrote to Galitsin, telling him to have recourse to "rigorous measures" in his treatment of the prisoner. Accordingly, he gave orders that she should be put upon prison fare, and have only just as much of that as was necessary to sustain life; that her servant-maid should be denied access to her, and that an officer and two soldiers should be stationed day and night in her cell. These orders were carried into effect. For two days and two nights she underwent the indignity of being continually watched by guards, who never quitted her for a moment. All that time, too, she passed without taking food; for the gruel and cabbage-soup, which were served up to her in wooden bowls, were so revolting that she could not touch them. Meantime her health became rapidly worse; the cough from which she had been suffering for some time increased, and she began to spit blood. At last, by signs, she managed to explain that she wished to send a letter to the Governor, and writing materials were supplied to her. On receiving her letter, which contained a pathetic appeal to his feelings and those of the Empress, Galitsin paid her a visit, and again tried to extract some information from her as to her accomplices, but without success, although he went so far as to threaten her with "extreme measures." On leaving her cell he told her that she must not expect any mitigation of the hardships she had lately endured, though in reality his heart was touched by her sufferings.

Galitsin was a man of more than usual kindness, and could not bear to see a young and attractive woman — one, moreover, accustomed to an easy and luxurious life — exposed to such sufferings and such indignities as she had to undergo. She was also evidently in a state of such physical and mental prostration, that her life did not seem likely to be much prolonged; and so, in spite of the distinct commands of the Empress, he found himself incapable of continuing the "rigorous measures" which had proved so fruitless. Before quitting the fortress he gave orders that the severity of her treatment should be mitigated, and that the sentries should no longer be stationed inside her room.

Meantime her two Polish fellow-prisoners had been examined by Galitsin, and every means taken to obtain some useful confession from them. One of them, Domanski by name, declared that it was merely love for her that had made him follow in her train, and that even now, if she would marry him, he should consider himself the happiest of men, even though he had to spend the rest of his life in a prison. Some hope seems to have been held out to him of the possibility of such marriage, and Galitsin suggested the idea to the Princess. — if we may be allowed still to give her that title; but she treated it with contempt, saying that Domanski was far too contemptible and uneducated a man for her to think of as a husband, even if she were not bound by her plighted troth to the Prince of Limburg. Galitsin then tried to obtain a confession from her by promising that, if she would say what her origin really was, she should be allowed to go back to her betrothed in Germany. For a time she seemed to waver in her denial of all knowledge of her history, and promised to send Galitsin a full account of herself; but when the paper which he thought would contain it arrived, there was no new information in it. Whether she really had none to give, or whether she distrusted Galitsin's promises, is not known. All that is certain is, that nothing more was ever learnt from her respecting her former career.

About this time, tradition states, Orlof came to see her, and a stormy interview ensued. The story is not at all probable, and it is to be hoped that it is not true. But what is certain is, that a little later in the month of November, she bore her betrayer a son. The child was christened in the prison, and it is said that it thrived, and eventually grew up to man's estate, and became an officer of rank in the Russian service. Anyhow, its mother did not long survive its birth. Her strength had altogether given way under her sufferings. For she had suffered much, and yet had been treated with much of the old severity. The soldiers had been brought back into her room, in spite of the pathetic appeals she made to the Empress, saying, as she well might, that the constant presence of men beside her "shocked her womanly nature." The consumption which had seized on her made rapid progress, her cough became worse and worse, and at last she lay down to die. A priest was sent for, who exhorted her, as upon the threshold of the grave, to make full confession of her sins against the Empress. But she still maintained that in this respect she was not to blame, and the priest at last left her without giving her absolution.

On the 15th of December, 1775, she died, carrying with her to the grave the secret of her birth. The next day the soldiers, some of whom had stood by her bedside till she drew her last breath, dug a deep hole in the ground within the walls of the fortress, and buried in it the body of the unfortunate adventuress. No funeral rites were performed over her grave. Catharine's revenge was complete.

Two years later occurred the terrible inundation of 1777, when the Neva rose to such a height that the casemates of the Petropavlovsky fortress were submerged under its waters. In spite of the secrecy which had been preserved with respect to the so-called Princess, rumors had got about that a daughter of the Empress Elizabeth was kept in confinement in the fortress, and after the inundation a story gained credence that she had been forgotten or intentionally deserted in her cell, and so had been drowned by the rising tide.

Two years more passed by, and the cell in which the adventuress died received another inmate. This was a young Guardsman named Vin'ky, who had become compromised in some political conspiracy, and who was ultimately exiled to Orenburg. While occupying his prison-quarters in the fortress, he amused himself by deciphering the inscriptions which previous inmates had left on the walls. One day he observed some writing on one of the panes in the window, and on closer inspection he made out the words, "O mio Dio!" which had evidently been scratched with a diamond on the glass. The warder told him that they must have been the handiwork of a young and beautiful lady who had occupied the cell four years before. This was the last trace which remained of her existence, unless a little mound be taken into consideration, which, as late as the year 1828, was still visible in the garden of the fortress, and which was said to mark the spot where, at the end of her restless and wasted career, Orlof's victim at last found repose. Who she really was, and what was the secret of her early life, are problems which to this day remain unsolved.

FLATTERY.

NOTHING is so delightful as flattery. To hear and believe pleasant fictions about one's self is a temptation too seductive for weak mortals to resist, as the typical legends of all mythologies and the private histories of most individuals show: in consequence of which home truths, to one used to ideal portraiture, come like draughts of "bitter cup" to the dram-drinker. And flattery is dram-drinking:

and yet not quite without good uses to balance its undeniable evil, if only it be exaggeration, and not wholly falsehood; that is, if it assumes as a matter of course the presence of virtues potential to the character, but not always active, and praises for what might be if the person chose to live up to his best. Many a weak brother, and weaker sister, and all children, can be heartened into goodness by a little bit of judicious praise or flattery, where ponderous exhortation and grave reproof would fail; just as a heavily-laden horse can be coaxed uphill when the whip and spur would lead to unimely jibbing. If, on the contrary, the flattery is of a kind that makes you believe yourself an exceptionally fine fellow when you are only "mean trash," — a king of men when you are nothing better or nobler than a moral nigger, — making you satisfied with yourself when at your worst, then it is an unmitigated evil; it then becomes dram-drinking of a very poisonous kind, which sooner or later does for your soul what unlimited blue ruin does for your body. But this is what we generally mean when we speak of flattery, and this is the kind which has got such a deservedly bad name with moralists of all ages.

The flatteries of men to women, and those of women to men, are very different in kind and direction. Men flatter women for what they are, — for their beauty, their grace, their sweetness, their charmingness in general; while a woman will flatter a man for what he does, — for his speech in the House last night, of which she understands little; for his book, of which she understands less; or for his pleading, of which she understands nothing at all. Not that this signifies much on either side.

The most unintellectual little woman in the world has brains enough to look up in your face sweetly, and breathe out something that sounds like "beautiful — charming — so clever," vaguely sketching the outline of a hymn of praise to which your own vanity supplies the verses. For you must have an exceptionally strong head if you can rate the sketch at its real value, and see for yourself how utterly meaningless it is. You may be the most mystical poet of the day, suggesting to your acutest readers grave doubts as to your own power of comprehending yourself; or you may be the most subtle metaphysician, to follow whom in your labyrinth of reasoning requires perhaps the rarest order of brains to be met with; but you will nevertheless believe any narrow-browed, small-headed woman who tells you in a low, sweet voice, with a gentle uplifting of her eyes, and a suggestive curve of the lip, that she has found you both intelligible and charming, and that she quite agrees with you, and shares your every sentiment. If she further tells you that all her life long she has thought in exactly the same way, but was wholly unable to express herself, and that you have now supplied her want and translated into words her vague ideas, and if she says this with a reverential kind of effusiveness, you are done for, so far as your critical power goes; and should some candid friend, whom she has not flattered, tell you with brutal frankness that your bewitching little flatterer has neither the brains nor the education to understand you, you will set him down as a slanderer, spiteful and malignant, and call his candor envy, because he has not been so lucky as yourself. The most subtle form of flattery is that which asks your advice, with the pretence of needing it, — your advice, particularly, — yours above that of all other persons, as the wisest, best, and most useful to be obtained. This, too, is a form that belongs rather to women in their relations with men, than the converse; though sometimes men will pretend to want a woman's advice about their love affairs, and will perhaps make believe to be guided by it. Not unfrequently, however, asking one woman's opinion and advice about another is a masked manner of love-making on its own account; though sometimes it may be done for flattery only, when there are reasons. Of course not all advice-asking is flattery; but when intended only to please, and not meant to be genuine, it is perhaps one of the most potent instruments of the art to be met with.

But if seeking advice is the most subtle form of flattery, the most intoxicating is that which pretends to moral elevation or reform by your influence. The reformation of a rake is a work which no woman alive could be found to resist if the rake offered it to her as his last chance of salvation; and to lead a pretty sinner back to the ways of picturesque virtue by his own influence only is a temptation to self-reliance which no man could refuse, a flattery which not Diogenes nor Zeno himself could see through. The pretensions of any one else would be laughed at cruelly enough; but this is one of the things where personal experience and critical judgment never go in harness together, — one of the manifestations of flattery which would overcome the calmest, and bewilder the wisest. Priests of all denominations are especially open to this kind of flattery; not only from pretty sinners who have gone openly out of the right line, but from quite comely and respectable maids and matrons, who have lived blamelessly so far as the broad moral distinctions go, yet who have not lived the awakened life until roused thereunto by this peculiarly favored minister. It is a tremendous trial of a man's discernment when such flattery is offered to him. How much of this pretended awakening is real? How much of this sudden spiritual insight is true, and not a mere phrasing, artfully adopted for pleasantness only? These are the cases where we most want that famous spear of Ithuriel to help us to a right estimate, for they are beyond the power of any ordinary man to determine. But if priests are subject to these delusions of flattery on the one hand, they know how to practise them on the other. Take away the flattery which, mingled with occasional rebuke, forms the great ministerial spur, and both Revivalism and Ritualism would flag like flowers without "the gentle dews." Scolded for their faults in dress, for their vanity, extravagance, and other feminine vices, are not women also flattered as the favorites of Heaven and of the Church? Are they not told that they are the lilies of the ecclesiastical garden? the divinely appointed missionaries for the preservation of virtue and godly truth in the world? without whom the coarser race of men would be given over to inconceivable spiritual evil, to infidelity and all immorality. We may be very sure of this, that if humanity, and especially feminine humanity, were not flattered as well as chastened, clerical influence would not last for a day.

There is one kind of flattery which is common to both men and women, and that is the expressed preference of sex. Thus, when men want to flatter women, they say how infinitely they prefer their society to that of their own sex; and women will say the same to men. Or, if they do not say it, they will act it. See a set of women congregated together without the light of a manly countenance among them. They may talk to each other certainly; and one or two will sit away together and discuss their private affairs with animation; but the great mass of them are only half vitalized while waiting the advent of the men to rouse them into life and the desire to please. No man who goes up first, and earlier than he was expected, from the dinner-table, can fail to see the change which comes over those wearied, limp, indifferent-looking faces and figures as soon as he enters the room. He is the prince whose kiss woke up the sleeping beauty, and all her court; and can any one say that this is not flattery of the most delightful kind? To be the Pygmalion even for a moment, and for the weakest order of soul-giving, is about the greatest pleasure that a man can know, if he is susceptible to the finer kinds of flattery.

Some women, indeed, not only show their preference for men, but openly confess it, and confess at the same time to a lofty contempt or abhorrence for the society of women. These are generally women who are, or have been, beauties, or who have literary and intellectual pretensions, or who despise babies and condemn housekeeping, and profess themselves unable to talk to other women because of their narrowness and stupidity. But for the most part they are women who, by their beauty or their position, have been used to receive extra attention from men, and thus their preference is not flattery so much as exigence. Women who have been in India, or wherever else women are in the minority in society, are of this kind; and nothing is more amazing to them when they first come home than the attentions which a certain style of Englishwoman pays to men, instead of demanding and receiving attentions from them. These are those sweet, humble, caressing women who flatter you with every word and look, but whose flattery is nothing but a pretty dress put on for show, and taken off when the show is done with. Anything will do for an occasion with some people. Why, the way in which certain women will caress a child before you is an implied flattery, and they know it. If only they would be careful to carry these pretty ante-nuptial ways into the home, where nothing is to be gained by them but a humdrum husband's happiness! But too often the woman whose whole attitude was one of flattering devotion before her end was gained gives up every shred of that which she had in such profusion when she has attained her object, and lets the home go absolutely bare of that which was so beautiful and seductive in the ball-room and the flirting corner. Some men, however, want more home flattery to keep them tolerably happy and up to the mark than any woman with a soul to be saved by truth can give. Poets and artists are of this kind, — men who literally live on praise, without which they droop and can do nothing. With them it is absolutely necessary that the people with whom they are associated should be of appreciative and sympathetic natures; but the burden comes heavy when they want, as they generally do, so much more than this. For, in truth, they want flattery in excess of sympathy; and if they do not get it they hold themselves as the victims of an unkind fate, and fill the world with the echo of their woes. This is nine tenths of the cause why great geniuses are so often unhappy in married life. They demand more, and more incessant, flattery than can be kept up by one woman, unless she has not only an exceptional power of love, but also an exceptional power of self-suppression; they think that by virtue of their genius they are entitled to a Benjamin's mess of devotion, double that given to other men; and when they get only Judah's share, they cry out that they are ill-used, and make the world think them ill-used as well. But though a little home-flattery helps the home life immeasurably, and greases the creaking domestic wheels more than anything else can, a great deal is just the most pernicious thing that can be offered.

The belief prevalent in some families that all the very small and commonplace members thereof are wonders and greater than any one else, — that no one is so clever as Harry, no one so pretty as Julia, that Amy's red hair is of a more brilliant gold than can be found elsewhere, and Edward's mathematical abilities about equal to Newton's, — this belief, nourished and acted on, is sure to turn out an insufferable collection of prigs and self-conceited damsels, who have to be brought down innumerable pegs before they find their own level. But we often see this especially in country places where there is not much society to give a standard for comparative measurement; and we know that those fond parents and doting relatives are blindly and diligently sowing seeds of bitterness for a future harvest of sorrow for their darlings. These young people must be made to suffer if they are to be of any good whatever in the world; and finding their level, after the exalted position which they have been supposed to fill so long, and being pelted with the unsavory missiles of truth in exchange for all the incense they have received, will be suffering enough. But it has to be gone through; this being one of the penalties to which the unwisdom of love so often subjects us. The flattery met with in society is not often very harmful save to coarse or specially simple natures. You must be either one or the other to be able to believe it. Lady Morgan was perhaps the most unblushing and excessive of the tribe of social flatterers; but that was her engine, the ladder by which she did a good part of her climbing. We must not confound with this kind of flattery the impulsive expression of praise or love which certain outspoken people indulge in to the last. You may as well try to dam up Niagara as to make some folks reticent in any direction. And when one of this kind sees anything that he or she likes, the praise has to come out with superlatives if the creature is prone to exaggeration. But this is not flattery; it is merely want of reticence, and a certain childlikeness which lasts with some to the end, but which very few understand when they see it, and which subjects its possessor to misrepresentation and unfriendly jibes, as soon as his or her back is turned, and the explosion of exaggerated praise is discussed critically by the uninterested part of the audience.

NIGHT ON THE MINCH.

"SHE is a poor thing, a bit toy!" said the skipper of the Lowland trader, regarding the little yacht Tern from the deck of his big vessel, while we lay in Canna Harbor. "She's no' for these seas at all; and the quicker ye are awa' hame wi' her round the Rhu, ye'll be the wiser. She should never hae quitted the Clyde."

Set by the side of the trader's great hull, she certainly did look a "toy": so tiny, so slight, with her tapering mast and slender spars. To all our enumeration of her good qualities, the skipper merely replied with an incredulous "oomph," and assured us that, were she as "good as gold," the waters of the Minch would drown her like a rat if there was any wind at all. Few yachts of thrice her tonnage, and twice her beam, ever cared to show their sails on the outside of Skye. Why, even the skipper, in his great vessel, which was like a rock in the water, had seen such weather out there as had made his hair stand on end; and he launched into a series of awful tales, showing how he had driven from the point of Heat to Isle Ornsay up to his neck in the sea, how a squall off Dunvegan Head had carried away his topmast, broken his mainsail boom, and swept his decks clean of boats and rubbish, all at one fell crash; and numberless other terrific things, all tending to show that we were likely to get into trouble. When he heard that we actually purposed crossing the Minch to Boisdale, and beating up along the shores of the Long Isle as far as Stornoway, he set us down as madmen at once, and condescended to no more advice. After that, till the moment we sailed, he regarded us from the side of his vessel in a solemn sort of way, as if we were people going to be hanged.

He frightened us a little. The Wanderer, who had planned the expedition, looked at the skipper, — or the Viking, as we got in the habit of calling him, because he was n't like one. The Viking, who had never before ventured with his yacht beyond the Clyde, was pale, and only wanted encouragement to turn and fly. But Hamish Shaw, the pilot, setting his lips together, delivered himself so violently against flight, vowed so stanchly that having come thus far we must proceed, or be forevermore branded as pretenders, and finally swore so roundly by his reputation as a seaman to carry us safely through all perils, that even the Viking shook his horrent locks and became for the instant nearly as courageous as he looked. "Nothing," said the Viking, in a glow of reckless ardor, "nothing gives me so much pleasure as tearing through it, with the wind blowing half a gale, and the boat's side buried to the cockpit coaming."

We had all great confidence in Hamish Shaw, for two very good reasons; firstly, because he had long been accustomed to sailing all sorts of boats in these waters; and secondly, because he was steady as a rock, and cool as snow in times of peril. Again and again, during the voyage, did we find reason to bless ourselves that we had such a man on board. He was fond of talk, and had much to say well worth listening to, but at critical moments he was like the sphinx, — only rather more active. To see him at the helm, with his eye on the waves, steadily helping the little craft through a tempestuous sea, bringing her bow up to the billows, and burying it in them whenever they would have drowned her broadside; or sharply watching the water to windward, with the mainsail sheet in his hand, shaking her through the squalls off a mountainous coast, — these were things worth seeing, things that made one proud of the race. As for the Viking, though he had considerable experience in sailing in smooth water, and though he was a very handy fellow in the ship's carpenter line, he was nowhere when it began to blow. He had been subject to palpitation of the heart for many years, and it always troubled him most when he was most wanted; making him very pale, feeble, and fluttering. He took a great deal of whiskey to cure his complaint, but it had merely the effect of exciting him without relieving his unfortunate symptoms. The Wanderer could do a little in an emergency, but his nautical knowledge was very slight, just enabling him to distinguish one rope from another if he were not particularly hurried in his movements. The cook was a lady, and of course could be of no use on deck in bad weather: though, as Hamish Shaw expressed it, she showed a man's spirit throughout the voyage.

In plain point of fact, there was only one sailor on board; and as he had only one pair of hands, and could not be everywhere at the same moment, it was a miracle that the Tern escaped destruction.

As the distance from Canna to Loch Boisdale, the nearest point in the outer Hebrides, was about thirty miles, all quite open water, without the chance of any kind of harbor, and as the Tern, even with a fair wind, could not be expected to run more than six miles an hour in a sea, it was advisable to choose a very good day indeed for the passage. As usual in such cases, we began by being over-cautious, and ended by being over-impatient. This day was too calm, and that day was too windy. We ended by doing two things which we had commenced by religiously avowing not to do, — that is to say, never to start for a long passage except at early morning, and never to venture on such a passage without a fair wind. We weighed anchor at about two o'clock in the afternoon, with the wind blowing northwest, — nearly dead in our teeth.

But it was a glorious day, sunny and cheerful; the clouds were high and white, and the waters were sparkling and flashing, far as the eye could see. As soon as the wind touched the white wings of the little Tern, she slipped out of the harbor with rapid flight, plunged splashing out at the harbor mouth, and was soon swimming far out in the midst of the spray, happy, eager, tilting the waves from her breast like a swimmer in his strength. Next to the rapturous enjoyment of having wings one's self, or being able to sport among the waves like a great northern diver, is the pleasure of sailing during such weather in a boat like the Tern.

Canna never looked more beautiful than to-day, — her cliffs wreathed into wondrous forms and tinted with deep ocean dyes, and the slopes above rich and mellow in the light. But what most fascinates the eye is the southern coast of Skye, lying on the starboard bow as we are beating northward. The Isle of Mist is clear to-day, not a vapor lingers on the heights; and although it must be admitted that much of its strange and eerie beauty is lost, still, we have a certain gentle loveliness in its place. Can that be Skye, the deep coast full of rich warm under-shadow, the softly tinted hills, "nakedly visible without a cloud," sleeping against the "dim sweet harebell color" of the heavens? Where is the thunder-cloud, where are the weeping shadows of the cirrus, where are the white flashes of cataracts through the black smoke of rain on the mountain-side? Are these the Cuchullins, — the ashen-gray heights turning to solid amber at the peaks, the dry seams of the torrents softening in the sunlight to golden shades? Why, Blaavin with hooked forehead, would be bare as Primrose Hill, save for one slight white wreath of vapor, that, glittering with the hues of the prism, floats gently away to die in the delicate blue. Dark are the headlands, yet warmly dark, projecting into the sparkling sea and casting summer shades. Skye is indeed transformed, yet its beauty is still spiritual, still it keeps the faint feeling of the glamour. It looks like witch-beauty, wondrous and unreal. You feel that an instant may change it, and so it may and will. Ere we have sailed many miles more, Skye will be clouded over with a misty woe, her face will be black and wild, she will sob in the midst of the darkness with the voice of falling rain and eerie winds.

We were flying along swiftly, and the breeze was heading us less and less. The sea still sparkled, far as the eye could see, a flashing surface, —

"Dappled o'er with shadows flung From many a brooding cloud":

the wool-white cloud above, the soft shadow below. There was no danger, and the Viking was like, a lion. All went merry as a marriage bell. Picture after picture rose up, grew into perfect loveliness, and faded like a fairy palace into the air. Now it was Macleod's Maidens, the three sister peaks on the western coast of Skye, linked together by a dim rainbow, and glimmering brightly through a momentary shower; again, it was the far-off mouth of Loch Bracadale, rich with the darkest purple tints, with a real red-sailed fishing-boat in the foreground to bring out the picture, just as Turner would have placed it on the canvas; and still again, it was the Cuchullins, already wreathed in mist, magnified to still more gigantic size by their own darkness, and looking as forlorn as if no sunlight had ever fallen on their hoary brows.

But more frequently, with keener interest, with more anxious longing, our eyes were turned westward; to the far-off isles whither we were bound. We could see them better now, misted over by distance, — part of the Barra highland, the three great hills of Uist, and, dimmest of all, the high hills of Harris. As the vapors shifted on the coast, the shape of the land changed. What had looked like mountains drifted away before the wind; what had seemed a cloud, outlined itself darkly and more darkly; and, strange to say, the whole coast seemed, as we drew nearer, to retreat further away, inasmuch that when we had beaten ten or twelve miles of the actual distance to Loch Boisdale, the outer Hebrides looked as distant as ever, and we almost thought there must have been some mistake in our calculation of the number of miles across.

It was a strange feeling, riding out there in the open Minch in that little boat, and knowing that a storm, if it did catch us there, would leave us little time to say our prayers. The vessel was too small and crank to lie to, and running before the wind she would have drowned herself in no time. True, we had extemporized a kind of wooden scuttle for the cockpit, which might be of some service in a sea, and did actually save us from some peril; but the fact was, the boat, as Hamish Shaw expressed it, wanted "body," and would never live out bad weather in the open. It was a wonder Hamish ever accompanied us at all, — he had such a profound contempt for the Tern, quite agreeing with the skipper in Canna that she was merely a toy, a plaything. We suppose, however, that he had confidence in himself, and knew that if any one could save her at a pinch, he could.

We had started so late that, before we were half-way across, it was growing quite dark. It promised to be a good night, however. The worst of our situation just then was, that the wind was beginning to fail, and we were making very little way through the rough roll of the sea.

One certainly did not feel quite comfortable, tumbling out there in the deepening twilight, while the land on either side slowly mingled itself with the clouds. After taking our bearings by the compass, and getting a drop of something warm, we could do nothing but sit and wait for events. The Viking was beginning to feel unwell with his old complaint. Shivering he looked to windward, seeing all sorts of nameless horrors. Twenty times, at least, he asked Hamish what sort of a night it promised to be? Twice he rushed down to examine the weather-glass, an aneroid, and, to his horror, it was slowly sinking. Then he got lights and buried himself among the charts, feebly gazing at a blank space of paper labelled "The Minch." At last, unable to disguise it any longer, he began to throw out dark hints that we were doomed; that it was madness sailing at night; that he had seen it from the beginning, and should not have ventured so far; that he knew from the color of the sky that we should have a storm in the night; and that, only let him get safe back "round the Rhu," no temptation on earth should tempt him again beyond the Crinan Canal.

It is to be feared that Hamish Shaw was rather short with the Viking, and attributed his trepidation to ignoble causes. Hamish Shaw was in his glory. He loved sailing at night, and had been constantly urging us to it. He had learned the habit as a fisherman, it was associated with much that was wildest and noblest in his life, and he was firmly persuaded that he could see his way anywhere in the waters, by dark as well as by day. Owl-like, wakeful and vigilant, he sat at the helm, with his weather-beaten face looming through his matted ringlets, his black pipe set between his teeth, and his eyes looking keenly to windward. He was not a sentimental man; he did not care much for "scenery." But do you think there was no dreamy poetry in his soul; that he had no subtle pleasure, concealed almost from himself, as the heaven bared its glittering breast of stars, and the water that darkened beneath glimmered back the light and the wind fell softly, till we could hear the deep breathing of the sea itself? What memories drifted across his brain; of wild nights at the herring-fishing, of rain, snow, and wind; of tender nights in his highland home, when he went courting in highland fashion to the lassie's chamber-door! He is a strange study, Hamish Shaw. To hear him speak directly of any scene he has visited, you would not credit him with any insight. But he sees more than he knows. His life is too full to take in separate effects, or wonder anew. What light he throws for us on old thoughts and superstitions, on tender affections of the race! His speech is full of water and wind. He uses a fine phrase as naturally as nature fashions a bud or a leaf. He speaks in natural symbols, as freely as he uses an oar. His clear fresh vision penetrates even into the moral world, quite open and fearless even there, where the best of us become purblind.

We have tried again and again, for our own amusement, to reproduce a little of Shaw's English. He is a true Gael, and is speaking a foreign tongue, acquired in early youth. His language is at once remarkable for its obscurity and the use of big words, and yet for a strange felicity of verbal touch. He attaches a certain meaning to words, and tries hard to be explicit. For example, speaking once of the Gaelic, and becoming warm in its praise: "The Gaelic," he said, "is a kind of guttural language, a principal and positive language: a language, d'ye see, full of knowledge and essence." It would be difficult to find anything obscurer than the beginning of the explanation, or more felicitous than its conclusion. The one word "essence" is perfect in its terse expression of meaning.

"I'm of the opinion," said Hamish, quietly surveying the heavens, "that the night will be good. Yon's a clear sky to windward, and there's nae kerry. I would a heap sooner sail a craft like this by night than by day, the weather is mair settled between gloaming and sunrise; and you have one great advantage; the light is aye gaining on ye, instead o' the darkness."

"But, Shaw, man," cried the Viking, "we are creeping closer and closer to the land, and it will be a fearful business making it out in the mirk!"

Shaw shrugged his shoulders.

"If we canna see it, we maun just smell it," he said. "It's useless to fash your head."

"A coast sown with rocks as thick as if they had been shaken out of a pepper-box! Reefs here, danger everywhere! And not a beacon nearer than Rhu Hunish lighthouse! O my God!"

And the Viking wailed.

By this time the summer night had quite closed in; Canna and Skye had long faded out of sight behind, but we could still make out the form of the land ahead. The wind was rising again, and blowing gently on our quarter, so we bade fair to make the coast of the Long Island sooner than was advisable. Still, it would have been injudicious to remain any longer than was necessary out in the open; for a storm might come on by morning, and seal our fate. The best plan was to creep to within a couple of miles of the land, and hang about until we had sufficient daylight to make out our situation. It was even possible, if it did not grow much darker, that we might be able to make out the mouth of Loch Boisdale in the night.

The Viking plunged below to the charts. To while away the time, the Wanderer began talking to the steersman about superstition. It was a fine eerie situation for a talk on that subject, and the still summer night, with the deep, dreary murmur of the sea, gathered powerfully on the imagination.

"Hamish," said the Wanderer, abruptly, "do you believe in ghosts?"

Hamish puffed his pipe leisurely for some time before replying.

"I'm of the opinion," he replied at last, beginning with the expression habitual to him, — "I'm of the opinion that there's strange things in the world. I never saw a ghost, and I don't expect to see one. If the Scripture says true — I mean the Scripture, no' the ministers — there has been ghosts seen before, and there may be now. The folk used to say there was a Ben-shee in Shipness Castle, a Ben-shee with white hair and a much like an old wife, and my father saw it with his own een before he died. They're curious people over in Barra, and they believe stranger things than that."

"In witchcraft, perhaps?"

"There's more than them believes in witchcraft. When I was a young man on board the Petrel (she's one of Middleton's fish-boats, and is over at Howth now) the winds were that wild, that there seemed sma' chance of winning hame before the new year. Weel, the skipper was a Skye man, and had great faith in an auld wife who lived alone up on the hillside; and without speaking a word to any o' us, he went up to bid wi' her for a fair wind. He crossed her hand wi' siller, and she told him to bury a live cat wi' its head to the airt wanted, and then to steal a spoon from some house, and get awa'. He buried the cat and he stole the spoon. It's curious, but sure as ye live, the wind changed that night into the north-west, and never shifted till the Petrel was in Tobermory."

"Once let me be the hero of an affair like that," cried the Wanderer, "and I'll believe in the devil forever after. But it was a queer process."

"The ways o' God are droll," returned Shaw, seriously. "Some say that in old times the witches made a causeway o' whales from Rhu Hunish to Dunvegan Head. There are auld wives o'er yonder yet, who hae the name of going out wi' the deil every night, in the shape o' blue hares, and I kenned a man who thought he shot one wi' a siller button. I dinna believe all I hear, but I dinna just disbelieve either. Ye've heard of the Evil Eye?"

"Certainly."

"When we were in Canna, I noticed a fine cow and calf standing by a house near the kirkyard, and I said to the wife as I passed (she was syning her pails at the door), 'Yon's a bonnie bit calf ye hae with the auld cow.' 'Aye,' says she, 'but I hope ye didna look at them o'er keen' — meaning, ye ken, that maybe I had the Evil Eye. I laughed and told her that was a thing ne'er belong't to me nor mine. That minds me of an auld wife near Loch Boisdale, who had a terrible bad name for killing kye and doing mischief on corn. She was gleed,* and had black hair. One day, when the folk were in kirk, she reached o'er her hand to a bairn that was lying beside her, and touched its cheek wi' her finger. Weel, that moment the bairn (it was a lassie and had red hair) began greeting and turning its head from side to side like folk in fever. It kept on sae for days. But at last anither woman, who saw what was wrang, recommended eight poultices o' kyeshairn (one every night) from the innermost kye i' the byre. They gied her the poultices, and the lassie got weel."

"That was as strange a remedy as the buried cat," observed the Wanderer; "but I did not know such people possessed the power of casting the trouble on human beings."

Hamish puffed his pipe, and looked quietly at the sky. It was some minutes before he spoke again.

"There was a witch family," he said at last, "in Loch Carron, where I was born and reared. They lived their lane close to the sea. There were three o' them, — the mither, a son, and a daughter. The mither had great lumps all o'er her arms, and sae had the daughter; but the son was a clear-hided lad, and he was the cleverest. Folk said he had the power o' healing the sick, but only in ae way, by transferring the disease to him that brought the message seeking help. Ane, I mind, a man was sent till him on horseback, bidding him come and heal a fisher who was up on the hill and like to dee. The warlock mounted his pony, and said to the man, 'Draw back a bit, and let me ride before ye.' The man kenning nae better, let him pass, and followed ahint. They had to pass through a glen, and in the middle of the glen an auld wife was standing at her door. When she saw the messenger riding ahint the warlock, she screeched out to him as loud as she could cry: 'Ride, ride, and reach the sick lad first, or ye're a dead man!' At that, the warlock looked black as thunder, and galloped his pony; but the messenger being better mounted, o'ertook him fast, and got first to the sick man's bedside. In the night the sick man died. Ye see, the warlock had nae power o' shifting the complaint but on him that brought the message, and no' on him if the warlock didna reach the house before the messenger."

Here the Viking emerged with the whiskey-bottle, and Hamish Shaw wet his lips. We were gently gliding along now, and the hills of Uist were still dimly visible. The deep roll of the sea would have been disagreeable, perhaps, to the uninitiated, but we were hardened. While the Viking sat by, gazing gloomily into the darkness, the Wanderer pursued his chat with Shaw, or, rather, incited the latter to further soliloquies.

"Do you know, Hamish," he said, slyly, "it seems to me very queer that Providence should suffer such pranks to be played, and should intrust such marvellous power to such wretched hands. Come, now; do you actually fancy that these things have happened?"

But Hamish Shaw was not the man to commit himself. He was a philosopher.

"I'm of the opinion," he replied, "that it would be wrong to be o'er positive. Providence does as queer things, whiles, as either man or woman. There was a strange cry, like the whistle of a bird, heard every night close to the cottage before Wattie Macleod's smack was lost on St. John's Point, and Wattie and his son were drowned; then it stoppit. Whiles it comes like a sheep crying, whiles like the sound o' pipes. I heard it mysel' when my brither Angus died. He had been awa' o'er the country and his horse had fallen and kickit him on the navel.

"But before he heard a word about it, the wife and I were on the road to Angus's house, and were coming near the burn that parted his house from mine. It was nicht, and bright moonlicht. The wife was heavy at the time, and suddenly she grippit me by the arm and whispered, 'Wheesh! do ye hear?' I listened, and at first I heard nothing, 'Wheesh! again!' says she; and then I heard it plain, — like the low blowing o' the bagpipes, slowly and sadly, wi' nae tune. 'O Hamish,' said the wife, 'wha can it be?' I said naething, but I felt my back all cold, and a sharp thread running through my heart. It followed us along as far as Angus's door, and then it went awa'. Angus was sitting by the fire; they had just brought him hame; and he told us o' the fall and the kick. He was pale, but didna think much was wrang wi' him, and talked quite cheerful and loud. The wife was sick and frightened, and they gave her a dram; they thought it was her trouble, for her time was near, but she was thinking o' the sign we had heard. Though we knew fine that Angus wouldna live, we didna dare to speak o' what we had heard. Going hame that nicht, we heard it again, and in a week he was lying in his grave."

The darkness, the hushed breathing of the sea, the sigh of the wind through the rigging, greatly deepened the effect of this tale. The Viking listened intently, as if he expected every moment to hear a similar sound presaging his own doom. Hamish Shaw showed no emotion. He told his tale as mere matter-of-fact, with no elocutionary effects, and kept his eye to windward all the time, literally looking out for squalls.

"For Heaven's sake," cried the Viking, "choose some other subject of conversation. We are in bad enough plight already, and don't want any more horrors."

"What! Afraid of ghosts?"

"No, dash it!" returned the Viking; "but, — but — as sure as I live, there's storm in yon sky!"

The look of the sky to windward was not improving; it was becoming smoked over with thick mist. Though we were now only a few miles off the Uist coast, the loom of the land was scarcely visible; the vapors peculiar to such coasts seemed rising and gradually wrapping everything in their folds. Still, as far as we could make out from the stars, there was no carry in the sky.

"I'll no' say," observed Hamish, taking in everything at a glance, "I'll no' say but there may be wind ere morning; but it will be wind off the shore, and we hae the hills for shelter."

"But the squalls! The squalls!" cried the Viking.

"The land is no' that high that ye need to be scared. Leave ye the vessel to me, and I'll tak' her through it snug. But we may as weel hae the third reef in the mainsail, and mak' things ready in case o' need."

This was soon done. The mainsail was reefed, and the second jib substituted for the large one; after a glance at the compass, Hamish again sat quiet at the helm.

"Barra," he said, renewing our late subject of talk, "is a great place for superstition, and sae is Uist. The folk are like weans, simply and kindly. There is a Ben-shee weel-ken'd at the head o' Loch Eynort, and another haunts one o' the auld castles o' the great Macneil o' Barra. I hae heard, too, that whiles big snakes wi' manes like horses come up into the fresh-water lakes and lie in wait to devour the flesh o' man. In a fresh-water loch at the Harris, there was a big beast like a bull, that came up ae day and ate half the body o' a lad when he was bathing. They tried to drain the loch to get at the beast, but there was o'er muckle water. Then they baited a great hook wi' the half o' a sheep, but the beast was o'er wise to bite. Lord, it was a droll fishing! They're a curious people. But doe ye no' think, if the sea and the lochs were drainit dry, there would be all manner o' strange animals that nae man kens the name o'? There's a kind of water-world. Nae man kens what it's like, — for the drowned canna see, and if they could see, they couldna speak. Ay!" he added, suddenly changing the current of his thoughts, "ay! the wind's rising, and we're no' far off the shore, for I can smell the land."

By what keenness of sense Hamish managed to "smell the land," we had no time just then to inquire; for all our wits were employed in looking after the safety of the Tern. She was bowling along under three-reefed mainsail and storm-jib, and was getting just about as much as she could bear. With the rail under to the cockpit, the water lapping heavily against the coaming, and ever and anon splashing right over in the cockpit itself, she made her way fast through the rising sea. In vain we strained our eyes to see the shore: —

"The blinding mist came down and hid the land,
As far as eye could see!"

All at once, the foggy vapors peculiar to the country had steeped everything in darkness; we could guess from the wind where the land lay, but were at a loss to tell how near. What with the whistling wind, the darkness, the surging sea, we felt bewildered and amazed.

The Wanderer looked at his watch, and it was past midnight. Even if the fog cleared off, it would not be safe to take Loch Boisdale without good light, and there was nothing for it but to beat about till sunrise. This was a prospect not at all comfortable, for we might even then be in the neighborhood of dangerous rocks, and, if the wind rose any higher, there was nothing for it but running before the wind, God knew whither. Meantime, it was determined to stand off a little to the open, in dread of coming to over-close quarters with the shore.

Hamish sat at the helm, stern and imperturbable. We knew by his silence that he was anxious, but he expressed no anxiety whatever. Ever and anon he slipped down his hand on the deck to leeward, feeling how near the water was to the cockpit, and as there seemed considerable danger of foundering in the heavy sea, he speedily agreed with us that it would be wise to close over the cockpit hatches. That done, all was done that hands could do, save holding the boat with the helm steady and close to the wind, — a task which Hamish fulfilled to perfection. Indeed, we were in no slight danger from squalls, for the wind was off the land, and nothing saved us, when struck by heavy gusts, but the firmness and skill of the helmsman. He had talked about smelling the land, but it is certain that he seemed to smell the wind. Almost before a squall touched her, the Tern was standing up to it, tight and firm, when ever so slight a falling off might have stricken us over to the mast, and perhaps (for the cockpit hatches were a small protection) foundered us in the open sea.

The Viking was a wreck by this time, too weak even to scream out his prophecies of doom, but lying anticipating his fate in his fore-castle hammock, with the grog at his side and his eyes closed despairingly against all the terrors of the scene. The cook was lying in the cabin, very sick, in that happy frame of mind when it is indifferent whether we float on, or go to the bottom. The Wanderer, drenched through, clung close beside the pilot, and strained his eyes against wind and salt spray into the darkness. It would be false to say that he felt comfortable, but as false to say that he felt frightened. Though dreadfully excitable by nature, he was of too sanguine a temperament to be overpowered by half-seen perils. On the whole, though the situation was precarious, he had by no means made up his mind to be drowned: and there was something so stimulating in the brave conduct of the little ship, which seemed to be fighting out the battle on her own account, that at times he was light-hearted enough to sing out, loud, a verse of his favorite Tom Bowling. No man, however, could have sat there in the darkness, amid the rush of wind and wave, without at times thinking of the power of God; so again and again, through the Wanderer's mind, with a deep sea-music of their their own, rolled the wondrous verses of the Psalm: "They that go down to the sea in ships, that do business in great waters. They see the works of the Lord, and his wonders in the deep. For he commandeth, and raiseth the stormy wind, which lifteth up the waves thereof. They mount up to the heaven, they go down again to the depths; their soul is melted because of trouble. They reel to and fro, and stagger like a drunken man, and are at their wits' end. Then they cry unto the Lord in their trouble, and he bringeth them out of their distresses. He maketh the storm a calm, so that the waves thereof are still. Then are they glad because they be quiet, so he bringeth them unto their destined haven. O that men would praise the Lord for his goodness, and for his wonderful works to the children of men!"

It was now so dark that we could see nothing on any side of us, save the glitter of the crests of the waves playing close to us, and the phosphorescent glimmer of the beaten water behind the rudder. The wind was pretty steady, and the squalls were not too frequent. We were running through the darkness at considerable speed, burying our bowsprit in every wave and washing our decks as clean as salt water could make them. So low was the Tern's rail, and so close to the sea, even on the weather side, that it was like being dragged through the water bodily, with the chilly waves lapping round the waist.

Suddenly, out of the darkness ahead, shot a sharp glimmer of light; then, there was a loud sound like the creaking of cordage and noise of sails; and then, before we could utter a cry, a large brig dashed across our bows, running with a free sheet before the wind. Ghostly and strange she looked, in the mist, driving at tremendous speed, and churning the sea to sparkling foam. With a loud oath, Hamish shoved the helm hard a-port, and brought the head of the Tern up to the wind, so that we almost brushed the strange vessel's quarter. We had narrowly escaped death. With fascinated eyes we watched the brig dash on, until she was swallowed up in the darkness. When she was quite gone, we drew a heavy breath of relief.

"Lord, that was a close shave for life!" muttered Shaw, drawing his cuff across his mouth: his manner when agitated. "Wha would hae thought o' meeting strange craft hereabouts? We'd maybe better rig out the mast-head lantern, in case o' mair accidents."

This was soon done, and although the lantern burnt blue and dim we felt more secure. After so narrow an escape, what reasonable creature could have refused to drink his own health in the water of life? The grog-bottle was passed round, and never was a "nip of the screech" received with more affectionate unction.

It was weary work, that waiting on in the darkness. The wind sang, the water sobbed, the sail moaned, until the Wanderer began to get sleeper and sleeper. At last, wet as he was, he sank off into a doze, wherein he was half-conscious of the boat's motion through the water, and half-dreaming of things far away. Suddenly, he was startled by a roar in his ear, and rubbed his eyes wildly, listening. It was only Hamish Shaw, saying quietly, —

"It's beginning to get light. I see the loom o' the land."

Shivering like a half-drowned rat in the cold damp air of the dawn, and dashing the wet hair out of his weary eyes, the Wanderer stared all round him, and saw (when his obfuscated wits were able to concentrate themselves) that it was nearly daybreak, though all was dark above. A dim, silvery, misty glimmer was on the sea, and about two miles to the westward the land lay black in a dark mist like the smoke nearest the funnel of a newly coaled steamer. The Viking was poking his head through the cabin hatch and gazing shoreward.

"Can ye mak' out the shape o' these hills?" he asked of the pilot. "Loch Boisdale should be hereabouts."

Hamish shook his head.

"We maun creep in closer to mak' certain," he replied. "It's o'er dark yet. Yon bit place yonder, where ye see a shimmer like the gleam o' herring scales, looks like the mouth o' the loch, but we maun creep in canny and get mair licht."

Although Shaw had been herring-fishing on the coast for so many years, he was not as familiar with the coast as might have been expected. He knew its general outline, but had not made close observation of details. With the indifference peculiar to the fishers, he had generally trusted to Providence and his own sagacity, without making any mental note of his experiences. So it was not until he had twice or thrice referred to the chart that he remembered that just south of Boisdale, about half a mile from shore, there was a dangerous reef called Mackenzie Rock, and that on this rock there was a red buoy, which, if descried in the dim light, would be a certain index to the whereabouts of the mouth of the loch.

"Tam Saunders put the Wild Duck on that rock when I was up here in the Gannet," said Hamish; "but she was as strong as iron, different frae this sweet bit shell o' a thing, and they keepit her fixt there till the flood, and then floated her off wi' scarce a scratch. We'll just put her about, and creep in shore on the other tack."

Though the day was slowly breaking, it was still very misty, and a thin, cold "smurr" was beginning to creep down on the sea. The wind was still sharp and strong, the sea was high, and the squalls were dangerous; but we knew now that the worst of our perils must be over. As we approached closer to the shore, we noticed one dark bluff or headland from which the land receded on either side, leaving it darkly prominent; a reference to the chart soon convinced us that this headland was no other than the Ru Hordag, which lies a few miles to the south of Boisdale. So we put about again, and slipped up along the land, lying very close to the wind. It was soon clear that the dawn, though it had fully broken, was not going to favor us with a brilliant exhibition, nor to dispel the dangerous vapors in which the land was shrouded. The whole shape of the land was distorted. One could merely conjecture where land ended, and mist began; all was confusion. No sun came out. — only the dull glimmer through the miserable "smurr" betokened that it was day.

Suddenly, with a shriek of joy, the Viking discovered the buoy, and pointed it out through the rain. Yes, there it was, a red spot in a circle of white foam, about a quarter of a mile on the weather quarter. With this assistance, it was decided that the spot which Shaw had compared to the "gleam of herring-scales" was indeed the mouth of the loch. Never did voyagers hail the sight of haven with greater joy.

It was the run of nearly a mile up to the anchorage, and the passage was by no means a safe one; but Hamish, once in the loch, knew every stone and shallow perfectly. When we cast anchor the thin "smurr" had changed into a heavy rain, and all the scene around was black and wild. But what cared we? The fire was lighted in the fore-castle, Hamish put on the kettle, and the kettle began to sing. Then, after putting on dry clothes, we sat down as merry as crickets. The cook recovered, and poached the eggs. The Wanderer dozed smilingly in a corner. The Viking swore roundly that it had been the "jolliest night" he had ever spent, and that such nights made him in love with sailing. Hamish Shaw, to whom all the glory of the night belonged, first lit his black cutty pipe as he rested his head against the side of the fore-castle; and then, in an instant, dropped off, heavy as a log, worn out with fatigue, and still gripping the cutty firmly between his teeth as he slept.

MINNIKIN AND IMMENSIKOFF:

BY A SHOWMAN.

WHEN I travelled the country with a caravan, I had a giantess and a dwarf in my collection of natural curiosities. The dwarf was a Polish gentleman, Minnikin by name; the giantess was from Russia, and we called her Immensikoff, — the title of a music-hall song which was in vogue at the time having suggested an appropriate alias for her. I did very well with them. The dwarf had an outrageous temper, and would sometimes refuse to attend the visitors at his levée; but the giantess was always at hand to supply his place on the list of attractions. She was the most amiable creature in the world; and she stood seven feet eleven inches and three quarters in her slippers, or, speaking in round numbers, — as we did in the bills, — eight feet six. The dwarf was three feet five, but he could bring himself down to three feet whenever he was in a good temper and the show was full. In a general way, however, he may be said to have been about three feet two. We had all travelled the Midland Circuit together, and we were going up north, when an accident happened, — Minnikin and Immensikoff eloped.

It happened in this way. Minnikin, being a man, had naturally got an ascendancy over Immensikoff's mind, and used his power to borrow half-crowns of her when his own purse was low. This happened very often, for, although he drew an enormous salary, he lived above his income, and as he could not hold enough to eat and drink his money away, he gambled with cards, and played at billiards, standing on a chair, till it was all gone, and he was pretty deeply in debt. When he left the chair in the billiard-room it was only to mount on another in the parlor of the caravan and whisper an order, rather than a request, into the ear of the benevolent giantess for a loan to pay for his dinner. She used to declare that there was something in his eye which made it impossible for her to refuse him; and so she would always dip into the old school satchel in which she kept her savings, and give him what he wanted. He would then eat a whole kidney for his supper, and drink a cruettel of wine, and when the latter had got into his head, would make such a commotion in the tent that to pacify him she was generally obliged to give him a shilling more. He saw her dip so often in the satchel that he fancied its contents were proportioned to its size; and one day, he, as it were ordered her to marry him, which she was too weak to refuse to do. He told her to keep their intention a secret from me, and she obeyed, although I had hitherto been her chosen confidant. Taking advantage of my absence in the town, he ordered a van to be sent round to the door of the caravan one evening, as if some furniture were to be removed, and by this means conveyed her to a neighboring railway station. Mean to the last, he made her pay the expenses of her own elopement, for the van was discharged with her money. When I came back I found nobody but the jaguar in the tent, and a note written on a sheet of brown paper from Immensikoff, asking my forgiveness.

I was angry enough at the moment, as may be supposed, but I made the best of it; and what with turning myself into an aborigine, and advertising the beast as a tiger, I managed to keep a roof over my head. But I always kept on the lookout for a new giantess, — I made up my mind to have no more to do with dwarfs, — and one day, some months after my loss, I found one on show in a very inferior locality of the town of Portsmouth. I paid my penny, and went in. It was Miss Immensikoff! She gave a sob when she saw me that frightened the people out, and when they were gone she gave full vent to her feelings, till the very glasses in the room seemed to share her sorrow.

O, how changed she was! Professionally, perhaps, the change was for the better, for she was now so thin that she looked at least nine feet high; but as a woman it was painful to behold her. In spite of her looks, however, I told her I hoped I saw her in good health, and I even inquired after her husband. The mention of his name soon brought her whole story to her lips. He was alive and depraved as ever, and had lately quite given up exhibiting, and taken to playing at nine-pins with a cricket-ball, in which sport he was engaged when I found his wife.

His sole object in marrying her had, it appears, been to live on her earnings, and do no work himself, for there was nothing he hated so much as keeping himself clean for company. But he very soon discovered that her slender store would not suffice to support his extravagance for a month, for, careful, as she had been, she had long had to send remittances to her father and uncle in Podolia, — both giants, — besides ministering to her suitor's wants. He had simply been deceived by the size of the bag in which she kept her savings, and he was mean enough to be revenged on her for the failure of his own mercenary calculations. Forgetting that he had undertaken to cherish and protect her, he began to treat her with studied cruelty, though for a time this cruelty was not of such a character as made it easy for her to complain. He was simply neglectful, and appeared to be unconscious of the existence of his wife; and one day, when, having just touched her brow with his lips in response to her tearful entreaty, he was asked if that was the kiss of duty or the kiss of affection; he replied that he declined to answer the question.

Thenceforth he threw off all concealment and all restraint, and, like the wolf in the fable, never suffered himself to be at a loss for an excuse for the indulgence of his ill-will. Her housewifely care was something remarkable, and when, after prying into all the angles of their lodging, he failed to find any dust which had escaped her broom, he would turn round and bitterly taunt her with the partition of Poland, as if she had had a hand in that crime; and he would positively ask her what she thought of the battle of Warsaw when she ventured to remonstrate with him for playing at boo till two o'clock in the morning.

Sometimes his ill-treatment seemed to be dictated by the most fiendish malignity. Under pretence of liking fresh-cooked food, he would order her to make a pudding for their dinner of a size proportionable to his own appetite and nature, and, halving this meagre dish with the penknife which he used at table, would ironically bid her "fall to" on a portion that, while it was ample enough to serve for his necessities, would not make her a decent mouthful. It was the same with the food of the mind: she had a taste for the beauties of our literature, and was accustomed to enjoy the classics in folios, but he insisted on her reading them in diamond editions.

These were the main points of the story she told me, with many tears, and in a manner that would have touched a heart of stone. When she paused she drew out a handkerchief to wipe her eyes, and in doing so she accidentally brought out of her pocket a garment which turned out to be the dwarf's great-coat, and which had found its way there in a manner she could not account for, except that she had taken it up unknowingly in one of those periodical fits of mental distraction caused by her husband's brutal behavior. It often happened, she informed me, that she fell into little mistakes of this kind in tidying up the place; but Minnikin made no allowance for them; on the contrary, they served him as excuses for further ill-treatment; and he had once indulged in horrid excesses of violence because she had inadvertently made an apron-string of his dress-cravat.

I took my leave of her without waiting to see the dwarf, and told her in all sincerity how sorry I felt to see her thus placed in the power of a tyrant. I felt that, whatever my own misfortunes were in losing her services, they were as nothing compared with her own in surrendering her freedom and happiness to a wretch who did not know the value of his possession; and I was so anxious to be of service to her that I made up my mind to open my own poor show at the other end of the town, in order that I might have an opportunity of seeing her from time to time. I did so, and made several calls, paying for admission each time, for I was determined to be in no way beholden to a man I detested.

It was beautiful to see her in the intervals of the levées trying to become a good wife to Minnikin; not only performing the household work with the greatest care, and making the puddings so small that they looked like dumplings in her hand, but even trying to bring her capacious mind into harmony with the narrow understanding of her lord. Her views were naturally broader than his, for his head was certainly not larger than a Spanish onion; but she tried to narrow them by all the means in her power, and sometimes she succeeded by a great effort in forming a false judgment on one of the subjects of the day. She would bring this out along with the materials for his supper, and if he deigned to say that he was inclined to be of her opinion, the headache it had cost her to blunt her fine perceptions and to do violence to her conscience would immediately pass away.

But all to no purpose. One day I called upon her, and found her so agitated she could scarcely speak. That morning the ruffian had added personal violence to his other crimes. He loved to dabble in household affairs, and she was holding him on her arm, according to custom, to enable him to clean the windows of their dwelling, when an opinion she chanced to express in favor of the abolition of the slave-trade in Brazil excited his ire, and he struck her a blow on the head with so much force that he hurt his thumb.

I could endure it no longer. Great as was my reluctance to interfere actively in the quarrels of a married pair, I felt constrained to give her certain advice. She said it was as novel as it was terrible to her thoughts; and she at first felt extremely reluctant to take it. I made her promise me, however, before we parted that she would give it a trial.

Exulting in the license given to his evil nature by the removal of the last barrier to the free course of his temper which duty and manly feeling had imposed, the dwarf renewed his threats of ill-treatment on his return home that night from a carouse, and the next morning he commanded the trembling woman, in a voice of thunder, to take him up in her arms again that he might finish the top panes. In vain she suggested a pair of steps; he was inexorable, and told her to hold her tongue. Unfortunately, it was impossible for her to control her eyes. He was using the dry duster with great energy to impart the final polish, when he discovered on it traces of a tear which it had caught as it lay in its resting-place on her shoulder. He turned savagely and was about to strike her again, when she very deliberately let him fall; and in less than a minute he came to the ground with a terrible noise.

Half stunned as he was, however, he was about to rise for retaliation, not doubting that his punishment was owing to her inadvertence, when she saved him the effort by lifting him in mid-air with one hand, in the same way as one lifts a favorite cat, and, with the other, belaboring him till the dust flew out of his little coat. She then, although it was early in the day, put him to bed, and ordered him not to utter a syllable for his life. He was so much astonished and so frightened that hitherto he had not been able to speak; but no sooner did he find himself in temporary quiet, than he made an effort to regain his moral supremacy by opening his mouth. But his wife at once assumed a determined expression of countenance, and he gave way. He hid his head beneath the bedclothes, and lay quite still in that position the rest of the day. It was quite a revelation to him that she could hit so hard, and he reflected on it with considerable profit.

As for the gentle creature who had administered the lesson to him, as soon as her first excitement was over, she felt quite broken down, and she was obliged to close the show for the day, "in consequence of the indisposition of the proprietor," as the notice stated. After she had done that, and placed a little refreshment on a chair by Minnikin's bedside, she withdrew to her own room, where she spent some time in weeping over a love-letter written on the back of a railway-ticket, and a little wisp of hair, which were the sole memorials of affection she had ever received from her cruel lord.

She was sorry, and, if the truth must be told, afraid, for such was the influence of habit, that it was difficult for her to divest herself of the belief that Minnikin was physically as well as morally the very embodiment of irresistible force. She thought her present victory over him was entirely due to chance and her own wild temerity, and she fully expected to feel the weight of his vengeance on the morrow. At the very moment these reflections were passing through her mind, Minnikin was asking himself in a kind of sickening terror whether it was likely she would beat him again that day. So that each, as we see, knowing nothing of the fright of the other, was ready to give in; and victory was only waiting to declare for the first claimant.

Matters were in this state when Immensikoff, with scarcely concealed terror, entered the room where Minnikin lay, in the morning, and began making the preparations for a simple meal. She carried the cups and saucers most tenderly, lest their rattle should wake the terrible creature who, she hoped, was as yet unconscious of her presence, for she had not dared to look. The terrible creature, on his part, was awake enough, and was noiselessly shifting about beneath his coverlet in order to obtain the best possible position for receiving what he did not doubt would be the speedy visitation of that dreaded hand. He had gradually advanced one eye beyond the coverlet, and then the other, and finally had brought his little nose to light. It was much changed since yesterday. Anxiety writes its record on this feature more than any other. It was round at the end, and flushed with insolence and wine the morning before; but now you could have picked up seed with it, it was brought to such a point, and all its color had fled. It was at the moment that the nose appeared that Immensikoff, stealing a timid glance towards the bed, beheld it standing sharply defined between the two eager eyes.

Women are not always good physiognomists. She thought the nose boded fury and dire revenge, and all her little remnant of firmness gave way. She ran hastily across the apartment, and was about to tender a weak woman's submission to authority on her knees, when, to her inexpressible surprise, the dwarf bounded from his bed with a yell of terror, and throwing himself at her feet, implored mercy in the most abject terms, and promised repentance and amendment. He had simply mistaken her intention, and he was conquered. She was sensible enough to conceal her real feelings, and she obtained from him the most solemn guarantees of good behavior before she allowed him to get up and take his breakfast.

When I called three days after, I found the dwarf for the first time at home, and attending to his work. He was industriously exhibiting himself as Napoleon and as Cupid, while his wife was taking the repose so necessary after her protracted exertions. He took me in to see her, and called her "Poppit," and she seemed to be completely happy.

They are both now at work in my show again, and a more affectionate couple does not exist. She often thanks me, when Minnikin is out of hearing, for teaching her that it is sometimes good to pay the oppressor in his own coin.

THE MATRIMONIAL AGENT.

LONDON supplies the fashionable districts of Paris with pickpockets, — why, it is difficult to comprehend, as Frenchmen, as a rule, have greater delicacy of touch than the broad-digitated sons of Albion. Paris, in return, sends us clever swindlers of various types, whose main field of action, however, appears to be the city and its purlieus, possibly because the western districts are too overrun by our native-born sharpers, who, spite of their undoubted inventive genius, nevertheless rarely seem to hit upon the same ultra-refined way of fleecing particular sections of the community as their Parisian brethren practise with such marked success.

The one imposition, on a grand scale, which flourishes in Paris, unrestrained by the law, is the Matrimonial Agency. One can understand the immense field it has open to it in a country like France, where marriages are far more affairs of the purse than of the heart, and where every female servant, and every shop-girl, even, saves up her "dot" as her only chance of obtaining a partner for life. The most important of these agencies send out their circulars quarterly to all the hommes d'affaires in France; and an extract from one of these documents, that has accidentally come beneath our notice, deserves to be given verbatim.

"I entertain the conviction, monsieur, that in your neighborhood—or, at any rate, among your connections—you will either know or chance to hear of certain young ladies who may happen to be placed in the embarrassing position of not being able to contract a suitable marriage, either in accordance with their tastes or their just pretensions. I venture, therefore, to do myself the pleasure of furnishing you with an epitome of those actual and seriously disposed parties of whom I have the honor to be the intermediary.

"1. A foreign prince, well known in the highest circles for his irreproachable manners and agreeable physiognomy. He is thirty-four years of age, and has from eight hundred thousand to a million francs of fortune, with carriages, horses, &c.

"2. A magistrate, thirty-five years of age, and with an income of a hundred thousand francs.

"3. Several doctors, twenty-five to thirty-five years of age, and possessing incomes ranging from twenty to fifty thousand francs.

"4. Numerous merchants, &c. from twenty-five to forty years of age, with incomes varying from twenty to thirty thousand francs.

"5. Some 'rentiers,' from forty to fifty years of age, and with from thirty thousand to a hundred thousand francs income."

This circular, curious in many respects, has, however, nothing novel about it. It would be necessary that one should never have looked into a French newspaper to ignore the various temptations to which these high-priests of Hymen make a point of incessantly exposing all who happen to be single.

The matrimonial agent, with whom just now we are more particularly concerned, invariably has on the books of his establishment all that can be wished for, and everything, moreover, would appear to be of the very best. There are blondes and brunettes, short and tall, stout and thin ones, of high birth or high connections, and of both sexes. He has, in fact, all colors, all sizes, all shapes, and all qualities. The price, moreover, is not absolute; he will permit us to bargain with him, although he does not neglect to inform us that his extensive connections assure an incontestable superiority to his articles over those of other establishments. His clientèle, he informs us, comprises the élite of society only.

The originator of this singular avocation has retired on the fortune and the honors he derived from the successful pursuit of it; but his successors, who continue to preach the scriptural doctrine of increase and multiply, do not appear to have been equally fortunate in mating their clients, for one sees the same advertisement constantly repeated. "It is desired to marry a young lady, possessing thirty thousand francs a year, to an individual of an honorable profession. Fortune less a consideration than strictly moral conduct."

The advertisement occasionally varies, and one is enabled to make a selection from a thousand francs a year up to two hundred thousand, from aged fifteen to aged seventy. Address, post paid, No. —, Avenue Montaigne.

One day a representative of that common class of young men who exhaust all their patrimony during the first few years of their liberty, presented himself, over head and ears in debt, to one of these matrimonial agents, having come to extricate himself from his difficulties by uniting himself to a pretended dowry of three thousand francs a year, a modest and probable enough dowry. After a few preliminary explanations, the agent asked him, according to custom, for two hundred francs for expenses, at which the disabused suitor shrugged his shoulders, and naively observed,—

"Is it likely, I ask you, that I should think of tying myself to a wife if I was in possession of a couple of hundred francs?"

No reply could be made to so pertinent an observation, and the negotiation, as a matter of course, fell to the ground.

Bachelors who have lost everything need a dowry to refill their purse, and a nurse for their rheumatism. They notice one morning in the newspaper, between the "Eau de melisse des Carnes" and "Machines silencieux à coudre," an advertisement of a lady wishing to marry, and who is handsome, young, witty, modest, and amiable, and, best of all, who is ballasted with thirty thousand francs a year. Address (as usual) No. —, Avenue Montaigne.

At least one individual out of the thousands who read the advertisement will be certain to think this the very thing to suit him, and will make a point of writing to the address indicated. Two days afterwards an answer arrives. With a trembling hand he opens the envelope, and with palpitating heart devours the reply, the purport of which, however, will simply be, that "affairs of this nature cannot be discussed freely by correspondence." He is begged, therefore, to favor the agent with a call at No. —, Avenue Montaigne, and he shall receive further information. In conclusion he is assured that, having been the first to reply to the advertisement, a preference will be accorded him.

The bureau of the agent at the address indicated turns out to be in a very fine house, all the windows of which look into the street. A footman in livery introduces the would-be bridegroom into a magnificent salon furnished with exquisite taste, and the open folding-doors of which permit him to see on the right and on the left what appears to be a suite of splendid apartments. Everything breathes of love and marriage; copies of Watteau's Isle of Cythera and Veronese's Marriage of Cana, with kindred subjects, adorn the walls. The timepiece is surmounted by an amatory shepherd and shepherdess, above whom hover a pair of billing and cooing doves. The candelabra are formed of torches of Hymen, Cupids gambol in the angles of the ceiling, and the tables are covered with books, all treating of the one eternal subject, from the loves of angels to the loves of plants. And as if to complete the picture a couple of pretty children, a Cupidon and a Psyche, in knickerbockers and crinoline, are playing upon the hearth-rug.

A bell rings, and soon the agent makes his appearance, with innumerable apologies for having kept his visitor waiting, pleading the numerous affairs he has on hand as his excuse. At the conclusion of this exordium he wipes his brows with an embroidered cambric handkerchief; then rings the bell and orders a basin of soup, which is served to him in a silver bowl by the servant who answered the door. The agent expresses surprise at his performing this duty,—asks him where Pierre, Joseph, and François are, to which the lackey replies, without a moment's hesitation, that the first has gone to the bank, the second about the box at the Opera, and the third upon the business of M. le Comte, who called yesterday.

How should the visitor escape being dazzled by such deceitful appearances, — for they are appearances only? the one footman he has seen being Pierre, Joseph, François, and himself, who, in fact, does everything.

The foregoing is the prologue; now commences the comedy.

The agent: "Monsieur, will you kindly explain the object of your visit?"

Thus called upon, the visitor produces the letter he has received, and at the same time hands the agent his card, saying, —

"I had the honor, as you will remember, of writing to you on the subject of the advertisement in the 'Figaro' of Wednesday last. When can I be presented to the lady?"

"Excuse me, but you are proceeding a little too fast; allow me, first of all, to ask you a few questions. Have you any profession?"

"No."

"Any fortune?"

"Nothing to speak of: but I have great expectations."

"Umph! How about your antecedents?"

"You are at liberty to make any inquiry you think requisite."

And so the conversation proceeds, kept up by the agent solely with the object of measuring the precise degree of intelligence which his visitor — soon to be his victim — possesses, and to satisfy himself what precautions it is necessary should be taken, so that he may not be too much compromised, in the event of a subsequent explosion. Suddenly he rises and produces a book of photographs; refers to the index, and opens the volume at a particular page, where he points out the portrait of a handsome young lady, whose attractions he highly extols. His visitor cannot resist admitting these eulogies to be merited.

A moment of silence now ensues, during which the pair eye each other. The conversation is resumed by the agent, who says, with an air of perfect frankness, —

"There is no need to go beating about the bush; let us come at once to the point. In the event of everything being satisfactorily arranged, my terms will be five per cent upon the dowry."

"That is fair enough."

"Payable, mind, when you receive it."

"I am perfectly agreeable."

And in truth it would be the height of ill-breeding to refuse to pay such a slender commission, asked so courteously by a man who procures you a fortune, of which you stand so greatly in need, and, as he assures you, a charming bride, who, though not an object of equal necessity, is still a treasure in herself. The affair is, therefore, settled; but before proceeding further, the agent requires to be insured against his expenses for inquiries, messages, postages, &c., which seems reasonable enough. These expenses vary according as the suitor is more or less credulous and the dowry large or small. In the present instance, the agent asks three hundred francs. "For another couple of hundred," he adds, "you may become a subscriber to my establishment for an entire year, which will give you the run of it, and confer on you the right of being presented to all the eligible ladies I have on my books, — and I have them mounting up to sixty thousand francs, — within that period, until you succeed in suiting yourself."

The gull in the present instance, being as mercenary as he is simple, pays the five hundred francs, and receives in exchange for his money a memorandum, upon stamped paper, setting forth the conditions of the engagement, and for registering which he is charged another ten francs. Our would-be Benedict now awaits with juvenile ardor the moment when the first interview is to take place.

In a day or two he receives a letter from the agent, making an appointment to present him, at No. —, Avenue Montaigne. It is needless to say that he dresses himself with scrupulous care, bestows the entire morning, in fact, upon his toilet, and calls to mind all the more graceful compliments that he has heard addressed to fiancées on the stage. His part duly rehearsed, he hastens to the appointment before the prescribed time, and is ushered into the drawing-room.

The agent is awaiting him, and gives him a few hints respecting the young lady's tastes; she is musical, of course; is an entomologist, and manages a three-wheel velocipede very gracefully, he is told. This will guide him in his selection of subjects for conversation.

The lady soon after arrives, escorted by her aunt, and is found to answer all the expectations raised by her portrait. She glances modestly at her expected lord and master, displays a pair of pretty feet peeping beneath a coquettish petticoat as she gathers her robe à queue around her while seating herself, converses charmingly yet with becoming diffidence, and, indeed, is altogether fascinating. The aunt, too, seems a very nice sort of a person, and not too strict a chaperone. In due course the interview comes to an end, and the ladies prepare to take their departure; when the dupe proposes to the agent to escort them, but finds himself restrained, — it would be indelicate at this early period of their acquaintance, he is told.

This, however, is not the true reason: the fact is, the ladies do not leave the house, and it is important the dupe should not know this. Niece and aunt are hired at so much a day, and are clothed and boarded into the bargain. They have every description of toilet necessary to their transformation provided for them, and are of fair or dark complexions, and quiet or coquettish in their attire, according to the tastes of different clients, — the aunt, it should be mentioned, has a supposititious "dot" of her own, sufficiently large to tempt the cupidity of the unwary. This facility of being one individual to-day and another to-morrow is not without its advantages, in case the dupe should lodge any complaint; for he would fail to describe the woman accurately, and the authorities would feel themselves embarrassed at the outset.

Every time that niece and aunt are about to be presented to a client, the footman rets the door-bell ringing with a broom; whereupon the agent announces to his visitor that they have arrived. After the first interview, he insinuates, mildly, that it would advance the negotiation if they were asked to accept of a breakfast, "as at table one speaks more freely, especially after a glass of champagne," and volunteers to use his powers of persuasion to induce them to accept the invitation. "If it can be managed," he adds, "you can then very well offer to escort them home." The agent gives the dupe to understand that the breakfast must take place at No. —, Avenue Montaigne, and proposes to provide it for four people for sixty francs: "which is dirt cheap," he observes; "but as he has the wine in his cellar he does not drive bargains with friends.

At breakfast the table is covered with solid cold dishes, in the English fashion, — a large joint of roast beef, a ham, and a superb turkey. The ladies partake of the hors-d'œuvres only and the side dishes, and firmly refuse when either a slice of beef or turkey is offered them. It is the same with the "sweets," simply because the principal dishes have, like themselves, to be served up again to other subscribers to the Matrimonial Agency in the Avenue Montaigne.

Under one pretext or another, they manage to leave the table before the conclusion of the repast. One of them finds herself indisposed, or the aunt has an appointment with the family notary, or, as a last resource, the agent desires a few minutes' important conversation with the dupe, who, at any rate, does not see them home. After their pretended departure the agent, while assuring him that everything is progressing most favorably, delicately insinuates that before proceeding further it is absolutely requisite to send to his native place to obtain precise information, not only respecting himself, but his family and connections. The guardians of the young lady insist on this course being taken. An early day is appointed to arrange the preliminaries, and on going to the agent's, the dupe finds the lady and her aunt there, — by the merest chance. In their presence a clerk is summoned and the necessary indications drawn up in writing.

The clerk's expenses and time, together twenty francs a day, for say a week, as two days will be consumed in travelling, with eighty francs for railway and diligence fare, will have to be paid. The client hesitates at this new drain upon him, whereupon the aunt in the most natural manner in the world volunteers to bear half the expenses, and, to set the dupe an example, produces her purse, an elegant knitted bead one, and hands the agent her share. With the view of paying court the dupe admires the purse; is informed — as indeed he surmised — that it was made by the niece, and the acceptance of it is forced upon him by the aunt, who will listen to no refusal. As iron must be beaten while it is hot, the clerk is to start at once, and the client pays his hundred and ten francs.

As the week devoted to the inquiry is drawing to its close the dupe looks in at the agency to hear if there is any news. The ladies are not there on this occasion, but the agent is, and he takes care to remind him of the purse and the necessity of making a suitable acknowledgment, which, under present circumstances, the more handsome it is the more, he explains to the dupe, it will be to his advantage; for the niece, he takes care to inform him, will in all likelihood succeed to her aunt's fortune. With the view of not being thought mean the dupe presents the lady with a diamond ring worth two hundred and fifty francs, the stone of which, remounted as a pin for the agent, will serve to dazzle future dupes.

Usually by the time the week has elapsed the clerk is reported to have fallen ill in the country; has met with a sunstroke, or been put between damp sheets, according to the season of the year. His illness lasts four days, for which another eighty francs have to be paid, as it will look exceedingly mean to ask the aunt to bear her share of this trifle. The dupe's purse-strings are, therefore, again unloosened, though all this time the clerk has not only been perfectly well, but has never even quitted Paris.

At length the client grows impatient, and speaks out; whereupon the agent assumes an air of profound sadness, and announces to him, with marked emotion, that he has had a narrow escape: that his, the agent's, vigilance and foresight have saved him from a great misfortune, for he has discovered that the paternal parent of the young lady, respecting whom there had always been a mystery, had been guillotined for murder. Her own reputation, too, is whispered against, and her pretended fortune is equally doubtful. The dupe, surprised and horrified at this revelation, though regretting the money he has paid, cannot but congratulate himself that this is no more, and feels grateful at his escape. He has paid altogether about a thousand francs. The game is played out so far as he is concerned, but he only retires to make way for some one else equally mercenary and equally foolish.

The Frenchman of good family, who has sown his wild oats and got entangled with usurers, and who seeks a wife to relieve him of his debts and to open a new career for him, or, at any rate, to provide him a place by the fireside where he can repose now that his turbulent course has run itself out, has no need of the services of a matrimonial agent to accomplish the object of his desires. He simply betakes himself to the family notary and inquires of him whether he has among his clients a young lady with a dowry, say, of eight hundred thousand francs.

"I have something better than that," replies the gentleman in black; "I have a million and upwards, half in land and half on mortgage."

"Bravo! where is the land?"

"In Normandy."

"Capital! What age is your client?"

"Between twenty and four-and-twenty; you understand, therefore, one is in no particular hurry."

"How about her charms?"

"Very pleasant, I assure you; very pleasant."

"Come, out with it; she is as ugly as sin?"

"Nothing of the kind. Her teeth are a little amiss, I admit, but that is all. Besides, what does it matter, pretty or ugly? it's all the same six months after marriage."

"You are right there, and may look upon the business as settled, if you will guarantee that the mortgages are good."

"They are first-class investments, — on property worth three millions."

"That's conclusive. Tell me, though, about her family."

"Well, this is not the brilliant side of the affair. She is the only daughter of a builder, so that she moves in rather a low strata of society. Her father is of little importance. He will tell you how he came up to Paris in his sabots, and that he has made four millions by the sweat of his brow. Hide from him that you lie in bed until eleven o'clock, as he has a theory that every man who is not up and about at five is a good-for-nothing scamp. As for the mother, providing you get her boxes to see the melodramas that are the rage, she will pardon you everything, even beating her daughter."

"Just so. This worthy couple are of course flanked by any number of relations, — uncles, aunts, cousins, and such-like?"

"Egad! yes. However, you see them all on the day of the wedding, and next day —"

"Zounds! next day I'll show every living soul of them the door. It is not they who will trouble me."

"Not quite so fast. Listen to me. You must be very careful of old uncle Jalabert. He is seventy-three, asthmatic, without children, and has forty thousand francs a year. He has been in the army, and will recount to you all the campaigns he has gone through. Providing you join in his admiration of the great Napoleon, he'll ask nothing further of you. I do not see, too, why you should not pay a little court to Aunt Ursula, an elder daughter, and turned fifty-nine. She will tell you that all men are rascals, not even yourself excepted; still, there is no harm in letting her have her say, — it's a relief to her."

"Thank you kindly for all your hints. I'll devote one day to this menagerie. But how do you propose to introduce me?"

"That can be easily accomplished. Come and dine with me and them on Sunday, and 'by eleven o'clock you'll be betrothed."

"What you say is all very fine, but how do you know that I shall be accepted?"

"Make your mind easy on that score. If you had not turned up so opportunely I should have written to you. The parents want to marry the girl and stipulate for a title. You are a viscount, and everybody knows you go to Compiègne; that's quite sufficient to turn the heads of the entire trading class in France."

"You know that I am in debt?"

"I have no doubt of that. What is the figure?"

"In round numbers about three hundred thousand —"

"A mere bagatelle. It is only making the Loriols pay toll on entering into the old nobility, — a tax upon armorial bearings, in fact."

"It's understood, then, — on Sunday next. Good by."

On Sunday the dinner takes place as arranged, and everything comes off exactly in accordance with the notary's programme.

Such a purely business matter is marriage in France, and so thoroughly is it understood that in this light only are parents accustomed to look at it, that one finds a French writer jocosely proposing that the government should itself establish a grand matrimonial agency, having central offices in Paris, with branches in all the departments and abroad, and which should absorb all the existing agencies, and be administered by a distinct staff of its own, just like any other government office. Men distinguished for their tact and the purity of their morals placed at its head, would, he suggests, inspire confidence in families having daughters to marry. Individuals of the male sex desirous of having recourse to the intermediation of the agency would be required to furnish full information respecting their personal appearance, age, state of health, and family connections, accompanied by medical certificates, abstracts of title-deeds, schedules of valuables, extracts from registers, together with legal attestations of regularity of life and moral conduct. The adoption of all these precautions, the writer maintains, would give that degree of moral security to marriage contracts which unhappily they lack at the present day.

As the clergy and the magistracy are the two classes best informed in France, and brought most in contact with the people generally, and as, moreover, they are public functionaries, it is proposed that they should be required to furnish the administration of the agency with moral portraits of individuals residing within their jurisdiction who may be desirous of being inscribed on the register. These, together with the document before mentioned, as also letters from principals of colleges at which these individuals may have been educated, and certificates from heads of departments or employers under whom they may have served, would all be placed in their particular receptacles. The admirable centralization which renders France an object of envy to other nations would thereby have new and congenial duties imposed upon it, reassuring in the highest degree to families, and largely conducive to good morals.

A grand photographic establishment might be attached to the central agency and smaller ones to the agencies in the departments. Families disposed to give dowries of fifty thousand francs would be entitled to inspect two ordinary photographs of candidates inscribed on the registers, one seated, the other standing, one a front view, the other in profile. When the dowry mounts up to a hundred thousand francs, portraits might be demanded one sixth of the natural size; when to two hundred thousand francs, one fourth life size, with an equestrian portrait in addition. A dowry of two hundred and fifty thousand francs would be entitled to special photographs of the cranium, to show the state of preservation of the hair, and of the teeth to attest the condition of the molars and incisors. If required, photographs of both feet and hands would also have to be furnished to demonstrate that these are of proper aristocratic dimensions. Larger dowries might be entitled to demand portraits of candidates under a variety of special aspects, so as to guard against subsequent disillusion, such as in full evening dress with silk stockings and smalls, in dressing-gown and slippers, and even in nightcap, or representing the individual undergoing the painful operation of shaving himself. One can conceive the high position that photography would thus attain to; it would, in fact, become elevated into a social institution of the utmost importance, and would be the means of sparing alike principals and their families from numerous cruel deceptions.

Every proposal inscribed on the books of the agency would require to be accompanied by a demand specifying the amount of fortune and the precise kind of social position which the party making it aspires to. These would be duly classified, and every week a printed list, dividing them into categories, would be posted up at the Bourse, enabling every one to see at a glance, as it were, the state of the matrimonial market, how many magistrates and other functionaries, military and naval officers, professional men, merchants, tradesmen, and employés of every description, there were in search of wives, together with their respective incomes and the dowries they aspired to, as also the number and value of the dowries that were in the market. In due course a market price would be established, subject, however, to fluctuations, like all other commodities when supply is in excess or falls short of the demand. If, for instance, magistrates should happen to be in great request, their value would rise, and they would naturally aspire to larger dowries. Political and social events would have their effect upon this market as upon all others. A threatened war would cause military men to fall just as a peace with Cochin-China would send up East India merchants, and in all probability improve the quotations of naval officers. A low state of the public health would raise the rate of doctors in the same way that a new cattle-plague would depress the agriculturists. Alterations in the press laws would necessarily elevate or lower journalists according as these were either mild or stringent. Every one, on opening his newspaper of a morning, would have the satisfaction of seeing his precise quotation in the matrimonial market, and from carefully studying the fluctuations, would be enabled to choose the particular moment when his value was at what he conceived to be its highest point, and could then hasten to sign the marriage contract with the object of — let us hope his future affections.

ROMAN IMPERIALISM.*

BY PROFESSOR SEELEY.

II. THE FALL OF THE ROMAN EMPIRE.

WHAT was the cause of the fall of the Roman Empire?

That after a few centuries a fabric so artificial should fall to pieces is not in itself surprising. Great empires seldom last long; they are by their very nature liable to special evils to which in time they succumb, and so the process of their downfall is commonly the same. Rome was by no means exempt from these special causes of weakness, but we shall find that Rome did not, like other empires, succumb to them. We shall find that she weathered these most obvious dangers, and that the history of her fall is as unique as that of her greatness.

The difficulty which has been found insurmountable in most great empires is their unwieldy size, and the obstinate antipathy of the conquered nationalities to their conquerors. Government must necessarily become difficult in proportion to the extent of the territory governed and the disloyalty of the inhabitants. It follows that in a great empire founded upon conquest the difficulties of government are the greatest possible. To cope with them it is found necessary to create pashas or viceroys of particular provinces, with full monarchical power. Sooner or later government breaks down, overborne partly by its insurgent subjects, partly by these viceroys shaking off its authority.

This, then, is the regular process of dissolution in empires. Subject nationalities succeed at last in recovering their independence, and subordinate governors throw off their allegiance and become kings. Sometimes the two solvents help each other, as Ali Pasha of Janina helped the early attempts of the Greek patriots. Let us take some of the more conspicuous examples which history affords. Alexander's empire was dissolved by his officers making themselves kings, and the kingdom of Pontus was formed out of it by the effort of one of the conquered nationalities. The Saracen Empire split into three independent caliphates. The Seljukian Empire of Malek Shah was divided in a few generations among independent sultans of Persia, Syria, Roum, &c. The Great Mogul lost his dominion partly to the insurgent Mahrattas, partly to his own viceroys of the Deccan and of Bengal. The German Empire became a nullity when the electors began to raise themselves to the rank of kings. In the Ottoman Empire the process of dissolution shows itself in Greece and Servia recovering their independence, and the Egyptian viceroy making himself a sovereign.

If we look for similar symptoms in the dissolution of the Roman Empire we are disappointed. The subject nationalities do not recover their independence. It is true that they make their separate influence felt long after they have been politically merged. The Greeks, for example, maintained, not only the independence, but the superiority of their language and their culture. Although the greatest writers of this period are Roman, yet, within half a century after the death of Tacitus and Juvenal, Greek not only prevailed in the eastern half of the Empire, but had so far superseded Latin in Rome itself, that the Emperor Aurelius uses it in meditations intended for his own private use. The Asiatic part of the Empire preserved its peculiar ways of thinking. Its religions entered into a competition both with the religions of the West and with Greek philosophy, the religion of the cultivated classes among the Romans. In this contest between the Western conquerors and the Eastern subjects the conquered races had at last the better, and imposed a religion upon their masters. Nor were the African nationalities without their influence. They gave to the Empire, in Severus, the master who first gave unlimited power to the army; and they contributed to the religious reformation its greatest rhetorician, Tertullian; its most influential politician, Cyprian; and, later, its greatest theologian, Augustine.

But though the nationalities retained so much intellectual independence, they never became dangerous to the Empire. There were indeed, in the first century, four considerable wars of independence, — the rising of the Germans under Arminius, that of the Britons under Boadicea, that of the Germans and Gauls under Civilis, and that of the Jews. But the first two were not rebellions of nations in the process of being conquered. In the case of the Germans it was the effort by which they saved their independence; in the case of the Britons it was the last convulsion of despair. The other two revolts were, no doubt, precisely of the kind which occur so frequently in great empires, and are so frequently fatal to them. But to the Roman Empire they were not fatal, and can hardly be said to have seriously endangered it.

It was owing to the confusion of a revolutionary time that Civilis was able for a moment to sever the Rhenish provinces from Rome, but his success only made it more evident that his appeal to national feeling came too late, and was addressed to that which had no existence. As soon as the vigor of the central government revived, a single army, not very well commanded, extinguished the feeble spark. Far different, certainly, was the vigor and enthusiasm with which the Jews took arms. But the result was not different. The rebellious nationality only earned by the fierceness of its rising a more overwhelming ruin.

If we reckon the Jewish war of the reign of Vespasian and that of the reign of Hadrian as constituting together one great national rebellion, then the history of the Empire affords no other considerable example besides those I have mentioned of the rising of a conquered nationality. There appear, indeed, in the third and fourth centuries, some phenomena not altogether different. The third century was an age of revolution. I have spoken already of the great Roman Revolution which began with the tribunate of Gracchus and ended with the battle of Actium. It would be a convenient thing if we could accustom ourselves to the notion of a second Roman Revolution, beginning with the death of Marcus Aurelius, in A. D. 180, and ending with the accession of Diocletian, in A. D. 285. During this period the Imperial system struggled for its life, and suffered a transformation of character which enabled it to support itself over the whole extent of the Empire for more than another century, and in the eastern half for many centuries. In the fearful convulsions of this revolutionary period we are able to discern the difficulties with which the Imperial system had to cope. And among these difficulties is certainly to be reckoned the unlikeness of the nations composing the Empire. The Empire shows a constant tendency to break into large fragments, each held together internally by national sympathies, and separated from the others by national differences. The Greek-speaking world tends to separate itself from the Latin-speaking world. Gaul, Britain, and Spain tend to separate themselves from Italy and Africa. These tendencies were recognized when the revolutionary period closed in Diocletian's partition of the Empire between two Augusti and two Caesars, and afterwards, in the four great præfectures of Constantine. The division between East and West, after being several times drawn and again effaced, was permanently recognized in the time of the sons of Theodosius, and is written in large characters in the history of the modern world.

The tendency, then, to division certainly existed, and might at times be dangerous. But it is not to be confounded with that working of the spirit of nationality which I have spoken of as the commonest cause of the ruin of great empires. In most great empires the subject nations have not only a want of sympathy, or it may be a positive antipathy, towards each other; they are influenced still more by an undying hostility towards their conquerors, and an undying recollection of the independence they have lost. Out of these feelings springs a fixed determination, handed down through successive generations, and shared by every individual member of the conquered race, to throw off the yoke at the first opportunity. Where this fixed determination exists, the conquerors have in the long run but a poor chance of retaining their conquest; for their energy is more likely to be corrupted by success than their victims' fixed hatred to be extinguished by delay. And this was the difficulty which, almost alone among conquering nations, the Romans were not called upon to meet. By some means or other they succeeded in destroying in the mind of Gaul, African, and Greek the remembrance of their past independence and the remembrance of the relentless cruelty with which they had been enslaved. Rome destroyed patriotism in its subject races, though it left in them a certain blind instinct of kindred. When the Empire grew weak, the atoms showed a tendency to crystallize again in the old forms, but while it continued vigorous it satisfied the nationalities that it had absorbed. Whether by its imposing grandeur or the material happiness it bestowed, or the free career it offered, particularly to military merit, or the hopelessness of resistance; or — more particularly in the West — by the civilization it brought with it; by some of these means, or by some combination of them, the Roman Empire succeeded in giving an equivalent to those who had been deprived of everything by its relentless sword. As Tecmessa to Ajax, the world said to Rome, —

σύ γάρ μοι πατρίδ' ἥστωσας δόρει
καὶ μητρί' ἀλλή μοῖρα τὸν φύσαντ' ἵ τε καθεῖλεν Αἰδου θανάσιμος οἰκτῆρας τίς δὴν' ἐμοὶ γένοιτ' ἂν ἄντι σου πατρίς;

τίς παῖδός; ἐν σοὶ πᾶς ἐμῶν σώζεται.

"Thou didst destroy my country with thy spear;
My mother and begetter eyeless Fate
Took to be tenants of the house of death.
Now then what country can I find but thee,
What household? on thee all my fortune hangs."

Of all the conquered nations, that which had the noblest past was Greece. It is a striking fact that even a hundred years ago there existed among the Greeks no proud remembrance of their heroic ancestors. Leonidas and Miltiades were names which had no magic sound to them. But they were proud of two things, — of their religious orthodoxy and of their being the legitimate representatives of the Roman Empire.

The Roman Empire, then, did not fall as, for example, the Parthian Empire fell, by the rebellion of the conquered nationalities. But neither again did it fall by the rebellion of its great officers and viceroys, as the empire of Alexander. It was, indeed, constantly exposed to this danger. It felt, as other empires have felt, the necessity of creating these great officers. The Legati of the Rhine and Danube, the Legatus of Syria, possessed the power of independent sovereigns. They often seemed likely to use, and sometimes did use, this power against the government. In the first two centuries, Galba, Vitellius, Vespasian, Severus, were successful usurpers; Vindex, Avidius Cassius, Pescennius Niger were unsuccessful ones; Corbulo, and perhaps Agricola, paid with their lives for the greatness which made them capable of becoming usurpers. But these men usurped, or endeavored to usurp, or were thought likely to usurp, the whole Empire, not parts of it. The danger of the Empire being divided among its great generals did not appear till near the end of that revolutionary period of which I have spoken. Then, however, it seemed for a time very imminent. We might rather say that for some years the Empire was actually divided in this way. In what is commonly called the time of the Thirty Tyrants, Gaul and Spain were governed for some years by independent emperors, while Syria and part of Asia Minor formed the kingdom of Odenathus. In other parts of the Empire, at the same time, the authority of Rome was thrown off by several less successful adventurers. At this moment, then, the Roman Empire presented the same spectacle of dissolution which other great empires have sooner or later almost always presented. It seemed likely to run the usual course, and to illustrate the insurmountable difficulty of at once concentrating great power at a number of different points, and preserving the supremacy of the centre of the whole system. But the Roman Empire rallied, and by an extraordinary display of energy proved the difficulty not to be insurmountable. It escaped this danger also, and that not only for a time, but permanently. The disease of which it died at last was not this, but another.

Of the first Roman Revolution, Marius Cæsar, and Augustus are the heroes. The first of these organized the military system, the second gave the military power predominance over the civil, the third arranged the relations of the military to the civil power, so as to make them as little oppressive and as durable as possible. The second Roman Revolution, that of the third century after Christ, had for its heroes Diocletian and Constantine. The problem for them was to give the military power, now absolutely predominant, unity within itself.

Before, the question had been of the relations between the Emperor and the Senate; now it was of the relations between the Emperor and his Legati and his army. But now, as then, the only hope of the Empire was in despotism; the one study of all statesmen was how to diminish liberty still further, and concentrate power still more absolutely in a single hand. As Rome had been saved from barbaric invasion by Cæsar, so it was saved by Diocletian from partition among viceroys. But as it was saved the first time at the expense of its republican liberties, it was saved the second time by the sacrifice of those vestiges of freedom which Cæsar had left it. The military dictator now became a sultan. The little finger of Constantine was thicker than the loins of Augustus; and if Tiberius had chastised his subjects with whips, Valentinian chastised them with scorpions.

The Revolution now effected had two stages. First came the temporary arrangement of Diocletian, who, in order to strengthen the Imperial power against the unwieldy army, created, as it were, a cabinet of emperors. He shared his power with three other generals, whom he succeeded in attaching firmly to himself. Such an arrangement could not last, for only a superior genius could suspend the operation of the law, Nulla fides regni sociis; but so long as it lasted, the Imperial power was quadrupled, and the Empire was firmly ruled, not from one centre, but from four: from Nicomedia, Antioch, Milan, and Trèves. This plan had all the advantages of partition, while in the undisputed ascendancy of Diocletian it retained all the advantages of unity. This temporary arrangement in due time gave place to the permanent institution of Constantine, who broke the power of the Legati by dividing military power from the civil. Up to that time, the Legatus of a province had been an emperor in miniature, — at the same time governor of a nation and commander of an army. Now, the two offices were divided, and there remained to the emperor an immense superiority over every subject, — the prerogative that in him alone civil and military power met. And at the same time that by disarming all inferior greatness he made himself master of the bodies, the lives, and fortunes of his subjects, he subdued their imaginations and hearts by his assumption of Asiatic state and by his alliance with the Christian Church.

Thus was the second danger successfully encountered. Rome disarmed her formidable viceroys, as she had subdued and pacified her subject nationalities. Yet in a century and a half from the time of Constantine, the Western Empire fell, and the Eastern Empire in the course of three centuries lost many of its fairest provinces, and saw its capital besieged by foreign invaders. Having escaped the two principal maladies incident to great empires, she succumbed to some others, the nature of which we have now to consider.

The simple facts of the fall of the Empire are these. The Imperial system had been established, as I have shown, to protect the frontier. This it did for two centuries with eminent success. But in the reign of Marcus Aurelius, whose reign I have noted as marking the commencement of the second revolutionary period, there occurred an invasion of the Marcomanni, which was not repulsed without great difficulty, and which excited a deep alarm and foreboding throughout the Empire. In the third century the hostile powers on every frontier began to appear more formidable. The German tribes, in whose discord Tacitus saw the safety of the Empire, present themselves now no longer in separate feebleness, but in powerful confederations. We hear no more the insignificant names of Chatti and Chauci; the history of the third century is full of Alemanni, Franks, and Goths. On the eastern frontier, the long decayed power of the Parthians now gives place to a revived and vigorous Persian Empire. The forces of the Empire are more and more taxed to defend it from these powerful enemies. One emperor is killed in battle with the Goths, another is taken prisoner by the Persians.

But, strengthened by internal reforms, the Empire is found still capable of making head against its assailants. In the middle of the fourth century it is visibly stronger and safer than it had been in the middle of the third. Then follows the greatest convulsion to which human society is liable, that which is to the world of man what an earthquake is to nature, — I mean an invasion of Tartars. The Huns emerge from Asia, and drive before them the populations of Central Europe. The fugitive Goths crave admission into the Empire. Admitted, they engage in war with their entertainers. They defeat and kill an emperor at Adrianople. But again the Empire is avenged by Theodosius. In the age of his degenerate sons the barbaric world decisively encroaches on the Roman. There is a constant influx of Goths. Goths fill the Roman armies, and plunder the Empire under cover of a commission from the emperor himself. Rome is sacked by Alaric. Then most of Gaul, Spain, and afterwards Africa, are torn from the empire by an invasion half Teutonic, half Slavonic. Barbaric chieftains make and unmake the emperors of the West. At last they assume sovereignty in Italy to themselves, and the Ostrogothic kingdom is founded. The East, too, suffers gradually a great change of population. Greece is almost repeopled with Slaves and Wallachians. New kingdoms are founded on the lower Danube. In the seventh century Egypt and Syria are wrested from the empire by the Saracens.

This is what we commonly understand by the fall of the Empire. It was matched in war with the barbaric world beyond the frontier, and the barbaric world was victorious. But it would be very thoughtless to suppose that this is a sufficient account of the matter, and that the fortune of war will explain such a vast phenomenon. What we call fortune may decide a battle, not so easily the shortest war; and it is evident that the Roman world would not have steadily receded through centuries before the barbaric had it not been decidedly inferior in force. To explain, then, the fall of the Empire it is necessary to explain the inferiority in force of the Romans to the barbarians.

This inferiority of the Romans, it is to be remembered, was a new thing. At an earlier time they had been manifestly superior. When the region of barbarism was much larger; when it included warlike and aggressive nations now lost to it, such as the Gauls; and when, on the other hand, the Romans drew their armies from a much smaller area, and organized them much less elaborately, the balance had inclined decidedly the other way. In those times the Roman world, in spite of occasional reverses, had, on the whole, steadily encroached on the barbaric. The Gauls were such good soldiers that the Romans themselves acknowledged their superiority in valor; yet the Romans not only held their own against them, but conquered them, and annexed Gaul to the Empire. If we use the word "force" in its most comprehensive sense, as including all the different forces, material, intellectual, and moral, which can contribute to the military success of a nation, it is evident that the Roman world in the time of Pompey and Cæsar was as much superior in force to the barbaric world as it was inferior to it in the time of Arcadius and Honorius. Either, therefore, a vast increase of power must have taken place in the barbaric world, or a vast internal decay in the Roman.

Now the barbaric world had actually received two considerable accessions of force. It had gained considerably, through what influences we can only conjecture, in the power and habit of co-operation. As I have said before, in the third century we meet with large confederations of Germans, whereas before we read only of isolated tribes. Together with this capacity of confederation we can easily believe that the Germans had acquired new intelligence, civilization, and military skill. Moreover, it is practically to be considered as a great increase of aggressive force, that in the middle of the fourth century they were threatened in their original settlements by the Huns. The impulse of desperation which drove them against the Roman frontier was felt by the Romans as a new force acquired by the enemy.

But we shall soon see that other and more considerable momenta must have been required to turn the scale. For in the first place, if in three centuries the barbaric world made a considerable advance in power, how was it that the Roman world did not make an immensely greater advance in the same time? A barbaric society is commonly almost stationary; a civilized society is indefinitely progressive. How many advantages had a vast and well-ordered empire like the Roman over barbarism! What a step towards material wealth and increase of population would seem to be necessarily made when the bars to intercourse are removed between a number of countries, and when war between those countries is abolished! If in the first two centuries of the Empire there were bloody wars within the Empire, yet they were both short and very infrequent; the permanent condition of international hostility between the nations surrounding the Mediterranean Sea, which had preceded the Roman conquests, was a tradition of the past. Never since has there been over the same area so long a period of internal peace. If we were guided by modern analogies, we should certainly expect that, while barbarism made its first tottering steps in the path of improvement, the Empire would have made gigantic strides; that its population and wealth would have increased enormously; that instead of failing to defend the frontier it would have overflowed it at all points; and that it would have annexed and Romanized Germany with far greater ease than in Cæsar's time it had absorbed Gaul.

In the second place, the balance had already begun to turn before any new weights were put into the scale of barbarism. A long period intervened between the time when Rome was a conquering state and the time when it began to be conquered. During this interval barbarism had acquired no new strength, and yet the Romans had ceased to conquer.

And this must have been owing, not to any want of will, but to a consciousness of the want of power. For when Rome ceased to conquer, it was far more completely organized for military purposes and governed more exclusively by military men than in its period of conquest. With a citizen soldiery, summoned from farms and commanded often by civilians, Rome extended her boundaries widely; but with a magnificent standing army, with a crowd of experienced officers, and with an Emperor at the head of affairs, Rome ceased, except at long intervals, to conquer. The maxim of Augustus, that the Empire was large enough, can only mean that the limit of its resources had been reached, and that those resources for some reason or other, did not grow. And that the maxim was sound, and continued to be sound, is shown by Hadrian's reassertion of it when he gave up the Parthian conquests of Trajan, and later by Aurelian's evacuation of Dacia. Aurelian was a great general, Hadrian was an active and enterprising man. Both of them must have known that the easiest way to obtain popularity was to carry on wars of conquest. Both must have known that to give up conquests was the readiest way to offend the pride of the Romans, and to excite disaffection towards the government. We may therefore feel sure that it was neither love of ease nor a mere blind respect for a traditional maxim that induced these two emperors deliberately to narrow the boundaries of the Empire. They must have had a knowledge of the weakness and exhaustion of the State, and of its inadequacy to new conquests, so certain and clear as to silence all the suggestions of ambition and interest.

We are forced, then, to the conclusion that the Roman Empire, in the midst of its greatness and civilization, must have been in a stationary and unprogressive, if not a decaying condition. Now what can have been the cause of this unproductiveness or decay? It has been common to suppose a moral degeneration in the Romans caused by luxury and excessive good fortune. To support this it is easy to quote the satirists and cynics of the Imperial time, and to refer to such accounts as Ammianus gives of the mingled effeminacy and brutality of the aristocracy of the capital in the fourth century.

But the history of the wars between Rome and the barbaric world does not show us the proofs we might expect of this decay of spirit. We do not find the Romans ceasing to be victorious in the field, and beginning to show themselves inferior in valor to their enemies. The luxury of the capital could not affect the army, which had no connection with the capital, but was levied from the peasantry of the whole Empire, a class into which luxury can never penetrate. Nor can it be said that luxury corrupted the generals, and through them the army. On the contrary, the Empire produced a remarkable series of capable generals. From Claudius Gothicus to the patrician Aetius, a period of two centuries, the series is scarcely interrupted, and for the greater part of that time the government of the Empire itself was in the hands of men bred to war and accustomed to great commands. And as in better times, the Roman arms were still commonly victorious. Julian, fighting at great odds, defeated the Alemanni; Theodosius quelled the intruding Goths; Stilicho checked Alaric and crushed Rhodagais; the great Tartar himself, the genius of destruction, Attila, met his match in Aetius, and retreated before the arms of Rome.

Whatever the remote and ultimate cause may have been, the immediate cause to which the fall of the Empire can be traced is a physical, not a moral decay. In valor, discipline, and science the Roman armies remained what they had always been, and the peasant-emperors of Illyricum were worthy successors of Cincinnatus and Caius Marius. But the problem was how to replenish those armies. Men were wanting; the Empire perished for want of men.

The proof of this is in the fact that the contest with barbarism was carried on by the help of barbarian soldiers. The Emperor Probus began this system, and under his successors it came more and more into use. As the danger of it could not be overlooked, we must suppose that the necessity of it was still more unmistakable. It must have been because the Empire could not furnish soldiers for its own defence, that it was driven to the strange expedient of turning its enemies and plunderers into its defenders. Yet on these scarcely disguised enemies it came to depend so exclusively that in the end the Western Empire was destroyed, not by the hostile army, but by its own. The Roman army had become a barbarian horde, and for some years the Roman commander-in-chief was a barbarian prince, Ricimer, who created and deposed emperors at his pleasure. Soon after his fall, another barbarian occupying the same position, Odoacer, terminated the line of emperors, and assumed the government into his own hands.

Nor was it only in the army that the Empire was compelled to borrow men from barbarism. To cultivate the fields, whole tribes were borrowed. From the time of Marcus Aurelius, it was a practice to grant lands within the Empire sometimes to prisoners of war, sometimes to tribes applying for admission. Thus the Vandals received settlements in Pannonia, the Goths of Ulfilas in Mæsia, the Salian Franks along the Rhine. In these cases the Romans were not forced to admit the barbarians. If they were partly influenced by the wish to pacify them, it is certain also that there must have been a vast extent of unoccupied land which the Empire was glad to people in this way. However much disposed we may be to reject as rhetorical the descriptions of utter devastation along the frontier in which our authorities abound, it seems at least to be clear that, however many barbaric tribes might knock for admission, there was room for them within the Empire. Nor did these large loans of men suffice the Empire. It was perpetually borrowing smaller amounts. Under the name of Læti and Coloni, there seems reason to believe that the Empire was already full of Germans before the great immigrations began. It is easy to discover symptoms of every kind of decay in the Roman Empire. We may talk of oppressive taxation and the rapacity of officials; of the tyranny by which the curiales, or respectable middle class, of provincial towns were crushed; of the decline of warlike spirit shown by the high price of volunteers and the extensive practice of self-mutilation to avoid the conscription; of the general decline of warlike spirit.

But, however visible these symptoms may be, they must not divert our attention from the great symptom of all, the immediate and patent cause of the fall of the Empire, — that want of population which made it impossible to keep a native army on foot, and which caused a perpetual and irrepressible stream of barbaric immigration. The barbarian occupied the Roman Empire almost as the Anglo-Saxon is occupying North America: he settled and peopled rather than conquered it.

The want of any principle of increase in the Roman population is attested at a much earlier time.

In the second century before Christ, Polybius bears witness to it, and the returns of the census from the Second Punic War to the time of Augustus show no steady increase in the number of citizens that cannot be accounted for by the extension of the citizenship to new classes. A stationary population suffers from war or any other destructive plague far more and more permanently than a progressive one. Accordingly, we are told that Julius Cæsar, when he attained to supreme power, found an alarming thinness of population (δεινὴν ὀλιγοθροσύνην). Both he and his successor struggled earnestly against this evil. The grave maxim of Metellus Macedonicus, that marriage was a duty which, however painful, every citizen ought manfully to discharge, acquired great importance in the eyes of Augustus. He caused the speech in which it was contained to be read in the Senate: had he lived in our days, he would have reprinted it with a preface. To admonition he added legislation. The Lex Julia is the irrefragable proof of the existence at the beginning of the Imperial time of that very disease of which, four centuries after, the Empire died. How alarming the symptoms already were may be measured by the determined resolution with which Augustus forced his enactment upon the people, in spite of the most strenuous resistance. The enactment consisted of a number of privileges and precedences given to marriage. It was, in fact, a handsome bribe offered by the State to induce the citizens to marry.

How strange, according to our notions, the condition of society must have been; how directly opposite from the present one, the view taken by statesmen of the question of population; and how unlike the present one, the view taken by people in general of marriage, may be judged from this law. Precisely as we think of marriage, the Roman of Imperial times thought of celibacy, — that is, as the most comfortable but the most expensive condition of life. Marriage with us is a pleasure for which a man must be content to pay; with the Romans it was an excellent pecuniary investment,* but an intolerably disagreeable one.

Here lay, at least in the judgment of Augustus, the root of the evil. To inquire into the causes of this aversion to marriage in this place would lead me too far. We must be content to assume that, owing partly to this cause and partly to the prudential check of infanticide, the Roman population seems to have been in ordinary times almost stationary. The same phenomenon had shown itself in Greece before its conquest by the Romans. There the population had even greatly declined, and the shrewd observer Polybius explains that it was not owing to war or plague, but mainly to the general reluctance of his countrymen to rear families. If we can suppose a similar temper to have become common among the Roman citizens, it may still seem at first sight unlikely that the newly conquered barbarians of Gaul or Britain would fall into an effeminacy incident rather to excessive civilization. But there is reason to think, on the contrary, that the newly conquered barbarians were especially liable to it.

We know how dangerous is the sudden introduction of civilized habits and manners among barbarians. We know how fatally the contact of Anglo-Saxons has worked upon Indians, Australians, and New Zealanders. The effect of Roman civilization upon Gauls and Britons was similar, if we may take the evidence of Tacitus. They exchanged too suddenly a life of rude and violent adventure for the Roman baths and schools of rhetoric. The effect upon these races was an unnatural lethargy, and apparently also a tendency to decline in numbers. The Helvetians are spoken of by Tacitus as already almost extinct; and the Batavians who distinguish themselves by their high spirit in the wars of Vitellius and Vespasian, have entirely disappeared when their territory is occupied in the fourth century by the Franks.

It remains to point out that the circumstances of the Empire between the times of Cæsar and Constantine were such as rather to aggravate than mitigate the disease. One main reason why civilization in modern times is favorable to the growth of population is that it is industrial. The Anglo-Saxon subdues physical nature to his interest and convenience. Wherever he comes he introduces new industries. He contrives first to prosper, and next he increases. By his side the barbarian, skilled only in destruction, and without the inclination or talent to create anything, feels himself growing weaker and weaker, despairs, and then disappears. But Roman civilization was not of this creative kind. It was military, that is, destructive. The enormous wealth of the Romans had not been created by them, but simply appropriated. It had been gained, not by manufacture or commerce, but by war. And it had been gained by the concentrated effort of many successive generations. Probably such a great national effort cannot be maintained for so long a time without giving to the national character a fixed warp or bias. The military inclination would remain to the Romans even when they had lost the power to gratify it. The aversion to all the arts of creation would remain even when nothing but those arts could save them. In the most successful conquering race that has appeared since the Romans, — in the Turks, — the same phenomenon appears. They have lost the power to conquer, but they cannot acquire habits of industry and accumulation. Their nature has no versatility; it enjoys nothing between fighting and torpid inaction. They could win an empire, but having won it they allow it to fall into ruin. In a less degree the Romans seem to have had the same defect. There runs through their literature the brigand's and the barbarian's contempt for honest industry, — at least when that industry is not agricultural. To make wealth appears to them sordid; to take it admirable. And accordingly, when the limit of conquest and spoliation had been reached, a torpor, a Turkish helplessness, fell on them. They lived on what should have been their capital. Their wealth went to Asia in exchange for perishable luxuries, a general poverty spread through the Empire, and the unwillingness to multiply must have become stronger and stronger.

Perhaps enough has now been said to explain that great enigma, which so much bewilders the reader of Gibbon; namely, the sharp contrast between the age of the Antonines and the age which followed it. A century of unparalleled tranquillity and virtuous government is followed immediately by a period of hopeless ruin and dissolution. A century of rest is followed not by renewed vigor, but by incurable exhaustion. Some principle of decay must clearly have been at work, but what principle? We answer: it was a period of sterility or barrenness in human beings; the human harvest was bad. And among the causes of this barrenness we find, in the more barbarous nations, the enfeeblement produced by the too abrupt introduction of civilization, and universally the absence of industrial habits, and the disposition to listlessness which belongs to the military character.

A society in such a critical position as this can ill bear a sudden shock. The sudden shock came; "a swift destruction winged from God!" Aurelius, whose reign I have marked as the end of an age, saw the flash. We might say that Heaven, pitying the long death-struggle of the Roman world, sent down the Angel Azrael to cut matters short. In A. D. 166 broke out the plague. It spread from Persia to Gaul, and, according to the historians, carried off "a majority of the population." It was the first of a long series of similar visitations. Niebuhr has said that the ancient world never recovered from the blow inflicted upon it by the plague which visited it in the reign of Aurelius. We are in danger of attaching too little importance to occurrences of this kind. The historian devotes but a few lines to them because they do not often admit of being related in detail. The battle of Cressy occupies the historian more than the Black Death, yet we now know that the Black Death is a turning-point in mediæval English history. Our knowledge of the series of plagues which fell on the Roman world during the Revolutionary period from Aurelius to Diocletian, is extremely fragmentary. But the vastness of the calamity seems not doubtful, and it seems also clear that the condition of the Empire was just such as to make the blow mortal. It is also plain that the reconstructed Empire over which, when the Revolutionary period was past, Diocletian and Constantine reigned, was different in its whole character from the Empire of the Antonines, and that a new age began then which resembled the Middle Ages as much as it resembled Antiquity.

As the population dwindled, a new evil made its appearance. The expenses of government had always been great: when complete Oriental sultanism was introduced by Diocletian, they became enormous. And the demands of government reached their highest point when the population had been decimated (the word is probably much too weak) by the plague. The fiscus, which had always been burdensome, became now a millstone round the neck of the sinking Empire. The demand for money became as urgent as the demand for men.

A leading characteristic of the later Empire is grinding taxation. The government being overwhelmingly powerful, there was no limit to its power of extortion, and the army of officials which had now been created plundered for themselves as well as for the government. What the plague had been to the population, that the fiscus was to industry. It broke the bruised reed; it converted feebleness into utter and incurable debility. Roman finance had no conception of the impolicy of laying taxation so as to depress enterprise and trade. The fiscus destroyed capital in the Roman Empire. The desire of accumulation withered where government lay in wait for all savings, — locupletissimus quisque in prædam carreptus. All the intricate combinations by which man is connected to man in a progressive society disappeared. The diminished population lived once more as αὐτορροποί procuring from the soil as much as their own individual needs required, each man alone, and all alike in bondage to an omnipotent, all-grasping government. For safety they had given omnipotence to their government, but they could not give it the knowledge of political economy, nor the power to cure subtle moral evils. Accordingly, all the omnipotence of government was turned to increasing the poverty, and consequently the sterility, of the population.

I have not left myself space to describe in detail the pressure of the fiscus and the conscription upon the different classes of the people. It is related in many books with what malignant ingenuity the men of property everywhere were, so to speak, chained to the spot where they lived, that the vulture of taxation might prey upon their vitals; and how the peasantry were in like manner appropriated and enslaved to military service. But this oppression, to which government in its helplessness was driven, filled the cup.

I conceive that the downfall of the Empire is thus accounted for. Barbarians might enter freely and take possession. Vandal corsairs from Carthage might outdo the work of Hannibal, and Germany avenge at her leisure the invasions of Cæsar and Drusus, for the invincible power had been tamed by a slow disease. Rome had stopped, from a misgiving she could not explain to herself, in the career of victory. A century of repose had only left her weaker than before. She was able to conquer her nationalities. She centralized herself successfully, and created a government of mighty efficiency and stability. But against this disease she was powerless; and the disease was sterility. Already enfeebled by it she passed through a century of plague, and when the plague handed her over to the fiscus there remained nothing for the sufferer but gradually to sink. But the causes from which the disease itself had sprung were such as we can but imperfectly ascertain,—causes deeply involved in the constitution of society itself, and such as no statesmanship or philosophy then in the world could hope to contend with.

NOTE.—The Spectator, in a flattering notice of the first of these papers, asks for an explanation of the statement that the Senate was an assembly of life peers freely chosen. The magistrates were chosen by popular election, and election to the higher magistracies carried with it a permanent seat in the Senate. This is what I meant by calling it an assembly of life peers. I call it freely elected because every full citizen was eligible and had a vote. No doubt the great houses had such overwhelming influence that they could in ordinary times monopolize the magistracies. But until the Revolutionary period began, I do not think this influence had much coercion in it. The great families were really revered by the people, and were considered to have a sort of moral right to office.

FOREIGN NOTES.

THE obituary department, after continuing for a century, has been dropped out of the Gentleman's Magazine. Too many distinguished people died to please the editor.

A POOR woman named Fanny Oliver has been left for death on the scaffold at Worcester, England, because the one-hundredth part of a grain of arsenic was found in the stomach of her deceased husband!

A LONDON paper says, with cheerful bitterness: "Over and above all the delights of burlesque wherewith America is now inundated, one joy yet awaits that favored republic. The great Vance is going there. May his voyage be successful and his stay very, very long!"

It having been suggested that the English public should be made to repay the Duke of Edinburgh for the presents which he distributed in his recent colonial voyages, the Pall Mall Gazette wants to know if his Royal Highness has made over to the nation all the presents he received during that same pleasure tour.

It is stated that the Jewish Theological Society, comprising the most learned Rabbis in Germany, resolved at a recent sitting at Breslau to prepare an encyclopædia of the Talmud, for the purpose of facilitating and encouraging the study of that portion of their national literature which was lately introduced to the notice of the public in England and America.

HOWEVER great may be the late triumphs achieved by the Prussian army, it seems, nevertheless, to be the most unpopular service in Europe. The domineering of the officers, the poverty of the soldier, and the strictness of the discipline, render life to many almost intolerable. To prove this, it is necessary only to state that, according to German statistics, there were in 1868 no less than 134 suicides in the army of North Germany.

At a recent ball given by the Earl of Ellesmere, at Worsley Hall, the Prince of Wales surprised and delighted his fellow-guests, and established himself as a favorite forever in the county, by constituting himself a sort of dancing free rover, and requesting a tour de valse, after the French and Italian fashion, from the fair visitors all over the ball-room, whether he had made their acquaintance or not. Moreover, he gracefully avoided any appearance of being guided in his selection on the score of beauty alone. All this is said by Jenkins in the London papers.

At St. James's Theatre lately Mdle. Schneider met with an accident, which came near proving very serious. At the fall of the curtain in the last scene of Orphée aux Enfers her dress was ignited by the flame used in producing the effect of lightning, and in a moment was in a blaze. Great alarm and excitement prevailed, and two or three gentlemen jumped from the private boxes on the stage and from the stalls, but the actors who surrounded Mdle. Schneider quickly put out the flames. This was not done, however, until almost the whole of her dress had been destroyed. Mdle. Schneider escaped without the smallest personal injury.

THERE is a smart controversy going on just now among the Freemasons in England. A worthy brother, having spent several years in Australia, has returned, announcing as the fruit of his sojourn the discovery of various ancient mysteries. The Babylonian and Greek astronomy are pronounced to have been organized by Freemasons, and the Assyrian monuments in the British Museum to be nothing but illustrations of the same great fact. "The discoverer, of course," remarks the Athenæum, "has not been without the countenance of some of the more ignorant, if met by the contempt of the better informed. Some of the Masons are, however, very indignant at an attempt to represent that the key of cuneiform and hieroglyphic literature should be claimed to have been picked up by chance and hidden away as a Masonic secret; and they call on the inventor to publish his contribution, if he have any, to the stores of general knowledge, as they want no covert possession of it."

A MELANCHOLY little incident is related of the ex-Empress Charlotte. This unfortunate Princess has been staying for some time at Spa. The other day she insisted with such vehemence on playing at roulette that it was impossible to restrain her. On approaching the table she deliberately placed a gold piece on the number 19. The Emperor Maximilian was shot on June 19. The wheel turned, and, though thirty-seven chances were against her, she won. She smiled sadly, took up the money, and quietly left the room. On her way out a poor man passed by. She gave him all the money, with the injunction that he was to "pray for him." It is known that the Empress Charlotte never pronounces the name of Maximilian.

M^DLE. LUGUET, the daughter of M. René Luguet, of the Palais Royal, has died in Paris, in her sixteenth year. Her connection with the stage was remarkably close. She was granddaughter of the famous Madame Dorval, niece of M. Jacques Luguet, of the Théâtre Français at St. Petersburg, of M. Henri Luguet, director of the Théâtre de Thalie in Berlin, of M. Desrieux of the Vaudeville, and of Madame Marie Laurent and Madame Vigne. It was on her mother's sister, who died at the same age, that Victor Hugo wrote the bitter verse:—

"Nous songerons tous deux à cette belle fille
Qui dort là-bas sous l'herbe où le bouton d'or brille,
Où l'oiseau cherche un grain de mil,
Et qui voulait avoir, et qui, triste chimère !
S'était fait cet hiver promettre par sa mère
Une robe verte en Avril."

THE last number of Echoes from the Clubs has the following clever hit at a sport (pigeon-shooting) much affected by the upper classes in England.

"The pigeon tumbling in the azure air
Was dear to Aphrodite, long ago,
Yoked to her buoyant chariot, gay and fair,
It fluttered where her amorous banners glow;
But since those days the world has changed religions,
And different is the use we make of pigeons.

"Lord Vere de Vere (your pardon, Mr. Tennyson !)
Selects the pretty birds for ruthless murder;
Of the tottering Upper House a careless denizen,
He thinks there's nothing in the world abonder
Than talk of Irish Church and Pope's tiara.
No; he'll kill birds, and bring the Lady Clara.

"Ay, and the exquisite patrician creatures
Watch with bright, eager eyes the lifted trap,—
See scattered feathers with unruffled features,—
Laugh, when a dead bird soils a dainty lap.
Surely 'tis ladylike and innocent fun
To see birds mangled by his lordship's gun.

"Rats [pace, Mr. Gladstone !] are but vermin:
'Tis just as well to say I mean not those
That draw fat salaries, wear lawn and ermine,
Fight in the Commons, in the Lords repose—
But rats that in our larders play queer tricks,
And don't concern themselves with politics.

"And William Sykes [your pardon, Mr. Dickens !]
Thinks few amusements of the time are merrier
(Except the encounter of steel-spurred game chickens)
Than against rats to back his favorite terrier,— Vulgar and cruel the sport which William likes,—
But in the pit you don't see Mrs. Sykes."

SOME curious devices were resorted to at a recent ball given in Paris to amuse the Viceroy. New figures were invented for the after-supper cotillon. Large sealed envelopes were distributed among the ladies, who, opening them, found grotesque headdresses inside, with which they were expected to crown their partners. Crackers containing pieces of fancy costume were also pulled, between the figures of one of the dances, and the gentlemen had to wear the finery which fell to their share. In what was called the steeplechase dance the ladies received fans bearing the names of well-known race-horses, and the gentlemen cards similarly inscribed. At a signal the music struck up, and each gentleman hastened to discover the lady on whose fan was written the same name as on his card. Another fantastic novelty was the distribution of hoops among the gentlemen, one to each six. The six advanced to a lady, carrying their hoop between them, and on touching a spring it suddenly imprisoned the one destined to be the lady's partner. Both the Oriental visitors and the native visitors are said to have been much amused by these performances.

A PARAGRAPH has been round the scientific papers stating that a French naturalist has been measuring the tree-trunks in a forest, and has found them all broader in the east-west than in the north-south direction: the causes of the unsymmetry being ascribed, not very obviously, to the rotation of the earth. Well, another French Arborist has been similarly gauging the trees in the neighborhood of Toulouse, and he finds that the greatest swelling of their trunks is towards the east-south-east point of the compass. The explanation offered by this second investigator is more philosophical than that of his predecessor. He refers the deformation to the early morning sun, which warms the easterly parts of the tree more suddenly than the rest, stimulates the flow of the sap, which grows sluggish during the cool of the night, and draws up the nourishing moisture from the soil in greater abundance on the excited side than on those portions of the trunk where the warming is more gradual and its effects less active. Naturally, increased vitality of one side, be it animal or plant, results in development, or larger growth of that side. There are traditions of some plants turning their flowers towards the sun: the truth may be that the sun only promotes the growth of those blossoms upon which it sheds its direct warmth. As Dulong said, every degree of the thermometer entails a law of nature.

THE intellectual activity of a certain class of lunatics is curiously illustrated in the report on the lunatic asylums in Ireland which has lately been printed and laid before Parliament. A man named Joseph Langfrey escaped from the Central Asylum with two other patients, none of the party being looked upon as lunatics by the medical officers, although confined there as criminal lunatics. Mr. Langfrey was the leader of the fugitives, and is described as being of an extraordinary clever and ingenious mind. He could do things quite beyond what men in general can perform, and his cleverness was even exceeded by his versatility. He was a good shoemaker, a tailor, a weaver. He made from a scrap of iron a key by which he could open the door of his division. He put together a wooden sewing-machine of his own contrivance, with which he made clothes for himself; and his mind just before his escape seemed so intent on improving this machine that there was little apprehension of his attempting to escape. His career, it is stated, before he came to the asylum was most extraordinary. He had been in the British army, in the French army, and in the French navy; and had been in British, German, and Russian prisons. He had a grammatical knowledge of French, knew something of German and was completely self-taught; his age, although he had passed the various phases of existence above described, was only twenty-seven. He spoke well and reasonably, the great defect in his character being a fickleness of purpose. He had that rambling disposition that is never sated with travel and adventure; and if his principles were good and upright he would in all probability have had a distinguished career in life. Langfroy was, in fact, not unlike one of Ouida's heroes.

TRAVELLERS visiting Venice, says a London journal, ought to know of a spot whose very existence had been half forgotten, but which has lately been made accessible. Whether because of a general change in the relative level of the Venetian lagoons and the mud-islands that support the city, or of a local subsidence of the soil under the great weight of the Church of St. Mark, the ancient crypt gradually sank below the level of the adjoining canal. After several ineffectual attempts to resist the influx of water by raising the pavement, the effort was abandoned as hopeless. Somewhere about 1580 the original entrance was walled up; and for more than two centuries the place seems to have remained undisturbed. Soon after the Austrians became masters of Venice some ecclesiastical antiquary called to mind the fact that the marble coffin believed to contain the body of St. Mark had been left in the centre of the crypt, supported on four stone columns. The cathedral authorities were moved to action; an opening was made through one of the small windows in the vaulting of the roof. The crypt was found half full of salt water, but the precious relic, supported at a height of five feet above the pavement, was found untouched. It was solemnly raised into the church, where it has since remained, the opening was again closed, and for a further period of over sixty years one of the most curious portions of this wonderful fabric was lost to sight, — almost to memory. Thanks to the energetic intervention of Signor Torelli, the present active Prefect of Venice, it is now as accessible as when first constructed. When the water had been pumped out, and the layers of concrete removed that had been introduced to raise the level of the original pavement, there was no great difficulty in making the structure quite water-tight by means of excellent hydraulic cement, the materials of which are found near Bergamo. The architecture is of great interest, and will doubtless furnish matter for much discussion when more generally known.

FRENCH journalists and artists are seldom content with the names which Heaven has allotted them. The Frenchman is anxious, above all, that the name which he signs to an article, or which appears as his on a play-bill, shall have a striking, uncommon appearance which may separate its owner from the vulgar. For this reason a great many writers and actors adopt pseudonyms which cling to them through life, and by which they continue to be known even after death. A Parisian has just taken the trouble to write a book on the subject of this mania, and to unmask all his pseudonymous contemporaries for the edification of the public. We are told in this work that the name of Mme. George Sand is Dudevant; of M. de Persigny, Fialin; of Arsène Houssaye, Housset; of M. Granier de Cassagnac simply Granier (the "de Cassagnac" was tacked on when M. Granier became an official candidate); of Eugène de Mircourt the biographer, Gigot (there is some excuse here); of Michel Masson, author of the "Contes de l'Atelier," Gaudichot; of Belval, the singer, Gaffiot (these two are excusable again, — no Frenchman with such a name as Gaudichot or Gaffiot could make his way in France); of Mme. Carvalho, Carvailhe; of Marie Cabel, of the Opéra Comique, Cabu; of Father Hyacinthe, Loyson (Loyson means "the gosling"); and of the well-known restaurateur Peters, Fraise, i. e. strawberry, which name appears more appropriate than the pseudonym. It is rare that a Frenchman, being possessed of an authentic title, conceals it out of modesty; nevertheless, this happens in the case of Cham and Gill, the two caricaturists, the first of whom is Viscount de Noé, and the second Count de Guines, and in that of M. Henri Rochefort, who, as most people are aware, is Count de Rochefort Luçay.

THE last number of the North British Review contains an admirable paper on the reminiscences of the late Henry Crabb Robinson. After a careful examination of Mr. Robinson's extended work, the critic says: "Before taking leave of a Diary, which will doubtless become a favorite book with the lovers of our best literature, let us briefly indicate the character of its author as manifested in its pages, and as exhibited in his life.

"It is impossible to resist the impression that Mr. Robinson had much in common with Boswell. They both set up for their ardent worship men whom they regarded as matchless heroes. To Boswell, Dr. Johnson was a literary Jupiter. In his eyes, wisdom was incarnated in the person of the burly, pompous, dogmatic, and proud lexicographer. Less narrow in his tastes, and more accurate in his judgment, Mr. Robinson selected, from among the celebrities of his generation, Goethe and Wordsworth as the two men who were depositaries of the sacred fire. To their weaknesses he was not blind, but he was most considerate for their shortcomings. Nothing gave him greater pleasure than to spread abroad their fame. During his lifetime he succeeded in persuading many Germans to read the poems of Wordsworth, and in inducing many Englishmen to recognize the genius of Goethe. His Diary will continue the work. It will enable thousands to appreciate both these poets more highly than formerly, by enabling them to understand them better.

"Yet despite many points of resemblance, Mr. Robinson and Boswell were in essentials the antipodes of each other. Shrewd and sensible as Boswell undoubtedly was, he had in him an element of the buffoon. He was as happy to be made a show of himself, as to exhibit the excellences of his mind's idol. If he had not been extremely vain he would never have written a Life which will keep alive the memory of one who would otherwise have been wholly neglected by succeeding generations. But there was no screw loose in the character of Mr. Robinson. A clear head and a logical intellect kept him from committing any gross mistake owing to the intensity of his admiration for certain men. He was competent to judge of their quality. He did not hesitate to point out a blunder in a poem by Wordsworth, nor to admit that Goethe had made mistakes. He was a hero-worshipper, but no idolater.

"Mr. Robinson lived to a better purpose than merely reading poetry and collecting anecdotes.

His love of liberty was as profound as was his admiration of the beautiful in verse and prose. As a Dissenter he had experienced the deadening effects of intolerance. His efforts were naturally directed towards emancipating his brethren in the faith from the disabilities under which they pined. It was not till the middle of his life that he took up this work in earnest. In early manhood his religious opinions were lukewarm. As late as the age of forty, he wrote: 'Though I am not religious myself, I have great respect for a conduct which proceeds from a sense of duty, and is under the influence of religious feelings.' Afterwards, a reaction took place: he passed from the calm of indifference to the vehemence of conviction, and, formally professing himself a Unitarian, became one of the champions of his sect.

"Thinking that Dissenters should have the means of education within their reach, he actively co-operated with the founders of the London University. Believing that a training-school for Unitarians was desirable, he helped to found University Hall. He founded the Flaxman Gallery, which is not only one of the great attractions of University College, but is also the most splendid monument by which the genius of the great English sculptor could be honored and perpetuated. To the end of his life the promotion of the interests of these places of education was pursued by him with untiring energy. His greatest political triumph was the passing of the Act relating to Dissenters' Chapels, an Act of which he was the energetic promoter and zealous advocate, and of which the effect was to extend to Unitarians the legal protection enjoyed by other Dissenters.

"While the religious body of which Mr. Robinson was a member has the greatest cause to cherish his memory, his name and his good deeds will not fail to make a lasting impression on the public at large, when this Diary is in their hands, and its contents in their minds.

"Those who look back with pleasure to the time when they heard from the eloquent lips of the writer of the Diary many of the neatly phrased stories and pithy anecdotes with which it is filled will peruse it with the greater delight because the printed page, while recalling to their minds the image of the departed, is rich in materials wherewith to form an estimate of his disposition and talents, even more honorable and lofty than the flattering estimate which, during his lifetime, they had formed and cherished. It is a work to which no review can do full justice. In order to be thoroughly appreciated it must be read from beginning to end. The three volumes which compose it are large. Upwards of fifteen hundred pages are contained in them, yet there are few pages which the most exacting critic will desire to cancel, and there is not one which the sensible reader will pronounce to be dull. No small portion of the pleasure with which they will be read is owing to the care and discrimination with which the work has been edited. Dr. Sadler had at his disposal manuscripts of which but the thirtieth part has now been printed and given to the world. Additions and corrections may heighten the interest and increase the utility of a subsequent edition of this Diary. Still, we cannot more truthfully characterize and more justly commend the volumes before us than by pronouncing them invaluable to every student of English literature, and indispensable additions to every well-selected and really precious collection of English books.'

ARTHUR'S KNIGHTING.

I MIND me of Toraise in Carmelide:—

Plenary court with show and festival
Held King Leodegan that Whitsuntide.

By noon the busy cooks had served in hall
Pottage of herbs with spiceries and wine,

Boars' heads in aigrodouce and therewithal
Hérons and egrets in sauce Gamelyne,

Peacocks in pride in platters of pure gold,
And swans in silver served with galentine,

Bakemeats and venison and a store untold
Of savory breads, and flesh, and fowl, and fish,

Sallets and mortrews, fritters hot and cold,
Creams, cates, and jellies, many a lordly dish

Of pear and pippin, comfit-caraways,
Citron and dates, — a Cardinal could wish

No fairer garnish on his holy days.
And after every course the Sewer arrayed

A subtle fancy of Dame Fortune's ways:
First, Belisaire upon his throne displayed;

Next, the blind lazar cowering by the wall;
The third, in tattered weed, a beggar-maid;

And last, Cophetus's bride in crown and pall.
Dame Fortune's self the while in midmost place,

Poising her gilded limbs on her swift ball
Above the mast-head, with a silken lace

Bare up the mainsail of an argosy
Of beaten silver, that in hypocras

Swam idly, all becalmed in a Red Sea,
Among the isles of water-cake in sop.

And fair aloft, the minstrel-gallery
A ceilure starred with gold did overtop:

And ever among, the quire or played or sang
With citole, sackbut, sawtre, and sweet stop

Of clarifier and cornet, and the clang
Of timbrels and of tabors — pipe and lute

With their wild warble thrilling through the twang

Of harps and wail of melancholy flute.

To that high music every heart beat high
With knightly passion, and, when all was mute,

The young men did not think it much to die;
And graybeards knew that their old blood was young,

And looked upon the young men with a sigh.

Then forward stood a chorister and sung

Such sweet, sweet sorrow into his sweet lay
Of lovers' woe, that, ere the song was sung,

There was no warrior's eye but turned away
Lest it should meet his fellow's for the tear.

Ginevra looked at Arthur, but the gray
Of her bright eyne knew naught of lover's fear;

And when they met not his, the rebel blood
Flushed to the fair tip of her tingling ear,

As there before him teeth on lip she stood,
For that she knew she showed so beautiful

In the wild triumph of that sovran mood,
And grugged that he should see not. Was he dull,

And drank that philtre of sweet sound in vain,
That thus he looked away, nor cared to lull

The divine longing of love's hunger-pain
By feeding in her eyes his love with love?

He saw not, — no! Nor, though he stared amain,

Saw he the banners blazoned bright above

The starry ceilure. Not until the stir
After the song, when all the guests 'gan move,

Did her true lover think to look at her.

And then, pardie, her eyes were otherwhere :

For lo, past truncheoned steward and cellarer
Who stood beside the cupboard, mazed with care

Of the great goblets and the cups of state,

Limped Trone the jester, with a Kaiser's air,

His kingly train upborne by an ape sedate,

And four white poodles, two on either side,

Marching upright, but sad, as if the fate

Of courtier-life bore hardly on their pride,

And those gay silken masquer weeds they wore

Repaid not half what they must needs abide

As hangers-on to majesty so poor.

Long laughter shook the hall at that strange show,

Which waxed amain when on the lower floor

The motley knave, with many a mop and mow,

Bade all his four-foot courtiers dance and leap,

Just as a king might bid his dukes do so.

The feasters laughed and drank, and they drank deep

Of those tall flagons, and the butler's wand

Waved for fresh vintage with a lordly sweep.

Ginevra raught a wine-flask from the stand

Brimmed with the ripest, and at Arthur's knee

Knel, a deep beaker in her dainty hand,

Gemmed all within with jewels that make flee

All taint and venom from the faery brim,

And humbly proffered her new lord. But he,

Shamed that such service should be done to him

By her who was his worship, bade her rise.

"Nay," quoth the Sire, "fair knight, in life and limb

We are all thine. Let be, the girl is wise."

Then Arthur drank and gave her back the cup;

But still she knelt beside him, and her eyes

Betrayed no signal as she raised them up

Of woman's art in the child's artlessness,

As if she wondered how her lord should sup.

Yet inly knew she all her loveliness:

The pilch of velvet, parted white and blue,

Reversed with ermines for an emperess,

All overt on the sides, where shimmered through

The kirtle's silken warp with west of gold

From looms of Baldack — O, full well she knew

The needled broderie wrought on every fold, —

Those smiling suns above and sunflowers three

Under each sun, with faces broad and bold

Staring upon him through their greenery

Of sheeny leafage; all along the hem

A rienz plus bas jeo ne me tourne mie

Figured in umber, and on every stem

Solleil m'attire on scroll of argent grain; —

The glistening girdle broched with pearl and gem,

The gipciere silver-guarded and its chain,

The coronal of gold and golden net, —

Full well she knew she wore them not in vain,

But knew no less herself was mightier yet.

The joyous witchcraft of her sunny hair,

The spell of eyes that dimmed the eyes they met,

Even the sigh that half betrayed how fair

The rosy promise of the imperial breast,

Guising an art to tell how, pillowed there,

Her love, the sovran of the world, might rest

In empire sweeter than the sway of kings.

So, for the night was waxing, host and guest

Betook them to their chambers, and the things

Which showed so mighty faded while they slept

Utterly even as fond imaginings,

And no man knew that he had laughed or wept.

But not forgetful of sweet life they lay,

For each, almost ere midnight tolled, had leapt

Forth from his couch to busk him for the day.

Then on the dais a carpet of fine Tars

Was spread in hall, where grooms and pages gay,

With tapers twinkling under the gold stars,

Lighted the bare-armed, leathern-aproned band

Who cased us in our harness for the wars.

And 'mid the clang, a squire on either hand,

Came Arthur's self, and on the carpet doffed

His mantle blue of cloth of Samarcand,

Unhasped the jewelled girdle, and aloft

Lifted the velvet coat, and set aside

The banded shoon of cheveril white and soft.

Then stately through high hall in seemly pride,

Among the clashing press, that Peerless One

Stepped with such gait as might besem the bride

Of empire peerless underneath the sun.

Yet to her lord right maidenly she spake,

Bidding good morrow: "Nay," quoth she, "by none,

Save mine own hands, sweet Sire, for knighthood's sake

Shalt thou be armed this day." — With that she set

Upon the kingly cycladoun of lake

The hacketon all lined with sarcinet,

Orfreyed without with crescents of thin gold

Upon the buckskin; next the solleret

She fitted on each foot with fold on fold

Of overlapping steel and toe-piece keen,

Like scale and sting of hornet; next in hold

She locked his thews in greaves of damasked

shoon

Of Milan; next the cuisses featously

She hasped upon his thigh, and fair between

Buckled the knee-piece underneath the knee;

Vambrace and brassart next, and elbow-plato

As squire who knew full well where each should be.

Upon his arms she jointed in due state,

And shelled the shoulders in their silver scale.

Then, o'er the pourpoint, heeding not the weight,

Defly she donned the jesseraunt of mail;

And over that, the jupon, blazoned fair

With fiery dragon swindging his huge tail,

And brodered bordure, wrought in leafage rare

Of braided strands of silk incarnadine.

Then on the golden glory of his hair

With gently steadfast hand and earnest eyne,

As if she offered up a kingly gift

With solemn pageant at a saintly shrine,

With arms upstretched before him did she lift

The bascinet all burnished, rich inlaid

With golden damask, then with fingers swift

Made fast the fringe of camail fair displayed;

Drew on the gauntlets with their gadlings gilt

And tasselled hems with knotted silk arrayed;

And kneeling then, the spurs he won in tilt

On the first day he armed him, on his heel

She set and buckled. Defly thus she built Around her love that sheeny tower of steel. —

But more was wanting. Still upon one knee

Beside her new lord did the proud one kneel,

And from the blushing page took reverently

The faery wonder of Escalibor

With all its wealth of jewelled wizardry

Wherewith to gird her knightly bachelor :

Baldrick and hilt and scabbard, — not a gem
But flashed with virtue for a conqueror : —

This ruby once on Judith's diadem

Blazed like a star, — that diamond clasp of yore

Girdled the Wise King in Jerusalem :

Yet all not worthier than the blade they bore,

Forged in the caverns of the Enchanted Lake

By Weland, snapped and forged again thrice o'er,

Graven with names whereat the foul fiends quake

In potent rune and mystic sign enscrolled ;

Then for the first time did the fair hand shake,

Yet tongued the buckle smoothly on the fold

And the rich ends in a loose knot let fall.

So rose she, proudly smiling to behold

Her knight and king, how comely and how tall
He showed in that fair labor of her hand.

Yea, and beside her others smiled in hall ;

For watching the sweet pair anigh did stand

Her sire and Merlin, with such thoughts as stir

Old hearts at sight of young love, 'mid a band

Of gaping losels, page and armorer.

Then spake old Merlin with his sour-sweet smile,

By name to Arthur, but as much to her : —

" Fair sir, in Logress, in the minster-aisle

Of sweet Saint Steven erst thou didst receive

At pious Dubric's hand the name and style

Of a true knight, but now thou wouldst achieve

A dearer honor, — now almost 't is thine

To be love-knighted. By this lady's leave

One thing alone is lacking." — Her full eyne

Ginevra flashed upon that wizard gray,

As Arthur asked : " What lacketh, master mine ?

No rite shall fail my chivalry this day

From whence I date my knighthood, for till this

I have but jested." Then quoth Merlin : " Nay,

'T is but a trifle, — let the lady kiss,

And thou, fair sir, art knight for evermore ! "

" Sweet Sire," quoth she, " King Arthur shall not miss

For gift so small his knighthood. If my lore
Be nothing in this matter, pardon me :

Yet as to kisses, I am not so poor

That I can spare none." Then full maidenly

Her rosy lips she lifted to her lord

And kissed him in all stateliness ; but he Caught her in both arms and without a word

Repaid the kiss thrice o'er and thrice to boot.

O, but no rune nor gem on belt or sword

Could stay the trembling that from head to foot

Shook the new knight in that encounter sweet,

No harness ward the wound from his heart's root.

So kissed those lovers. Fleet and few, how fleet,

How few, from the first cradle to the last,

Those high eternal moments ! O, the beat

Within their pulses made our own beat fast

And dimmed our eyes with pity and regret.

Or do we now grow old, and fondly cast

A sadness on the joy we half forget,

Clouding with sorrows of our old the youth

We do remember to remember yet ?

We know not now. But even thus in sooth

Those lovers kissed, and we who saw them kiss

Look back and see them still with such deep ruth

As maketh old men weep at sight of bliss ; —

Still feel the whisper which we could not hear :

" All eyes are staring, — loose me after this."

So slipped she from his arms with gracious cheer,

Ruddy for maiden shame, yet not the less

Proud, not alone of her own knight sans peer,

But proud that all should see that fond caress.

Then Arthur turned as one but half awake,

Drunken with that deep draught of loveliness,

Dazed with his dreams of conquest for her sake

And bliss to be. But when his eye did light

On her sad-smiling sire, a flush 'gan break

Into his brow, with love's own wanness white ;

And when beyond he felt the glittering blue

Of Merlin's eye, he crimsoned through outright ;

For well that bridegroom knew that Merlin knew

His lawless other love and its wild sin, —

Sin unto death, even though all else be true.

But Merlin spake : " Hereafter thou shalt win
Glory undying, such as never yet

Was e'er achieved by prince or paladin.

Yea, there be mighty names that men forget,

And all our life is but a little space,

And soon we shall lie still for all our fret.

Our day is short, and night comes on apace,

And then we shall not know sorrow nor bliss,

Nor toil nor rest, nor recollect the face

Of man nor woman. Yet by that sweet kiss

To the world's end men shall remember thee !

They shall remember, yea, and more than this :

King thou art now, and king again shalt be

Hereafter in this land of Bloy Bretayne ;

For though thou go away, and shalt be free

No less than others from the toil and pain,

Thou shalt not die as others, nor the years

Shall waste no glory of thy secret reign

In realm of Faery, whence among thy peers

Thou shalt return to rule in sight of all

That shall have eyes to see thee through their tears

Of joy that after so long interval

Their own King Arthur doth come back to men."

So Merlin spake, and we, who stood in hall,

Were mute for musing. But Ginevra then

As one whom joy and doubt at once o'erwhelm,

Hearing how he, her lord, should come agen,

Yet naught of her, the lady of his realm, —

Stepped forth once more and with firm hand did don

Over the knight's steel cap the kingly helm,

Windowed and pranked with gold, and thereupon

A chaplet wrought with leaf of lily and vine,

Beaten in gold, — a Jew's-work pentagon

Under each foil, inwrought with subtle twine

Of stones of empire on the sheeny rim.

Then Merlin came, saying : " The last is mine,"

And set above the helm a crest to dim

All gold and gemwork flash they as they might ;

The Dragon-royal, through whose every limb

The lifeblood beat in pulses of quick light ;

Yet stirred it not, save that its snaky tail

It curled in glancing folds, and fiery bright

It breathed a flame, red-mirrored in the mail.

So strode the King full kingly to the gate,

Where in gay trappings o'er the burnished scale

Bridged by the saddle, his tall steed did wait

And neighed to greet his monarch as he strode

And swung into the stirrups in all state.

Sadly those lovers each bade each to God ;

For glory is sweet but love is loath to go ;

And through the straight lane clattering forth
we rode

With folded gonfanons and lances low.

A ROMANCE OF FLORENCE.

BY THOMAS ADOLPHUS TROLLOPE.

THE historian Migliori, writing in the latter half of the seventeenth century, enumerates twenty-three different visitations of pestilence in Florence, of which the earliest recorded occurred in 1325, and the last in 1630. That of the year 1400 is the eighth in Migliori's catalogue. It was not so great or terrible an infliction as that of 1338, which is well known as the plague described by Boccaccio; but the mortality was very large, and the depopulation of the city considerable.

In the midst of this time of trouble and sickness died Ginevra Agolanti, nata Almieri. She had been married to Francesco Agolanti only four years, and she was still in the prime and the pride of her remarkable beauty. She was, we are assured, the most beautiful woman of her time in Florence. Her marriage with Francesco Agolanti, however, had been by no means a happy one, — for the very sufficient reason that, when forced by her father into a marriage with him, her affections had already been bestowed upon another. Ginevra loved and was loved by Antonio Rondinelli, an ancestor of one of the historians, who has preserved the record of Ginevra's story. But the love of Antonio Rondinelli and Ginevra Almieri was as hopeless a passion as that which existed between Romeo and Juliet, and for the same reason. Of course, in those mediæval Italian cities, — in which the society was always divided into two at least, if not more, factions, between whom an internecine feud and hatred raged, — such difficulties, issuing in more or less tragic catastrophes, were always occurring. Far too blind to recognize party badges, Don Cupid was continually ignoring the difference and incompatibilities that separated Guelphs from Ghibellines, Montacuti from Capuleti, Bianchi from Neri, Panciatichi from Cancellieri, and often even those existing between patricians and plebeians.

Between the Almieri and the Rondinelli there could be neither marrying nor giving in marriage. Not only were the two families opposed in the burning politics of the day, but the Almieri were a house of old patrician stock, while Rondinelli was the descendant of one of those plebeians who had led the populace against the magnates in 1343! Better might a daughter of the Almieri love one of her father's serving-men than fix her affections on a Rondinelli! But in that time and clime, the papas of marriageable daughters were wont to make very short work of any such erratic fancies. Each free citizen, who was ready at any moment to upset the whole order of society for the securing of political liberty, was a thoroughly despotic master of his own household. And so Ginevra was summarily bidden to accept Francesco Agolanti as her husband; and she never dreamed of refusing to do so!

We do not hear any word, of any sort, which could lead to the belief that Ginevra was otherwise than a blameless wife. Those who are familiar with the records of Florentine society as it existed under the principality of the Medici may be inclined either to doubt the existence of such virtue under such circumstances, or, at least to credit Ginevra with the possession of a very rare and matchless standard of female duty. But it must be remembered that the manners and morals of the republic, in such respects, were not as the manners and morals of Florence under the Medici. The "magnificent" Lorenzo had not done his work upon Florentine society in the days when duty separated Ginevra Almieri from Antonio Rondinelli. And the unloving wife remained prudently and dutifully at home, within the dark and gloomy walls of her husband's house, in the Corso degli Adimari, a narrow lane between high prison-like buildings, which, up to the year 1840, or thereabouts, occupied the upper part of the now well-known and modernized Via Calzainoli.

So much it was in her power to do! But at the end of four years she seemed to be able to bear so sunless, so cheerless, so hopeless a life no longer. She fell into a state of languor from which nothing could rouse her: and then, the flickering lamp of her life burning lower and lower, she fell asleep!

It was a very suspicious thing in those days to fall ill, and a still more suspicious thing to die! The first thought of the surviving relatives of any one unkind enough to die in the midst of them was to get rid of the body as soon as possible. Short time was allowed for religious rites, and small thought was given to ceremony of any kind! Well if prompt burial could be attained! The poor could not always attain it. They were obliged to content themselves with throwing their dead into the public streets, to be picked up by the dead carts of the company of the Misericordia as soon as they could be attended to. But a lady of the house of Agolanti could command interment as prompt as the fears of her bereaved husband could desire. And Ginevra was wrapped in a shroud, and hurried away to the sepulchre which has been described above, within a few hours after closing her eyes.

Ginevra, however, was not dead, nor had she been in any wise stricken by the pestilence. It had been simply a case of suspended animation, from which the unfortunate young wife awoke a few hours after she had been consigned to the vault of the Agolanti. Happy that it was a vault, and not a grave! Happy that in that time of panic and of death, no thought of a coffin had been allowed to interfere with the promptness of the interment! The tomb, hastily opened by means of the round stone opening on the steps of the cathedral which formed its means of access, had received the body swathed in a shroud, and had been as hastily closed. Ginevra waked from her trance to find herself in darkness in a cold, damp air, and bound! She called aloud in the utter stillness, and the strange dull echo from the vaults—the sole result of her cries—startled her with a horrible suspicion of the truth! Perhaps she felt that those who had laid her there in such haste had been only too glad of any colorable excuse for making all speed to do so!

For a while the horror of her position overcame her, and she sank back, almost returning to a state of unconsciousness, and almost content to do so! At two-and-twenty, however, the instinctive love of life speaks strongly, and it forbade Ginevra to yield without a struggle to her fate.

After some efforts she succeeded we are told, in liberating her hands from the swathing bands that confined them, and, that having been accomplished, had then less difficulty in liberating her feet from their ligatures. And then the dreadful suspicion that had flashed upon her mind became a certainty. She felt the damp, cold, sunless ground; she was conscious of the heavy and foul odor of death; her hands encountered dreadful objects, the nature of which imagination but too readily suggested.

And all was utter—utter darkness!

Nor had she any means of guessing the locality of her prison-house. For four short years only a wife, it had never chanced that she had been made acquainted with the burying-place of the family of which she had become a member. Some patrician families buried in one church, and some in another. In most cases the vaults beneath the pavements of the churches were closed by enormous flagstones, shut down by masonry, and as much beyond her power to move them as it would have been to lift the Duomo! Ginevra had many a day tripped lightly over those huge stones, sculptured mostly with the arms of the family whose dead reposed below. And her heart sunk dead within her as she thought of the utter hopelessness of escaping from a prison so closed.

Again, again, and again she raised her voice to its utmost power, and strained her ear in the clinging hope of catching some answering sound. But all was dead, dead silence,—silence as intense as the intensity of the dreadful darkness.

Some three hours, as it was calculated afterwards, she must have passed amid the horror of that dreadful place, and the agonies of gathering despair. Hideous nameless terrors,—dread of what might meet her touch if she moved from the spot on which her body had been laid, or attempted with groping hands and step to explore the limits of her prison-house, prevented her from changing her place. And she had sunk down on the earth again almost maddened by the horrors of her position and the prospect of the dreadful death before her, when suddenly she almost fancied that she saw a gleam of light. It was very faint and fitful, sometimes a little more decided and sometimes fading away, till Ginevra found it impossible to decide whether the appearance was real or only the product of her imagination. Gradually, however, the pale gleam, shining into that depth of darkness became stronger,—not sufficiently strong to illumine any part of the vault in such sort as to render the objects in it visible; but strong enough to set at rest the doubt whether indeed a ray of blessed light had really penetrated into that horrible charnel-house. Yes! from a quarter of the vault opposite to her, there certainly was shining, and now more steadily, a ray of light!

The first notion that struck Ginevra was that the ray must proceed from the candles carried in the procession of some sacred function going on in the church which was doubtless over her head. And the notion brought with it a gleam of hope. If, as might be expected, the procession should pass over the pavement above her, or even near to the place of her imprisonment, might she not hope to make her voice heard? She strained her ear, but all was still,—utter, utter silence. Still her heart beat wildly with hope! The bearers of the candles that cast the blessed ray of light were doubtless still in a far part of the church. They would come nearer. And again she listened intently, with organs stimulated to the utmost to catch the faintest sound,—in vain! Strange that no footstep should be audible! Strange that there should be no sound of chanting voices! And then, sudden as the death-stroke of a dagger, shot into her mind the thought that, if those who were moving and doubtless chanting aloud in the church above were inaudible to her, her voice would necessarily be inaudible to them.

With desperate force she shrieked with cry redoubled upon cry, till her parched throat refused to give forth sound! Still only those hideous mocking echoes answered; and then all was again silence,—the silence of the tomb!

Still the light!—and now certainly stronger!—strong enough she thought to enable her straining eyes to distinguish that the space immediately in front of her—between her and the light—was void and unencumbered by any object. Fearfully and slowly, with half-outstretched hands, she grasped her way towards the side from which it came. And presently she encountered something, from which her first impulse was to withdraw her hand, as if it had burned her. Gradually and cautiously, however, venturing again to put her hand to it, the feel of it did not shock her with the sensation that the other objects she had touched had produced. It was wood evidently, dry and clean apparently, unlike all else in that horrible place. A little further examination showed that the thing first touched was evidently one of the rungs of a ladder! And the light came from immediately above it!

Another momentary flash of hope! followed quickly by the despairing thought of the impossibility that her strength should suffice to move one of those huge gravestones which her eye had so often rested on with indifference, even if she was enabled to reach it.

Nevertheless, slowly, hesitatingly, cautiously, she climbed the ladder step by step. A very few of them brought her into contact with the vaulting of the sepulchre; and then the small orifice from which the light streamed was immediately above her, and within her reach. A little more exertion enabled her to bring her eye close to the opening.

And lo, the moon!—the moon placidly sailing in tranquil silence in the clear blue sky!

The moon! Where, then, could she be? Where had they hurried her so impatiently to her grave? There was then no dark vault, no dark church nave above her, only the blue vault of heaven!

Again she placed her eye close to the hole from which the light streamed, and strove to catch the form of some object that might enable her to guess the locality of her place of sepulture.

A tall black line—a tower!—yes, evidently a dark tower between her and the moonlight! And,—stay! yes! surely, now coming within the range of her sight, figures of men!—living men!—at no great distance near the tower's base!—men with flambeaux, conducting a cart drawn by oxen!

Suddenly the truth flashed upon her mind. The tower was the tower of the Guardamorto, the dead-house of Florence, and the tomb of which she was the living occupant was one of those under the marble steps at the west front of the cathedral.

That there were sepulchres of several of the patrician families of Florence beneath those steps Ginevra knew well. For often and often, like the other maidens and young men of the city, had she sat on those steps to enjoy the cool evening hour after a blazing summer's day. It was one of the coolest places to be found within the walls; and it was a common summer habit with the Florentines to go and sit there for the double enjoyment of the coolness and that social chat so dear to every Florentine man or woman. So general was the habit that, andiamo ai mormi,—literally, "let us go to the marbles,"—was well understood to mean an invitation to go and sit on the cathedral steps. Yes! many a lovely moonlight night like that she was now looking out on, had Ginevra sat on the stones which now formed her prison, listening too well, perhaps, to forbidden whisperings from Antonio Rondinelli, to have ever noticed that the Agolanti, among others, had their place of burial there.

And there was the black old tower of the Guardamorto just opposite, by the southern side of the baptistery. It formerly stood just on the spot at the corner of the Via dé Calzainoli, where the beautiful little loggia of the hospital of the Bigallo now stands, and was the place, as its name imports, to which the Florentine dead were consigned previously to their interment.

In that autumn of 1400, the space at the foot of the grand old Guardamorto tower was the likeliest in all Florence to find men stirring and abroad in the dead of the night. For few were the hours in that time of pestilence during which no dead were brought to the dead-house!

With what frantic eagerness did Ginevra cry aloud as she saw what appeared the certainty of help so near her! But the cruel vault shut in her voice. The rough men intent on their hideous and dangerous duty, and eager only to have done with it as soon as possible, heard her not, and probably would have paid little attention, if they had heard it, to any night-cries disturbing the silence of the plague-stricken yet often roystering city.

Quickly depositing their horrible cargo within the dead-house, the men with their cart and flambeaux hurried off, the silence once more unbroken, and the placid moonlight unbroken by their hideous shadows. And that hope faded from the mental vision of the poor prisoner!

Thus left alone with her terrible thoughts, however, Ginevra suddenly bethought her that she had formerly seen and noted—noted mechanically, as one does that which is of no sort of interest to us —that the sepulchres under the steps of the cathedral were closed, not with huge flagstones, as large as the vault itself, such as she had seen in the floors of the churches, but with circular stones not more than two feet in diameter. And it struck her that if the approach to the place she was in were thus closed, and if the stone were not fastened down by cement, it might not perhaps be impossible for her to move it from its place.

With some difficulty, and after several trials, she did at last succeed in getting her shoulder into such a position that she could bring the whole strength of her muscles to bear with an upheaving force on the stone above her,—and with a desperate effort did heave it from its place.

And there was the way open before her to return once more from the charnel-house to the haunts of the living!

Slowly and with difficulty raising herself through the aperture, she crept forth; and, exhausted by the effort not less than by the emotions she had undergone, she sat herself down to rest awhile on the old familiar steps where she had so often sat before.

To rest awhile,—and to think! The whole of the Piazza San Giovanni was as silent as the charnel-house from which she had escaped. Since the men who had brought the cart of plague-stricken dead to the Guardamorto had gone off, no living soul had been visible, and no sound of life had been audible! And there sat Ginevra by the side of the open sepulchre in her grave-clothes! And as she sat thinking what next she should do, the moon, which had served her so well to light the way to her escape, hid herself behind the clouds; the sky became overcast, and the first drops of a shower began to fall. Autumnal rains come heavily in southern latitudes when they do come. They come with a bleak and pitiless Libeccio wind from the Leghorn coast; and in another ten minutes poor Ginevra, in her ghostlike toilet, was wetted to the skin and shivering with cold.

So with a piteous and wistful look around the desolate piazza, she rose from her seat, having made up her mind to go to her husband's house. It was not far off. She had to pass beneath Giotto's campanile tower, to cross the open space around the cathedral, and then to turn down a small narrow street which opens out of the Piazza del Duomo, to the southward, and passing by the side of the oratory of the company of the Misericordia, would bring her to the door of the Palazzo Agolanti, the front of which was in the Corso degli Ademari.

Rising from her seat on the marble steps not without an effort,—for she was now suffering from the reaction following the terrible tension of mind and nerve during the last hour or more, and was wet to the skin, and shivering with cold,—she drew the one garment that covered her (her shroud) around her, and cowering along beneath the shadow of the broad eaves of the houses through the silent and solitary street, soon reached the door of the Palazzo Agolanti.

Timidly using the huge knocker, she let it fall on the hammer, and started as the sound echoed through the narrow, silent street, and rumbled in the large, empty, vaulted hall of the Palazzo. Long and patiently she waited, though shaking in every limb and ready to drop. But no answer came to her summons. Again and again, knocking at last more boldly and with more decision, she tried to obtain some answer. At last Francesco Agolanti himself, her husband, appeared at an upper window, and demanded who disturbed the house and the neighborhood at that hour of the night?

"Francesco! It is I, Ginevra! your unfortunate wife! It is I, Francesco! For the love of God, open the door!"

In the bad and miserable days of that memorable autumn, men were living in Florence amid daily recurring scenes of horror and dismay, — amid sights and sounds and emotions calculated to foster every sort of superstitious dread, and to keep the nerves strung to an abnormal degree of tension. The Florentine of the old republic, like his descendant of the present day, was in ordinary circumstances little given to trouble himself with thoughts and fancies connected with the denizens of another world. But death in those days was rife around him, — that portal of the unseen world was so constantly and so widely open, that in derogation of their ordinary habits of mind, men were prone to imaginations which would not otherwise have assailed them, and were led to fancy that the widely opened and constantly traversed way leading from this world to the other might possibly be more than in ordinary times repassed by those who had already travelled it, as it was more frequently traversed by those departing hence.

And under the impression of such emotions and of the astonishment and dread of the moment, Francesco Agolanti doubted not that the ghostlike figure, clothed in the garments of the grave, who thus in the stillest hour of the night revisited her once home, was in truth an unblessed wandering spirit from the other world whose proper abiding-place was — at all events, not amid the haunts of living men and beneath the glimpses of the moon! Perhaps, also, four years of unloving wedlock had left a consciousness in Francesco's heart that the spirit of his wife, doomed or permitted to revisit thus the scenes of her past life, had not resought her married home with any feeling or purpose that could tend to render her an agreeable or desirable visitor there.

So Ginevra's husband, hastily muttering such Latin words of adjuration as the amount of his acquaintance with church formulas rendered possible to him, bade the unquiet ghost begone to her own place; and slamming to the heavy wooden shutter, hastened back to bury himself under the bedclothes, which were no doubt in those days, as in these, known to be the safest refuge from all ghostly visitors, — perhaps from the non-conducting qualities of the blankets!

Thus repulsed, the unhappy woman turned from the unopening door, and dragged herself to the house of Bernardo Almieri, her father. It was situated behind the Church of St. Andrew, in the Mercato Vecchio, not far from the river. But there, too, she met with a similar reception; and at the house of an uncle who lived hard by it was the same thing. No one would believe that that ghostlike figure of one whom they all knew to be dead and buried, thus wandering about the city in her grave-clothes in the dead of the night, was other than a denizen of the world of spirits, who ought not by any means to be encouraged in such unholy and uncanny practices.

Refused and rejected on all hands, poor Ginevra began to give herself up to despair. Was then the open tomb which she had left really the only asylum in which to hide her head? Were all who had known her determined to hunt her back into the grave into which they had prematurely hurried her? Retracing her steps towards the cathedral, as if really with the object of going back to the tomb, to which everybody bade her to return, she wandered up the Via Calzainoli, and, passing by the Loggia di San Bartolomeo, which then, but now no longer, existed there, laid herself down under the arches of it to die.

And lying there she bethought her that there was yet one other person in the world who had once known her well, and who possibly might — for the sake of old long since vanished days — find the heart to welcome her even though she came to him in her grave-clothes! Would Antonio Rondinelli, who had so worshipped that poor form of hers when decked in other fashion, turn from it with terror and loathing when clad in cerements? Rondinelli, the first and only one who had ever poured a love-tale in her ear, the only man she had ever loved — would he, too, drive her from his door? It is easy to understand all the feelings which would naturally oppose themselves to the idea of her seeking an asylum in Rondinelli's house. But, driven as she was from door to door, despairing, and feeling like to die, she once more dragged herself to her feet from off the pavement of the Loggia di San Bartolomeo, and with tottering steps made her way to the Palazzo Rondinelli.

Once more she knocked; and more timidly this time, when an upper window was opened, cried, —

"It is I, Ginevra! Do you not know me, Signor Antonio? It is I. Neither my husband nor my father will open their doors to me! Will you, too, drive me away?"

Perhaps Antonio Rondinelli had that in him which Francesco Agolanti had not; and thence it had come to pass that Ginevra had loved the one and could never find in her heart any love for the other. Perhaps, though Love may be blind, there are some things which the eyes that he has touched can see more unmistakably than any other eyes whatever! At all events, the possibility that Ginevra herself in the flesh was standing before his door had more weight with Rondinelli than any ghostly terrors. He had as much reason as any of the others, at whose doors the unhappy Ginevra had so fruitlessly knocked, to think her an unsubstantial visitor from the world of spirits. But it was impossible to him to hear that well-remembered voice appealing to him and to remain deaf to the appeal. Rushing down to the door, his first act was to bring the half-fainting woman into the house; his second to call up his mother that every care and fostering attention might be given to the poor wanderer.

Antonio and his mother soon succeeded in restoring her strength and vital forces, and then her strange and terrible tale was told. But what next was to be done? Early before the dawn Rondinelli hurried out to the steps of the cathedral, found the stone which formed the opening of the tomb of the Agolanti displaced, obtaining thence full confirmation — if any confirmation had been necessary — of poor Ginevra's story, and carefully replaced the stone. The husband, the father, and the uncle, who had closed their doors against her, whatever they might have whispered to each other, took very good care to keep to themselves all mention of so scandalous a fact as the unhalloed walking from her grave of their wife, daughter, and niece. In Florence, while Ginevra was recovering health and strength in the most secret chamber of the Rondinelli Palace, she was deemed by everybody to be dead and safely buried beneath the marble steps of the Duomo.

But still what were they to do,—they, Antonio and Ginevra?

What was done was this!

Rondinelli applied to the authorities of the republic for license to marry Ginevra, — “late Ginevra dei Agolanti”; and backed his application by regular certificates of the death and burial of the lady who had borne that name! He related publicly, moreover, how Ginevra had returned from the tomb to the house of her former husband, to that of her father, and to that of her uncle; and how all of them had persisted in their determination to consider her dead, and in their refusal to recognize, or to have anything further to say to her!

And thereupon, as the historians assure us, it was authoritatively decided that Ginevra degli Agolanti was to all legal intents and purposes dead; and that the lady produced by Antonio Rondinelli was free to wed with him or anybody else on whom she might choose to bestow herself.

And of course Antonio and Ginevra were forthwith married; and of course they “lived happily ever after.”

A writer of the first half of the present century, Agostino Ademollo, in his book entitled “Marietta de' Ricci,” having occasion to allude to this tradition of Ginevra, remarks that there is nothing improbable in the legend, with the exception of the marriage with Rondinelli, with which the story concludes. And assuredly no “doctor utriusque juris” would undertake to support the canonical validity of the marriage between Antonio and Ginevra under the circumstances related. But those who know what sort of things were often done in such matters in those days,—who specially are acquainted with the sort of spirit that prevailed among the citizens of the masterful old republic, which once, when excommunicated by the Pope, caused the theologians of the commonwealth to reply by hurling back an excommunication of his Holiness,—those who remember this and other such-like specimens of the old Florentine proclivities, will probably not find it very difficult to believe that Florence may, when the story of Ginevra was told, have thought it very fair, reasonable, and proper that Rondinelli should have the lady for his pains; and, so thinking, may have decreed that he should have her to wife, let Roman civilians and canonists say what they might about it!

Besides, if anybody needs any further and more entirely undeniable evidence of the authenticity of the legend, is there not still extant in the City of Flowers, the Via della Morte, the little street running out of the Piazza del Duomo by the side of the Misericordia, down which Ginevra passed when escaping from her tomb to the house of her husband, and which received its name from that fact?

CHILDREN'S LITERATURE OF THE LAST CENTURY.

BY MISS YONGE.
(Second Paper.)

DIDACTIC FICTION.

THE reign of didactic fiction for children was inaugurated by the Edgeworth family, who produced a great and lasting effect upon education and juvenile study. It is always difficult to believe that they were Irish, so unlike was the whole tone of character to the ordinary nation alone, except in a certain ardor and intolerance. Richard Lovell Edgeworth, husband to four wives in succession, father of twenty children, and with a true genius in his eldest daughter, had certainly unusual facilities for studying “practical education,” and between himself and his daughter Maria much that was really wise and valuable was enunciated, though mixed with a good deal that was absurd and pragmatical. He was the first who impressed the public mind with the seemingly wise but excessively foolish maxim, that nothing should be taught to children that they cannot understand. It is almost inconceivable that a man with so many young people around him should have been so utterly blind to that curiously disproportionate power of memory with which childhood is gifted, as if for the very purpose of accumulating stores for future use, as well as to the almost equal delight in the mysterious and half comprehended. Such instincts are absolutely condemned by him as either conceit or imitation, or the mere love of pretty sounds. He would allow children to enter no temple of wisdom that their own rushlight cannot thoroughly illuminate, to tread no path which their reason does not accept,—never to be satisfied without replies to their ever-recurring “why and wherefore.” Nothing is too grand, mysterious, and sacred, too precious or too important, to be either reduced to their level or ignored: the discipline of unquestioning obedience, the duty of enforced attention, the reverence of awe, the joy of beauty beyond comprehension, are all denied to them. In truth, Richard Edgeworth must have been singularly deficient either in imagination or sense of beauty. Looking back at the joint works of himself and his daughter, it is strange to find how little there is of sense of admiration. There is actual condemnation of any sort of purchase for the sake of pleasing the eye; the strongest appreciation of the beauties of scenery that we can remember is of the oaks of Wootton,—of poetry, of Darwin's Botanic Garden, and of Pope's gaudy and falsified translation of Homer's moonlight simile; music is never dwelt on, and even in childhood we were scandalized at the utter indifference to a picture-gallery supposed to be natural to the young, when we remembered gazing with strange dreamy delight at, among others, a copy of the Madonna della Sedia, at Paul Potter's Evening, and at Erminia and her shepherds in the National Gallery.

Practice was probably better than theory in Mr. Edgeworth. An able man, always instructing his children, and exciting them to activity of mind, he had no means of seeing that the never putting a spade into ground that could not easily be dug up, led to unwillingness ever to go deep; and that reading nothing not easily understood might be a habit retained through life. He did much by awakening attention in parents, and showing them useful methods; and his daughter, a genius far beyond himself, gave a life and animation to all his tenets, which carried them far and wide.

Their first joint juvenile work, the “Parent's Assistant,” was, we believe, intended to supplement the “Evenings at Home.” It is curious to see how Maria Edgeworth's dramatic power made this, compared with those little polished hard pebbles, a chain of bright crystals reflecting every phase of childhood in true and brilliant colors, but still—just not diamonds.

Another thing that is strange is, how such sticklers for accuracy and truth committed such strange pieces of negligence and ignorance as are to be found in the "Parent's Assistant." Had they no Eton friends to describe to them the absurdities of their Montem? Did they not know the Neapolitan nature better than to make the public opinion of the children drum out of the market-place a boy convicted of lying and cheating? Did they really suppose that, even in glass hives, bees amiably allowed their mistress to come, like "Simple Susan," with a spoon, and help herself to a slice of their comb without more ado? and did they imagine Hereford Cathedral* to be solely the charge of a church-warden? Was this the consequence of the father Edgeworth's complacency in his universal knowledge, or was it the effect of that generation's happy immunity from criticism?

Sir Walter Scott was a great admirer of "Simple Susan," and was heard to say that "when the boy brings the lamb to the little girl, there is nothing for it but to put down the book and cry." We can imagine him to have worked up his own feelings to this pitch when reading to his children, or mayhap to the gifted little Marjorie Fleming, who, amidst the much stronger (not to say tainted) meats mentioned in her diary, speaks of "Miss Edgeworth's tales" with passing approbation. In general, Maria seldom ventures on the pathetic, and only successfully in a few Irish portraits. Usually, she is as cold as she is clear, and perhaps is therefore all the more wholesome reading for children, whose susceptibilities are much better left unstirred by mere fiction. "Simple Susan," "Lazy Lawrence," the "Orphans," and "Waste not, Want not," are the best tales in the "Parent's Assistant." The Orphans, as well as the "scotching" children on the road to Dunstable, do indeed perform wonderful feats, but a belief in infinite possibility is dear to the young, and very good for them. Made-moiselle Panache is a portrait of a class of French governesses which we suppose existed in those days. It is only made good for children by the clever painting of the young Helen's hasty friendship, and foolish love of making trumpery presents, — a fashion over-prevalent in our day. The "Filagree Basket" is thoroughly Edgeworthian. Poor Rosamond, who here first saw the light, is dumb-founded by her wise father and mother's inquiries, why a person's birthday should be kept more than any other day of her life; and her attempts at present-making are not directed, nor assisted, but permitted to stultify themselves. This was part of the system, and on her next appearance in "Early Lessons," this poor, ill-used child is, by way of wholesome lesson, allowed to give the price of a needful pair of shoes for a purple jar in a chemist's shop, without being warned that the color is not resident in the glass, but only in the liquid within. If it ever happened, it was a most unjustifiable trick! Yet some of the lessons to Rosamond upon present or future enjoyment have lasted us our life. The minor morals of life have never been better treated than by Maria Edgeworth. "Principles," as she calls them, — by which is meant religious faith producing obedience to moral precepts, — are taken for granted; and the good sense, honor, and expediency of life are the theme. It is a high-minded expediency, the best side of Epicureanism. Honesty is the best policy, but policy it always is; success is always the object and the reward, but it is not a showy, gaudy gratification of vanity, although it may be of pride. Truth and moral courage are evidently the favorite qualities, and honor is kept very high and true. There is also a contempt for mere pleasures of the senses which is very wholesome; a disdain for sugar-plums and fine clothes, which it would be well to renew in the present generation.

Something of this was due to the reaction in favor of simplicity that preceded the French Revolution. The grand severity of the classic philosopher was the ideal. The sight of the foul orgies of the French court and noblesse, and the still coarser and ruder revels of English rakes, made a strict regimen noble and beautiful in comparison. Every better instinct awoke in favor of the avoidance of all manner of excess. Religion, then reviving in a stern, puritanical form, strongly supported this spirit of abstemiousness: with what effect is testified by our fine elderly men, slender eaters, often water-drinkers, looking with disgust at food taken at irregular times, despising smoking simply on the ground of its being a mere bodily indulgence; and utterly unable to comprehend the theory of later times, which prizes physical indulgence as a right and attribute of the complete human creature. Alcibiades, rather than Aurelius, has become the modern model.

But we have wandered from Richard Edgeworth and the pedantic maxims or proverbs which he set his daughter to illustrate, and between the narrow banks of which her bright genius flowed through the twelve volumes of "Popular, Moral, and Fashionable Tales." We wish that some of these could be published afresh, apart from the rest, for they are a great mixture, and some are by no means fitted for the young (for whom, indeed, they were not intended). "Manœuvring," "Vivian," "Ennui," and "The Absentee," in "Fashionable Tales"; the "Bad French Governess," in "Moral Tales"; and the less known "Legacy," in "Popular Tales," — are all admirable novelettes. "Lame Jervis" is much too interesting to be forgotten, and would be much liked by the lads of a parish library; and the "Good Aunt," the "Good French Governess," in "Moral Tales," "Emilie de Coulanges," and "Madame de Fleury" in the "fashionable" volumes, would make a charming book for young people. The last of these is, we believe, a veritable history of a benevolent lady; and nothing can be better than the lesson in "Emilie de Coulanges" against spoiling generosity in great things by fretful exactions in little ones. There is something very touching in the manner in which the French emigrant noblesse occur in several of these stories, with their distresses, their strange resources, and their unflinching cheerfulness; but Madame de Coulanges and her daughter Emilie are the best of all, the one in her frivolity, the other in her sweetness. Another capital story among the "Moral Tales" is the "L'Amie Inconnue," where the romantic girl absolutely runs away from home to throw herself into the arms of the authoress of certain Rosa Matilda novels, with whom she has enjoyed a sentimental correspondence. We believe the idea was taken from the "Female Quixote" (which, however, we have never seen), but it is carried out with more wit, and less caricature than Mr. Paget's "Lucretia."

"Early Lessons" began under Mr. Edgeworth's superintendence, but by and by they developed into their far more charming sequels. Frank — though a little too much of an Edgeworthian Emile — is a real, fresh, bright boy, with his fits of idleness and self-improvement, his beloved pony Felix, his magnificent attempt at an orrery, and his regrets that he cannot be a self-taught genius. We have no doubt that he is exactly what a well-disposed Edgeworthian boy would be, and to our childhood he was a dear friend and companion. Rosamond is quite equal as a portrait, and some of the lessons to which she gives occasion still remain unapproached in excellence. Excuses, airs, and graces, and false daring and timidity (see the Black Lane), are all treated with a light grace and good sense, perhaps, only surpassed in the "Conversations d'Emilie" mentioned above.

We hear that children dislike these books now, as being dry. Is it the natural impatience of the last generation's fashions, or is it that they are too much used to sentiment, rapid incident, and broad fun to appreciate quiet detail? As to "Harry and Lucy," a certain exertion of mind is necessary for reading it, and Scott, whose imaginative nature would naturally shrink from science and mechanics, laughed at it; but we hold to its real value. First principles are capitally explained, and better popularized than we have ever seen them elsewhere, and they are well relieved by characteristic sketches of that thorough girl Lucy, and her plodding, persevering brother. That long journey of theirs, through the Black Country and among the Staffordshire potteries, will long be memorable in our eyes, and all the more so because they travelled post in their own carriage, and relieved the way with sense and nonsense, ranging from Humboldt's travels to "the grand Panjandrum himself." Miss Edgeworth seldom came nearer to pathos than in the account of Harry's accident; and the day during his convalescence, when Lucy insisted on "feeding him on nothing but plums," has acted as a salutary warning to us through life.

These works of Maria Edgeworth's spread through a long space, reaching from the youth of the grandmothers to that of the mothers of the present generation. Their influence was very wide, and scarcely anything of equal importance rose up coevally with them, not at least in the same style. All the "story-books" of the period bear their impress, and have the same coldness without the same freshness. Even Mary Russell Mitford, though writing so deliciously of children, could not write for them. She saw them from outside, not from within, and her juvenile tales are not spontaneous overflows of good-humored love of village nature seen through rose-colored spectacles, but all smack of being done as task-work for the annuals that preceded the more modern magazines, of which there were none for children except a very clever "Juvenile Spectator." Mrs. Holland was, perhaps, the most voluminous writer, but in general she wearisomely exaggerated the Edgeworth fashion of making children support the whole family by wonderful exertions and inventions. Now children have no objection to see themselves made valuable and important, but Mrs. Holland's sons and daughters of genius do not remain children after the first few pages, and after exertions and successes beyond the reach of sympathy, pass into the uninteresting grown-up world. Her "Rich Boys and Poor Boys" and "Young Crusoe" seem to our memory her only really interesting books. But among all the juvenile library of this date, how shines out Mary Lamb's "Mrs. Leicester's School!" It is one of those books of real force and beauty that made a mark in our mind long, long ere we knew that books had authors, and that authors had different degrees of fame. The volume was not our own, but was devoured at a young companion's house, certainly before our eleventh year. The child leading her uncle to her mother's tombstone, the little changeling, the Mahometan fever, the church bells that were taken for angels singing, all dwelt with us in a delightful dream that we longed to renew, and when the next opportunity came it led to dire disgrace, for we sat a whole afternoon shut up in a book-cupboard with Mrs. Leicester's, wonderful scholars, utterly unsociable and deaf to the more commonplace living companions. It is a book that is nearly safe from becoming forgotten. Another really clever book was Mrs. Penrose's "Mrs. Markham's Children's Friend," which contained some capital stories and dramas, with more of the element of fun than was often found in books of the time. An early production of Agnes Strickland (we believe) stands out in our mind as full of interest. It was called "The Rival Crusoes," and gave the story of a youth, who had been taken by a press-gang to oblige a tyrannical marquess, finding himself tête-à-tête on a desert island with the nobleman's midshipman son. How the two youths held aloof in pride and hatred, how they found themselves silently burying their comrades together, how they stalked apart in gloom, till Philip, missing Lord Robert, found him nearly dead of fever, and how they were fast friends long before they were rescued, is well told, and raises the book far above the ordinary desert island. "Leila," Miss Fraser Tytler's much-loved island story, is the most improbable of all. It is less good than her "Mary and Florence," her only real imagination, and the second and third parts are almost absurd for their crowd of improbabilities.

Worthy, too, was Mrs. Whateley's "Reverses; or, The Fairfax Family," a book with something of the stiff wisdom of the time, but full of character, and almost historical from the picture of a voyage to, and settlement in, Canada before the days of steam. There are two excellent fairy tales, which are almost unique in their endeavor to treat fairies with proper respect to their traditions. For fifty years, fairyland had been under a ban. The reading of fairy tales had, from Madame de Genlis downwards, been treated as an intolerable folly; and if the poor things were mentioned at all, it was in the most arbitrary manner. Sometimes they became the torments of the naughty, sometimes the rewarders of the good, sometimes they were beneficent or malevolent old ladies, sometimes poor little sprites, loaded with priggishness. They became actual moral qualities, like Order and Disorder; kept halls of discipline, or, worse still, of science and natural history; and the only thing not dreamt of, was that they belonged to a beautiful and curious system of popular mythology, which it was a pity arbitrarily to confuse. Mrs. Whateley, however, from no doubt an innate sense of the fitness of things, made her fairies suit with genuine elfin lore, even while they had a moral, and a very good one.

In fact, we have omitted the first real good fairy book that had found its way to England since "Puss in Boots" and Co.: we mean Mr. Edgar Taylor's translation and selection of Grimm's collection under the title of "German Popular Tales," with admirable illustrations by Cruikshank. Here was once again the true unadulterated fairy tale, and happy the child who was allowed to revel in it, — perhaps the happier if under protest, and only permitted a sweet daily taste. We rejoice to see that the whole book, illustrations and all, has been reproduced by Mr. Hotten, with a preface by Mr. Ruskin. It is a much safer and better-weeded book than the fuller collection illustrated by Wehnert, and published by Addy, but without Mr. Taylor's excellent notes.

Croker's "Irish Tales" followed, and, though not professedly intended for children, were soon heartily loved. Once for all, let us state our opinion of fairy lore. It has become the fashion to speak of children and fairy tales as though they naturally belonged together, and so they do, but it is the genuine — we had almost said authentic — fairy tale, taken in moderation, that is the true delight of childhood. The trumpery, arbitrary, moral fairy only spoils the taste of the real article; and the burlesque fairyland is still worse, for its broad fun, slang, and modern allusion destroy the real poetry and romance of childhood, and foster that unnatural appetite for the facétious which is the bane of the young. Why should the lovely princes and princesses, the dreamy groves and glittering palaces, that childish imagination ought to revel in, and brighten its sense of the unseen, be made mere occasions for trumpery parodies, and lowered to make Cockneys laugh? The burlesque has found its way into children's literature, and is fast vulgarizing every sweet nook of fairyland, which has come to be considered as a mere field for pantomime. A real traditional fairy tale is a possession.

"Tales from the Norse" is nearly as good, in its way, as "German Popular Tales," and infinitely better in style; and we were lately edified by the delight which a family of young children took in Miss Frere's "Old Deccan," proving, we suppose, the congeniality of the Aryan tale. Mrs. Craik has made an excellent collection of old English fairy tales in her "Book of Fairies" in the "Golden Treasury"; and with these, and those we have mentioned above, young people would be provided with the real classics of fairy lore, and would soon learn to regard them with the same sort of respect as the conclave of Olympus, with whom no one nowadays thinks of taking liberties. The pseudo-fairy, whether moral or comic, is an absolute injury to both taste and antiquarianism.

Far away, indeed, was the whole supernatural world banished by the educationalists who, in the track of Tutor, George, and Harry, in "Evenings at Home," strove to improve the young mind. Joyce's "Scientific Dialogues," and Mrs. Marcet's "Conversations on Chemistry," were as stiff as if they had not been broken into question and answer with names inserted; we believe they were sound and correct as far as they went, but the century has gone on too fast for them, and Mrs. Marcet is better known now by her "Seasons," the "Willie Book," as it is still tenderly called in many a nursery, where it is the first step in literature beyond "Little Charles"; and her "Mary's Grammar" is precious in the schoolroom.

Walks with fathers, uncles, mothers, maiden aunts, and governesses were made to teach everything imaginable, — commerce, mineralogy, the Wars of the Jews, botany, geography, — all being decorated with dainty little steel engravings, two or three on a page. We remember diligently extracting the small sandwiches of story, and carefully avoiding the improving substance. One successful writer may, however, be honorably mentioned, —

Maria Hack. Her "Winter Evenings; or, Tales of Travellers," are admirable, and are the more valuable now, as the books they are taken from have drifted out of reach. They are far the best of their class, and stand unrivalled even in these days. She likewise put a certain Harry Beaufoy through three series of conversations, diluting Paley's "Natural Theology," Keith's "Evidence of Prophecy," and geology at about the Buckland era. These are all delightful in their way. It was our "entering" with geology, and served as a foundation to all subsequently learned.

Her "True Stories from Ancient History," and ditto from modern, were also good in their line, the former the best, inasmuch as it is minced Rollin, while the other is only minced "Russell's Modern Europe." But they belong to a class whose commencement was with the ever-memorable and fascinating "Tales of a Grandfather," a book thoroughly fulfilling its design of being easy enough for childhood, and yet of not being too puerile for manhood to be interested in. Its description of the removal of Bruce's remains always has seemed to us one of the most perfect specimens of simplicity and pathos that was ever produced. No child's history has ever come near it for beauty; but then who could hope to write like Scott, or on his own familiar ground? Croker's "Stories from the History of England" comes nearest to it in charm of manner, but longo intervallo; and all the rest, Mrs. Markham's, Lady Callcott's, Miss Sewell's, and many more, though very good for those who want to learn history, do not teach history by their own charm. We mean Lady Callcott's "Spain." Her "Little Arthur's England," though happening to be just in the style that children like and understand, is so full of inaccuracies of fact that we wonder no subsequent edition has corrected them.

Another variety of books sprung up in the early part of this century; namely, the Sunday story, or religious fiction. Hannah More's Cheap Repository Tracts had long been almost alone, when Mrs. Sherwood, just before she went out to India, published a little tale called "Susan Gray," and after an absence of nearly twenty years came home and found it universally read and pirated. It is a short story of a village girl, who is apprenticed to a dress-maker, and shows great firmness in resisting the addresses of a young officer, backed by her wicked mistress. Finally, she is driven to such straits that she runs away in a thunder-storm, reaches her native village, and dies of decline. One would not have thought this a very desirable story for children, but from its beginning with young girls, and from the religious talk therein contained, it was regarded as a Sunday study, and the peculiar prettiness of Mrs. Sherwood's writings rendered it a great favorite. The young women, for whom it was primarily intended, read it with great avidity, but we have our doubts whether it was beneficial; we suspect that the rank of Susan's lover gave it one charm in their eyes.

Mrs. Sherwood's writing is peculiar. Her descriptions of all that is pleasant to the young have a certain simplicity and earnestness of detail that go to the very heart's core, and some of her strangest episodes are told with a naïve straightforwardness that may be either dry humor or the utter absence of it. Her "Stories on the Catechism," though about a little Mary, are cast in barracks in India; and her heroine, a sergeant's daughter, illustrates, or sees illustrated, the breach of the Commandments one after another, without mincing matters, while the lessons at the end of each chapter reflect the shifting opinions of a very untaught and conceited through pious mind. "The Fairchild Family" has more of her felicitous descriptions, and the gusto with which she dwells on new dolls and little tea-drinkings with good old ladies earned fervent love for the book, not diminished by the absolutely sensational naughtiness of Henry, Lucy, and Emily, and the dreadful punishments they underwent. Their second part is even worse than most second parts, but their first is, we suspect, still dear to many. Mrs. Sherwood was first in the field of pious slaughter: "Henry and his Bearer," and the feminine counterpart, "Lucy and her Dhayè," were both Anglo-Indian children pining to convert their native attendant and dying in the mean time. "Emma and her Nurse" follows in the same line, only the nurse-girl converts the child she waits on, and watches her death-bed; and a crowd of other tales of all sizes were so written as to touch a certain chord of sentiment never before appealed to in the same style, and inculcating a kind of Calvinistic piety.

Mrs. Sherwood ranged all over the world in all times. The poor Shepherd-Lord Clifford is brought in as an advanced Calvinist. Thanks to Lollardism, we have the "Vaudois Persecutions," and then again an Italian "Nun," whom at one time we used to admire unspeakably. No doubt Mrs. Sherwood was an effective writer, and a little discipline and real instruction would have raised her much higher. Her "Faithful Little Girl" is, we believe, her very best specimen, combining high aims, home truths, and a very beautiful and practical allegory, tenderly and well told and explained.

Her sister, Mrs. Cameron, shared her labors, and produced many nice little practical books. The "Polite Little Children" is one that ought to be brought to light again for its excellence. Mrs. Sherwood was the mother of two genera of books, — the religious story of the poor and of the rich. The Religious Tract Society was soon spreading pious little tales of both classes far and wide, — tales which inculcated sudden conversion, and very frequently ended in an early death, yet which still had a certain spirit and earnestness which made them attractive in spite of their sameness, and gained them a strong hold upon many minds. We would mention among the most really notable books of this school "Anna Ross," the story of a little girl of nine years old, whose father is wounded at Waterloo, and who goes with her mother to nurse him. On arriving, their meeting with his funeral is described in a really touching manner. The mother, already much out of health, sinks under the shock, and Anna is to spend half a year with each of her guardian uncles in succession, and then to choose with which of them shall be her home. Her first six months are spent in a fashionable school-room at Edinburgh, with a disagreeable governess, and cross, frivolous cousins, and in an alternation of difficult lessons and stiff appearances in the drawing-room.

The second period is passed in a manse among the mountains, with the kindest of uncles and aunts, and well-brought-up cousins, all full of helpfulness and good-nature, though of course without the luxuries of riches to which Anna had become accustomed. Then the choice is made, and Anna, of course, chooses the manse, where her return is celebrated by a most charmingly described succession of bonfires upon every hill, and we feel that she is perfectly happy, and rejoice with her.

The weak point in the book seems to us to be that it is no sacrifice but the reverse, for Anna to remain with the good uncle. The fine clothes, and driving in a curricule, and the hopes of future fortune are not by any means likely to counterbalance the charms of the free life of the moorland manse; and if the author means to make comparison of a worldly life with a religious one, she made the contrast stronger than it would necessarily have been. There was nothing to dazzle Anna at her Uncle Ross's schoolroom, nothing to repel her from her Uncle Murray's manse, but it may be well to leave children's sympathies enlisted against the gayety which certainly is not sufficient for happiness.

Most of the tales of this kind are open to much graver objections. Without pausing to consider the doctrine they teach, the manner of it is undesirable, because obtrusive. Little children amaze their elders, and sometimes perfect strangers, by sudden inquiries whether they are Christians, or as to their personal love for God; they judge their superiors, and utter sentiments which are too apt to pass for practice; while the mixture of sentimentality with religion, the direful judgments brought on the unconverted, and the prominence given to feeling and conscious piety, are all undesirable. Moreover, when the Tract Society had pledged itself to introduce the central doctrine of the Christian faith in every publication, of whatever size, it undertook what was not possible without frequent irreverence. Much was doubtless done towards establishing a high standard of purity of reading, and beguiling the hours of the Sunday that once were weary; but something was also done towards rendering habits frivolous, and promoting the notion that a tale interlarded with religious reflections is a religious study. Example is often very precious, and establishes a maxim better than many comments, but the maxim and its deep why and wherefore are apt to be smothered under the Ellens and Lucys who are meant to bring it into action.

The species has of late culminated in "Ministering Children," a book multiplied by thousands, owing to a certain pleasantness of practical detail in the early pages, running on into the mawkish sweetness and sentiment that is peculiarly acceptable to a certain stage of development in children and in nursery-maids. The two American books, "The Wide, Wide World" and "Queechy," have much the same claim to popularity, — enhanced, however, by a real freshness and beauty of description in dealing with life in American farmhouses, and scenes in the depths of the forests. But these, as well as many more for which we have a much greater regard, have the grave and really injurious effect of teaching little girls to expect a lover in any one who is good-natured to them. Nothing ought to be more rigidly avoided, for it fills the child with foolish expectations and dreams, which poison her simplicity of mind and her present enjoyment. It is true that many beautiful lifelong attachments have dated from early childhood, but these must be spontaneous, not the effect of imitation. Nothing is prettier in real life, or in a story, than such affections, but we would entreat writers to withstand the temptation of representing them, and to recollect that though boys seldom are influenced by story-books, yet that girls are, and that theirs being the passive side, unable to take the initiative, is exactly that which it is most cruel to impress with vain aspirations. Fortunately, most healthily constituted children become weary of a story so soon as it touches upon the sentiment of love, but it is those who do like to dwell upon it that should least be permitted what can be suggestive of application to themselves.

Belonging to this genus, yet rising above it by force of cleverness, is Miss Sinclair's "Holiday House," where the quaint naughtiness of the children and their unrivalled power of getting into scrapes, is delightful, and the conversation as amusing as it is improbable, being one continued succession of good things,—perpetual rockets fired off impartially by Grandmother, Uncle, Nurse Crabtree, and naughty children, till we stand amazed at such a blaze of wittiness, and do not feel in the least prepared to find ourselves beside the ordinary stamp of pious death-bed. Miss Sinclair, however, deferred to a second part the novelish termination, and we defy any child to anticipate that Laura is there married to the converted Peter Gray. Indeed, the conclusion looks as if it had been written to please some youthful admirers of the original book.

Of course there are many more stories of this description than we have space to mention. It is a class that is generally given up to utter reprobation by the critical world, the very words, "a religious tale," being almost contemptuous. The real flaw, of course, is that the author, as the Providence of the book, can twist the narrative to point the moral, and sometimes does so unjustifiably, as in a story we dimly recollect where the white feathers of a riding-hat are one day envied, and shortly after are seen (we used to think they were the same) on their late owner's hearse. The principle of "Don't care came to a bad end" ought not to be too often followed out. But a "religious tale," overloaded with controversy and with forced moral, should be carefully distinguished from a tale constructed on a strong basis of religious principle, which attempts to give a picture of life as it really is seen by Christian eyes. The leader in such writing was Manzoni, whose "Promessi Sposi" has always seemed to us the type of the novel of the religious mind. It is, of course, not a book for mere children, and we would deprecate the reading it merely by way of an Italian lesson, as there are long regions of desert in it that might deter a laborious reader, and we only mention it here as showing what the right sort of religious tale may be, drawing out the poetry of all that is good, enlisting the sympathies on behalf of purity, faith, and forgiveness, and making vice hateful and despicable.

THE DISCOVERY OF AMERICA BY THE CHINESE.

WAS Columbus the first discoverer of America, or did he only rediscover that continent after it had, in remote ages, been found, peopled, and forgotten by the Old World? It is curious that this question has not been more generally raised, for it is very clear that one of two things must be true: either the people whom Columbus found in America must have been descended from emigrants from the Old World, and therefore America was known to the Old World before Columbus's time, or else the aborigines of the western hemisphere were the result of spontaneous human generation, the development of man from a lower species of animal, or descended from a second Adam and Eve, whose origin would be equally puzzling. Unless we are prepared to cast aside Holy Writ, and all our general notions of the origin of the human race, we must believe that there was at one time communication between the Old World and the New. Probably this communication took place on the opposite side of the world to ours, between the eastern coast of Asia and the side of America most remote from Europe; and I believe it is quite possible that the inhabitants of Eastern Asia may have been aware of the existence of America, and kept up intercourse with it while our part of the Old World never dreamt of its existence. The impenetrable barrier the Chinese were always anxious to preserve between themselves and the rest of the nations of the Old World renders it quite possible that they should have kept their knowledge of America to themselves, or, at any rate, from Europe. The objection that the art of navigation in such remote times was not sufficiently advanced to enable the Chinese to cross the Pacific and land on the western shore of America is not conclusive, as we have now found that arts and sciences which were once generally supposed to be of quite modern origin existed in China ages and ages before their discovery in Europe. The arts of paper-making and printing, amongst others, had been practised in China long before Europeans had any idea of them. Why, then, should not the Chinese have been equally, or more, in advance of us in navigation? The stately ruins of Baalbec, with gigantic arches across the streets whose erection would puzzle our modern engineers, the Pyramids, and other such remains of stupendous works point to a state of civilization, and the existence of arts and sciences, in times of which European historians give no account.

One fact corroborative of the idea that the Old World, or at least some of the inhabitants of Asia, were once aware of the existence of America before its discovery by Columbus is that many of the Arabian ulema with whom I have conversed on this subject, are fully convinced that the ancient Arabian geographers knew of America, and in support of this opinion point to passages in old works in which a country to the west of the Atlantic is spoken of. An Arab gentleman, a friend of mine, General Hussein Pasha, in a work he has just written on America, called En-Nasser-Et-Tayir, quotes from Djeldeki and other old writers to show this.

There is, however, amongst Chinese records not merely vague references to a country to the west of the Atlantic, but a circumstantial account of its discovery by the Chinese long before Columbus was born.

A competent authority on such matters, J. H. Lay, the Chinese interpreter in San Francisco, has lately written an essay on this subject, from which we gather the following startling statements drawn from Chinese historians and geographers.

Fourteen hundred years ago even America had been discovered by the Chinese and described by them. They stated that land to be about 20,000 Chinese miles distant from China. About 500 years after the birth of Christ, Buddhist priests repaired there, and brought back the news that they had met with Buddhist idols and religious writings in the country already. Their descriptions, in many respects, resemble those of the Spaniards a thousand years after. They called the country "Fusany," after a tree which grew there, whose leaves resemble those of the bamboo, whose bark the natives made clothes and paper out of, and whose fruit they ate. These particulars correspond exactly and remarkably with those given by the American historian, Prescott, about the maquay tree in Mexico. He states that the Aztecs prepared a pulp for paper-making out of the bark of this tree. Then, even its leaves were used for thatching; its fibres for making ropes; its roots yielded a nourishing food; and its sap, by means of fermentation, was made into an intoxicating drink. The accounts given by the Chinese and Spaniards, although a thousand years apart, agree in stating that the natives did not possess any iron, but only copper; that they made all their tools, for working in stone and metals, out of a mixture of copper and tin; and they, in comparison with the nations of Europe and Asia, thought but little of the worth of silver and gold. The religious customs and forms of worship presented the same characteristics to the Chinese fourteen hundred years ago as to the Spaniards four hundred years ago.

There is, moreover, a remarkable resemblance between the religion of the Aztecs and the Buddhism of the Chinese, as well as between the manners and customs of the Aztecs and those of the people of China. There is also a great similarity between the features of the Indian tribes of Middle and South America and those of the Chinese, and, as Haulay, the Chinese interpreter of whom we spoke above, states, between the accent and most of the monosyllabic words of the Chinese and Indian languages. Indeed, this writer gives a list of words which point to a close relationship; and infers therefrom that there must have been emigration from China to the American continent at a most early period indeed, as the official accounts of Buddhist priests fourteen hundred years ago notice these things as existing already. Perhaps now old records may be recovered in China which may furnish full particulars of this question. It is, at any rate, remarkable and confirmative of the idea of emigration from China to America at some remote period, that at the time of the discovery of America by the Spaniards the Indian tribes on the coast of the Pacific, opposite to China, for the most part, enjoyed a state of culture of ancient growth, while the inhabitants of the Atlantic shore were found by Europeans in a state of original barbarism. If the idea of America having been discovered before the time of Columbus be correct, it only goes to prove that there is nothing new under the sun; and that Shelley was right in his bold but beautiful lines: "Thou canst not find one spot whereon no city stood." Admitting this, who can tell whether civilization did not exist in America when we were plunged in barbarism? and, stranger still, whether the endless march of ages in rolling over our present cultivation may not obliterate it, and sever the two hemispheres once again from each other's cognizance? Possibly, man is destined, in striving after civilization, to be like Sisyphus, always engaged in rolling up a stone which ever falls down.

NODDY'S SITUATION.

IN FIVE CHAPTERS. — CHAPTER I.

"I GIVE my daughter Julia three years. You understand? If she makes a good match within that period, well; if not, I have done with her: I wash my hands of her completely." Mrs. Muciller gently chafed her left hand with her right, arranged her rings, and replaced her fingers upon the lace handkerchief in her lap, as though the operation were completed.

"Ample sufficient, my dear Mrs. Muciller, for a young lady who doubtless inherits her mother's tact for improving a favorable opportunity"; and Mrs. Sharing took a comprehensive glance at the drawing-room of Braithfield Villa. The room was handsome and tasteful, as even a neighbor would allow. A cool green light shimmered in through the jasmine-covered veranda, and played in wavering little pools of subdued sunshine upon the carpet. A soft green fernery had taken the place of the winter fire-grate, its beauty reproduced in a plate-glass background. The furniture modern, and doubtless elegant, but swathed up in holland coverings, as though it were dead furniture, shrouded and laid out, waiting to be buried. A tiny fragile stem of frosted silver depended from the ceiling to carry the Greek lamp branches, hung with silver chains, and the perfect globes of egg-shell glass. The piano was Broadwood's grand; and, displayed on dainty little tables, was the correct quantity of drawing-room stores.

As Mrs. Sharing mentally appraised the effects in her friend's room, she was not unmindful of the favorable opportunity that had been improved. It was not so many years since a Mrs. Cray, a widow with one daughter, had been a fashionable teacher of music and painting, and had found Mrs. Sharing one of the most useful of patrons. It was at Mrs. Sharing's house she had first met Mr. Muciller, a successful speculator, who experienced little difficulty in tracing back his genealogy an extra generation for every ten thousand he netted. Mr. Muciller was a rich man when he married Mrs. Cray; but he went on speculating, as people will, and the crash came, and he was nearly ruined in fortune, and quite in health; for he took it to heart, and died, leaving Mrs. Muciller a widow for the second time, with a handsome house and a very slender income. Still, it had been a favorable opportunity for Mrs. Muciller, late Cray, all things considered.

"At least," Mrs. Muciller said, in reply to Mrs. Sharing's remark, "I can rely on Julia's discretion. She is not likely to be betrayed into an undesirable match. My daughter is not flighty, like some girls."

When Mrs. Sharing had taken her leave Mrs. Muciller thought a few minutes, and then touched the bell.

"Send Miss Noddy to me," she said to the servant.

Norah Cray, for that was Miss Noddy, can hardly be described as a relation of Mrs. Muciller, being nothing more than a kind of connection, — in fact, a step-daughter, the child of her first husband, to be precise. She was a little thing for her age, which was quite two-and-twenty. She had smooth brown hair, neatly dressed, but rather odd-looking, as it actually showed the shape of the back of the little head, without any chignon at all to improve it. She had bright brown eyes too; but you could not say she was pretty. Hers was a plain face, but good-tempered and pleasant to look upon. She came into the drawing-room, in answer to Mrs. Muciller's summons, in a print dress, not fashionable nor new, though neat and becoming, and her hands white with flour.

"Noddy, what are you doing, to come into the drawing-room in that state?"

"Pies," said Noddy, laconically, and smiling.

"You might have waited till you had finished your work," said Mrs. Muciller, "as I wish to speak to you on something of importance."

"They said you wanted me directly, so I came," Noddy explained.

"Very well; as you are here, you may remain; but please, don't sit down, or you will be sure to soil the chairs with your floury hands. I need not remind you, Noddy," Mrs. Muciller said with a smooth and rather pretty lisp, "that I have sought to discharge the onerous and unthankful office of step-mother to you in two families to the best of my ability. You have too much good sense to feel hurt at not having been placed on a precise equality here with my daughter Julia. You well know that, had your poor father, Mr. Cray, still lived, you would in all probability have been required to take at least as active a share in household duties as you have done with me. You have, therefore, no reason nor, I feel sure, any desire for complaint on that score. But it is needful I should inform you the time has arrived for a change in our mutual relations. You are aware Julia returns to-morrow from finishing her education. It is my intention to make great personal and pecuniary sacrifices, with a view to her advancement in life. It is probable we may entertain more company than we have been in the habit of doing, and, consequently, we may require more domestic assistance. But this and other expenses will involve pinching. I must pinch, you must pinch,—we all must pinch, in fact. Under these circumstances, I am not disposed to continue to employ you in a subordinate capacity in the household for people to make remarks about, and I cannot afford to retain you in any other. You will therefore see it to be your duty at once to look out for a situation as governess in some respectable family. I will not hurry you to a few weeks, and I shall do my best meantime to help you find such a situation; but I name three months as the time at which our present connection should cease."

"O dear!" said Noddy, her usually cheerful face becoming quite blank,—"I'm sure I'm not fit for a governess. I don't know nearly enough to teach."

"Perhaps not. No one does. What of that? You are quite as competent as many young ladies I know who go out. No girl is expected to be competent in her first place. You learn at your first situation what you want to teach at the second. It is the same in all businesses. Now, let us see what we can say in the advertisement,—French, German, Italian, and the usual accomplishments, I suppose; that is the customary thing."

"But I scarcely know a word of French, not a syllable of German, and can't even understand an Italian song," objected Noddy; "and as to accomplishments, I can only play hymn tunes, as you call them, on the piano."

"Very well, miss; and pray, what of that? Nobody will ask you for more; will they? You will go with young children first; you can teach them English, and spelling, and that, and what little French you do know, and their notes on the piano; and if their parents wish for more, you can tell them it is not advisable to overfill little heads too soon; can't you?"

"But I should be so ashamed," pleaded Noddy; "please don't say all that, for indeed I could n't teach at all when it was found out how ignorant I was of all I had professed; and people would despise me when they found me out."

"Nonsense; nobody will find you out. Why, how do you think I began as a drawing mistress? The same as other people do. I bought my specimens of a lady artist, and always took care to bring my pupils' drawings home to be corrected by the same lady. My drawings were admired, so were those of my pupils, and I obtained a connection. I forget what became of the artist; but you may be sure she never came to any good. You see she had a certain order of talent for production, whilst I possessed the superior ability to render her commodity marketable. As to advertising anything short of what I have told you, it would be useless; every governess does the same, for the reason that every other governess does so too. If people believe it, that is their affair; mine just now is to get you a situation; and when I have done so I shall consider myself relieved from further responsibility."

Noddy went back to her pies; but a heavy heart won't make light pastry, and Noddy's would n't rise.

The next day, Julia returned,—a tall, showy blonde of eighteen, with the languid air of completion which a finishing school so successfully imparts. Julia Muciller was an accomplished girl; she had learned all the last new tricks of musical execution, and showed peculiar facility in the performances of pieces of the Bubbings at Morn and Dribblings at Eve order. These she could rattle through with an air of easy superiority to the instrument, to the music, and even to her audience, as though such trifling feats of sleight-of-hand were the most easy of accomplishment in the world, as perhaps they are when once you know the trick. She was on singing terms with most of the gushing songs of flimsy sentiment of the day. She "knew an eye," belonging, it appeared, to some party who had had the other one made into a star, or had lost it in some other way to provoke admiration not quite so clear. She "saw two leaflets floating down a stream," and expressed regret at one having to "float onwards all alone" after its fellow had stuck in the bank. She aspired to be a bird,—she "breathed for wings"—she sighed for "a fairy's life in an elfin grove"; but of the passion and suffering of humanity, and its loves and tears, in a world that is in earnest, Julia did not sing. She could paint groups of impossible flowers, chatter boarding-school French, embroider in beads and wool, dance, and read novels on the sofa. In a word, Julia was finished.

Poor Noddy's little heart quite sank when she was admitted of evenings to the drawing-room (when there was no company) to hear the rehearsal of Miss Muciller's accomplishments, for it made her despair more than ever of being able to lay even the groundwork for such a display. But the advertisement was already sent to a weekly paper, spite of all Noddy's entreaties, detailing her proficiency; and so she could see nothing to be done but to borrow some of Julia's early school-books, and try, in spare moments, to gain a little knowledge of what she was expected to teach. It was with some difficulty that she could even do this, for Mrs. Muciller did not like to see her reading, observing that her duty was to devote her mind exclusively to household affairs, and there would be plenty of time for study when she went to her first situation. "You have only to keep yourself one lesson in advance of your pupils," Mrs. Muciller said, "and you are safe. It is very strange if a grown person of average ability cannot manage to compete with children to that extent." So Noddy would get up early, and get all her dusting done, and manage to make an hour at least for study before breakfast.

Within a week of Julia's return from school, Mrs. Muciller received this letter by afternoon post:—

"London, June 27, 18—.

"DEAR MRS. MUCILLER, — You will be surprised to hear I'm just home from Bombay, — more so, perhaps, to learn I'm tired of India, and mean to settle in England. I shall run down and pay you a visit in a day or two, and shall probably stay till you turn me out, as your cool country scenery will be a relief to eyes that still have the glare of the India sun in them. Don't put yourself out of the way. You need not reply, as I shall not be in London after to-morrow.

Yours,

"FRANK GEOGAGAN."

"Well, that's cool," said Julia.

"It certainly is," replied Mrs Muciller; "but he must come. In the first place, he is a nephew of the late Mr. Muciller, and I suppose fancies he has some right in his uncle's house. In the next place, I am not disposed to dispute the point, for he has been making a deal of money in India in connection with a Reclamation of Land Company. He must have turned a pretty penny, or he would not think of settling down yet. Those Geogagans are a money-making family, and always were, and not satisfied with a little. I should have invited him myself, had I known him to be in England. I consider his visit highly desirable. You must look your best, Julia, when he comes."

Julia languidly smiled obedience. "But he does not say when he is coming, mamma?"

"No; just like the Geogagans, — always thoughtless. However, we need not trouble about that to-day, as it is time for you to dress for Mrs. Sharing's croquet party."

So Julia rang the bell for Noddy to come and do her hair.

CHAPTER II.

The 28th of June being the anniversary of Coronation Day, is kept holiday at most country places. Both Mrs. Muciller's servants had hurried to get their work done early; and as "their people," to wit, Mrs. Muciller and her daughter (for Noddy did n't count) were going out, they were given the afternoon as a holiday.

It was a real treat to Noddy to get a spare afternoon all to herself, with no work to do, and no one to find fault with her. Noddy made up her mind she would spend the time in trying to learn how to teach music. So she went in to the piano in the drawing-room. I don't like digressions, but pardon me for a moment. I would not have you think Norah Cray an ignorant girl simply because she owned herself consciously unfit for a governess: she was not that. Her opportunities had been scanty enough. She left school at thirteen to "make herself useful." But Noddy had read a great deal, and possessed besides much intuitive knowledge of the right and wrong of things, though without being at all times able to reduce it to such a rule and science as would properly qualify for a teacher. She at least had this wisdom, that when she did not know anything, she would make no secret of her ignorance about it; and if all of us did the same, we might none of us seem quite so wise as we do. Noddy had picked up a fair knowledge of music, though not of a showy sort. Fire-works on the piano completely baffled her; but she could play some of Mozart's quieter sonatas with taste and real feeling, and they delighted her heart, though they were utterly unsuited for display. But what Noddy was now anxious to learn was how to teach. So she began at the beginning of her Piano-forte Tutor, and went slowly on till she came to the scales, which she commenced practising.

It being very hot, all the doors and windows of the house were thrown open to get the breeze, and the fragrant breath swept in through the hall-door, and along the passage, and to the drawing-room, bearing the scent of roses and jasmine to Noddy, as she sat there practising scales. It is rather monotonous work, but Noddy's whole mind was in it. She was indeed so absorbed in her occupation, that if a person had come up the gravel-path, and across the lawn, and straight into the room where she was, it is doubtful if she would have noticed it. Of course, it would be unlikely; but I say if a person had done so (the piano was at the farthest end, in the shadow of the large room), Noddy was so preoccupied that it is not probable she would have observed the intrusion. She had been grinding away at the F minor scale, up and down, down and up — one and two and three and four, and one and two and —

"O bother!" said Noddy, flinging her hands on her lap; "what an awful little goose you are! You have n't a bit of gumption, nor a mite of common sense. As to being a governess, and can't play scales, you must be a noodle to think of it, — a dreadful noodle!"

"You're about right there!" said an unmistakable masculine voice from somewhere by the door. Noddy started as if she had been shot; then she came over red and hot at being surprised. But the owner of the voice walked boldly into the room. Noddy, being left in sole charge of Braithfield Villa, and seeing an entire stranger march in like this, did not like the look of it. His looks were nothing to provoke dislike, be it said, — a tall, fine-bronzed man of thirty, with a tawny mustache and handsome sunburned features. She resolved to challenge him.

"What do you want?" she said brusquely.

"You," said he, — "you are Miss Muciller, I imagine?"

"No; I am Noddy, — Norah Cray, that is," she stammered, correcting herself. "Please what is it?"

"Cray?" the stranger said, — "Cray? any relation to Mrs. Muciller?"

"Yes."

"O, I think I know, then. So you are Miss Cray, eh? You will see who I am from this card; and as you have not offered me a seat, I'll take one, after shaking hands with you." He held out his hand frankly, and Norah could not refuse it.

"I don't know who you are," said Noddy. The stranger had lounged himself on the sofa.

"Then, perhaps, you'll look and see."

"Mr. Frank Ge-Ge-Geog-a-gan?" asked Norah, puzzled.

"Ga-gan, if you don't mind. It's spelt heathenish, but it reads easy. You've heard of your cousin, Frank Geogagan, in India, surely? That is, he might have been your cousin, if Mrs. Muciller's marriages had not mixed the relationships so confoundedly."

"No," said Norah.

He whistled. "Did n't Mrs. Muciller tell you I was coming?"

Norah did not wish to expose the precise state of things between herself and her step-mother, and did not choose to tell an untruth; so she replied: "Mrs. Muciller received a letter just before she went out this afternoon, but she was hurried, and I did not know its contents. So you are expected, then?"

"I said I was coming, but not exactly when."

"That 's awkward," said Noddy.

"Why?"

"Because we are not prepared to receive you. Mrs. Muciller would have been home, and Julia, had they expected you to arrive to-day."

"You are very plain."

"You are not complimentary," retorted Noddy.

"I did n't refer to your looks; but I wonder if you would insist on my saying they were anything different?"

"You can say what you please," said Noddy; "it is a guest's privilege."

"Whew!" Mr. Geogagan whistled softly. "Nettled, eh?"

"No; I justify your remark, that is all. You called me plain."

"So you are going out as governess, I heard you say. Pray, are you competent to teach?"

"I don't think so."

"Then why do you go?"

"I think you have no right to inquire."

"Gracious! Why, you forget I'm your cousin, and take a family interest in you already."

"If you do, you won't ask," said Noddy.

"But I do, and still ask."

"Then I can't tell you."

"Well, you are the coolest little baggage of a cousin to welcome any one home from abroad one could well expect to find. Are you not glad to see me?"

"Well, not particularly," said Noddy. "How should I be, never having seen you or heard of you before? Besides, you come at an awkward time, when nobody is at home. And for aught I know, you may be an impostor, and have watched your opportunity to enter the house when it is unprotected. I don't think you are that, though,—you are not polite enough. But one never knows."

"Upon my word, you are not flattering. Still, at any rate, I think you might have offered me some refreshment, as I have just come off a journey."

"I am very sorry," said Noddy; "but Mrs. Muciller has taken the keys with her. I can only offer you a cup of tea or coffee, and some bread and butter. Everything else is locked up."

As Mr. Frank seemed to think that would do very well indeed, Noddy went out to prepare it, and presently returned with a tray of tea and coffee and a single cup.

"Two cups, please," said Mr. Frank. Norah was not generally accustomed to take her meals with the family. She was certain Mrs. Muciller would not like this arrangement, but divining a refusal might prove embarrassing, she brought a second cup, and joined Mr. Geogagan at tea. When they had finished, Mr. Geogagan said he should walk up to the station to arrange about his luggage being sent, and on his return he should insist on Noddy giving him some music. No sooner was he fairly out of the house, than Norah hastened to Mrs. Sharing's, to let Mrs. Muciller know of the arrival of a visitor. However, Julia was in the middle of an exciting game at croquet, and learning that Mr. Geogagan was gone out again, she prevailed on her mother to remain till it was finished. Meantime, Noddy returned to Braithfield Villa. In five minutes, he walked Mr. Frank again, clamorous for his music. Now, Noddy was never in the habit of playing for anybody's amusement but her own, and was quite certain if Mrs. Muciller heard of her taking the liberty of playing to please a visitor, it would be considered a deadly offence. Moreover, she expected Mrs. Muciller to arrive every minute.

But Mr. Frank insisted with such vehemence that a refusal seemed like palpable affectation; so Noddy risked the consequences, and began to play Mozart's Ah Perdon! She had only got half-way through it, when Mrs. Muciller and Julia appeared at the window. Noddy shut up the piano, threw down her music, and fled.

"What impertinence!" ejaculated the widow. She was so fairly astounded at Noddy's barefaced impudence, as to be betrayed into making this remark aloud,—and Frank Geogagan heard it. She had the tact, however, at once to divine it, and to correct her mistake. "What impertinence, Mr. Frank, of you, to be sure, to come and take us all by surprise without a word of warning! However, we must try and overlook it, as it is your first offence. I'm sure I hope it will not be the last. We are delighted to receive you, although, had you told us when to expect you, we might have given you a better reception."

"Well," said Mr. Frank (but he detected the artifice), "I thought I told you pretty exactly. I said 'in a day or two,' if I remember rightly, and I came in 'a day' instead of 'two,' to show my anxiety to pay my earliest respects to my aunt and her daughter,—for I presume this is Julia?" Julia made a most finished révérence, and offered her hand in the most approved style. Julia was well and carefully dressed for the croquet party. "That is fortunate, at any rate," Mrs. Muciller thought. We might have been surprised at greater disadvantage. So much depends upon first impressions."

A few interchanges of courtesies from the ladies, with commonplaces from Mr. Frank, and Mrs. Muciller and her daughter retired to remove their bonnets,—if the little bits of flowers and lace adorning their hair might be so designated. Mrs. Muciller took this opportunity of administering a severe rebuke to Noddy upon her boldness, forwardness, and presumption in attempting to entertain their visitor in a manner so unbecoming. It was not couched in gentle terms, but in words that stung the more from having truth in them. She reminded Noddy of her dependence, of her prospects as a governess, of her own father's position (he was Mrs. Muciller's first husband, be it remembered), and contrasted these with her behavior not to her guest, but to Mrs. Muciller's. If the sting of a rebuke be any criterion of its deservedness, Mrs. Muciller's was richly merited, for poor Noddy went away to cry where there were no eyes to triumph over her distress.

But Mrs. Muciller was a student of expediency. She felt it would be undesirable (a favorite word of hers) that Noddy should continue to take her meals apart from the family, with a visitor in the house. The continuance of such a course would convey an impression, not so much false, as undesirable. She therefore "desired" Miss Norah's presence at supper, and made known her wishes for the future. But Noddy pleaded headache as excuse for that evening, and remained in her room, hearing the sounds of music come faintly up from the drawing-room when the door was opened, till bedtime.

Next morning, Noddy was up and about soon after the lark. As blithely as he, she was singing about her work, for there is nothing in all the world like cheerful work to prevent any one feeling dull and unhappy.

How strange a drawing-room looks in the morning light, in all the disarrangement of only a "little music" of the night before! The piano heaped up with songs—songs on the floor—songs on the tables, on the chairs—here and there—everywhere. Furniture untidy and displaced—antimacassars to be newly smoothed and arranged. Confusion that the sun lights up into chaotic disorder, but which candlelight eyes do not notice. Nobody ever dared touch the drawing-room to "tidy" it but Noddy,—that was her particular province and her pride. There she was, that bright June morning, sweeping and sweeping away, and singing, as her mind, like the lark's, soared above the dust.

"Bravo! Cousin Noddy!" It was Mr. Frank, who had been strolling about the lawn with a cigar in the fresh morning air, and who had walked up to the window.

"O dear," said Noddy, "please don't tease me. Don't you see I'm busy?"

"I'm coming in to see," said Mr. Geogagan, entering the easement.

Noddy looked pleasant enough as she was surprised in her print morning-dress,—her brown hair neatly arranged close to her head, where it could not stop without struggling out into little curls here and there,—and a faint blush on her cheeks,—partly shy, partly vexed at being caught, and partly ashamed of being vexed. "O, please, go away,—do,—or I must sweep you up," she entreated; and "O, please go away," she added more seriously, remembering Mrs. Muciller had cautioned her respecting her behavior to Mr. Geogagan. So Mr. Frank went and finished his cigar by himself.

CHAPTER III.

Six weeks had come and gone at Brathfield Villa. The advertisement had been inserted five times, but still no answer. A situation as governess is not the easiest thing to obtain. It is something like that of prime-minister,—there are always plenty of candidates for the office, and most of the candidates (poor things) are about as well fitted for it.

Mr. Frank had more than fulfilled Mrs. Muciller's most sanguine anticipations. He had proved a most attentive cavalier to Julia. He paid respectful deference to her piano performances and to her singing; indeed, he seemed particularly impressed with her rendering of Twilight Twitterings—a Revery, by some muddle or other, that sounded very like fairies hammering in tin tacks. As for music! I am only surprised at Mr. Frank's taste; but I suppose it came new to him on his return from India. He would lounge about, smoking, whilst Julia painted flowers or embroidered him a smoking-cap. He accompanied her in walks and rambles; he was her attendant at croquet parties, and picnics, and morning calls. Julia received these courtesies with artificial unaffectedness, and her mother remarked them with inward satisfaction. Nothing afforded Mrs.

Muciller more sincere delight than when people began to couple Julia's name with Mr. Geogagan's. They were not actually engaged, however; indeed, beyond the courtesies referred to, Mr. Frank had made not the slightest attempt at anything more decisive. But still, people will talk, and Mrs. Muciller liked to hear them. People began vaguely to suppose that Julia had made a fortunate hit, and that was in all probability an accomplished fact; but they hesitated to do more than hint their belief, without something like foundation. Mrs. Muciller, fully aware of the important part gossip plays in the history of daily life, determined to turn it to account. She reasoned thus: Mr. Geogagan is evidently impressed with Julia, but he is a little shy, or dilatory, in coming to the point. In either case, a favorable rumor may do much in bringing about a desirable result. It may encourage him; it must stimulate him.

With this idea, in the course of her next private conversation with Mrs. Sharing, when that lady inquired, with certain friendly nods and elevations of the eyebrows, if she might venture to offer congratulations on a certain fortunate event, Mrs. Muciller gave her unmistakably to understand that she might, although perhaps expressed in that coy language of partial reserve with which women like to enhance the value of private communications.

Now, thought Mrs. Muciller, I know Mrs. Sharing to be the greatest gossip in the neighborhood. She will be certain to spread the news of Julia's rumored engagement far and wide. It will undoubtedly get round to Frank Geogagan, and will lead him at once to make that proposal for which he seems so ready. So the rumor shall make the fact and the fact keep the rumor in countenance.

Meantime the subject of Mrs. Muciller's design appeared to be in most genial ignorance. He continued to pay the same respectful attentions to his charming cousin Julia. He took little notice of Noddy, as a consideration for the lady of the house indeed dictated, for he had more than once observed that any slight attention to Miss Cray was visited on her with a glance of disfavor from Mrs. Muciller when she thought he was not looking. But Frank Geogagan had very quick, restless eyes that could see round a corner.

As for Noddy, if she owned to herself one feeling at all about the matter, it was just one of sadness that a school-girl should render a man so artificial and constrained, and unlike his real self, as she thought Mr. Geogagan was becoming. But there was another feeling at the bottom of her heart, that Noddy would not own to herself. The wind bloweth where it listeth: you cannot tell whence it comes or how. There were Phœnician ships with sails ever set that carried their owners without oar or effort whithersoever they listed.

And in these six weeks Noddy had come to love Mr. Frank. She would not have confessed it to herself: she would have despised herself had she believed it. How was it? Dear soul! Is there any better reason to be given for loving anybody than the child's reason,—Because I do? Must we not all come back to that? Noddy had seen few people; few people had ever taken notice of her, or seemed to think of her as worth talking to or caring about. Mr. Frank always had a word of some sort for her. Many a morning he would chat pleasantly to her as she dusted the room; many a time he would refrain from speaking to her, or of her, before Mrs. Muciller, for her sake. Well, you may say this, or you may put it how you will, but you will have to come back to the little child's reason at last, for all the wiser people in the world who have tried to give any better explanation have talked nonsense, and, what is more, owned it.

Frank Geogagan had made many friends in the neighborhood, and it was not long before one of them congratulated him on his engagement to Julia Muciller. It staggered him at the first; but, bless you! Mr. Frank had his eyes about him. He took it as coolly as possible; never said a word to contradict it. He saw it would not do, as this would be a palpable reflection on Mrs. Muciller, by whose tacit indorsement at least he ascertained such a report had obtained currency at all. He just smiled, and thanked his friends, and so gave renewed credence to the report, which now had received the final stamp of veracity. Mind, I do not defend Mr. Frank's conduct; I only state what he did: and now I am going to tell you what came of it.

Dear reader, — you who have followed me thus far, — do you think I am telling you fiction? If so, I ought not to make Frank Geogagan a party after the fact to a deceit. There was once an audience that thought the squeak of Archippus more lifelike than that of the real pig. Remember this.

The latter end of August a picnic had been arranged to Cheriegh Lake, — a most delightful jaunt, and Mrs. Muciller, Julia, and her Indian lover were to go, of course. It so happened, however, at the very last minute, that important business required Mr. Geogagan's attention in London. I need not further relate the nature of the business than to say it was understood to be something in connection with the Indian Reclamation of Land Company, and that it was urgent. It was not a letter that summoned Mr. Geogagan, but a printed notice, stating that, in consequence of the sudden depreciation of shares (which had previously gone up many hundred per cent above their paid-up value), a heavy call was to be made on the shareholders.

Mind, — once more. It is not for me to defend Mr. Geogagan. I take the facts as they come. I cannot apologize for facts, and won't. It was settled that Mrs. Muciller and her daughter were to go to the picnic, while Mr. Geogagan went to London to transact his business. Mr. Frank never went near the metropolis at all; he just marched over to Mr. Sharing's to smoke a cigar. And when the house was clear, Noddy sat down at her books to study teaching.

It has been said Mrs. Muciller knew Mrs. Sharing for a gossip. Mr. Frank also knew Mr. Sharing for one. With this knowledge, how it was he went and confided to such a man the state of his affairs, I must leave you to guess.

Over their cigars he stated something like this to Mr. Sharing: "The fact is this. Every penny I could get together I put into this Indian Land Reclamation scheme. The shares went up fabulously, till a hundred pounds became worth thousands. The scheme was feasible, and likely to succeed and to pay at any premium the shares could go to, it was so good. I had every confidence in it. Suddenly, a panic comes, the shares drop nearly to par before we in England can get the intelligence, and we are called on to pay up our amounts. Now, I know you are accustomed to advance money on security, — will you lend me three thousand pounds on a deposit of shares to twice the amount?"

"Ah, my young friend," said Mr. Sharing, "you see that's your way and the way of yours, always. Here you go and mix yourself up in the rashest of speculations without a chance of success, — as independent as you can be, all the time, — you're all alike. Then you get into a hole, as we say — and you come to me to help you out. Look you; your shares are not worth that," — and he snapped his fingers, — "not worth the paper they are printed on. Three thousand pounds? Three thousand fiddles, sir."

"But," said Mr. Frank, "it is only a temporary depression, owing to a panic: the scheme is a good one, — the shares will go up again."

"Yes, like a gunpowder mill! The whole affair will explode, — that will be the next rise, and the only one. I'm sorry for you, — sorry for you, sir," — Mr. Sharing gently emphasized his sorrow by tapping it out with his finger-points on the table, — "thought you had better judgment. You are just like a moth. You have been dazzled with a glittering prospect, and rushed straight into the flame. Now you complain that your wings are singed."

"Pardon — I have not complained. I do not believe my case so bad as you represent, and I do not yet despair of making you see it in a different light. Rumor may have informed you that I have been so fortunate as to secure the affections of Miss Muciller. I have not made minute inquiries as to the amount of that young lady's fortune, not wishing to appear mercenary, but I have every reason to suppose, from the style in which her mother and herself are living, and from the fact of her being an only daughter, that she will receive a handsome portion on her marriage. If you take this into consideration, you may be disposed to look upon my security as at least sufficient to cover the loan I seek."

Mr. Sharing was silent for a minute. "That is how the wind blows, is it!" he thought. "So you fancied you had got hold of a fortune, my fine fellow; and Mrs. Muciller, on her part, was of very much the same opinion respecting you. Why, the girl won't have a penny! As if the style in which a woman lives, who has a daughter to marry, could be the least criterion of her means! You know very little of the world, Mr. Frank." But he remarked aloud: "I have certainly heard of your happiness in that respect, but you will bear in mind you are not yet married to Miss Muciller. There's many a slip, you know. And in addition to this, I have every reason to believe that whatever may be the extent of Miss Muciller's fortune, it would be placed beyond her husband's control." — "That's about the neatest way I can put it without injuring the young lady," he thought. "For that matter, her fortune is beyond anybody's control!" And he smiled and tapped the table again.

"Well, sir?" said Mr. Frank.

"Well, sir?"

"Then I am to understand that you refuse to entertain the question?"

"Entirely. I don't discount possibilities, but only extreme probabilities. It is not in my line."

"I need not remind you, at any rate, that the subject of our conversation is private," said Mr. Frank.

"And confidential. Certainly. — May I offer you another cigar? — No? — Well, if you must be going, good morning, sir."

"Private and confidential — stuff and nonsense!" Mr. Sharing observed to himself, as soon as he was alone. "That is all very fine, young gentleman, — but it is right Mrs. Muciller should get just a hint that her great catch is a very little fish that had better be thrown into the river again. I will tell Mrs. Sharing, and trust her to make use of the information."

Mr. Frank went back to Braithfield, and found Noddy sitting in the window trying hard to perfect herself in the mysteries of the accordance of French participes passés. She was huddled up with her book in her lap, her elbows on her knees, and her head in her hands.

"Noddy!"

"What, not gone to London? Have you missed the train, Mr. Geogagan?"

"No, — neither: I was not going. Put on your bonnet, and come out for a walk."

She hesitated.

"Come, put away your books. The walk will do you good, and Julia will not be jealous."

Still she hesitated; she thought of Mrs. Muciller.

"Come, Noddy; I'm in difficulty and some trouble, and I think you can help me. So, put away those books."

Noddy hesitated no longer. In two minutes, she was ready, and came down with a calm, wise expression on her little face, ready to help.

They set out, and walked for nearly half an hour without a word. Noddy remembered she was wanted for help or advice of some kind, and so was quiet, waiting to hear. Through pleasant corn-fields, glistening like seas of restless gold, while the warm summer breath passed over the ripe ears, and bowed them in long fleeting waves, whereon the cloud-shadows floated, — wide, swelling waves that calmly rolled the sunshine along to cool reedy music, as the breeze played on the heavy grain, — and burning poppies were upheaved or borne under by the chasing waves. By hedges, bright with summer flowers, and cool with ferns and creeping green. Along paths patterned over with the moving shadows of oak, and elm, and willow.

"Noddy, what would you say if I told you I was ruined?"

"I should say I did n't believe you."

"All the property I have in India is in the 'Anglo-Waddy Company' for the reclamation of land from the sea. I doubt if I shall ever see a sixpence of it again. Mr. Sharing told me to-day the share certificates are not worth the paper they are printed on."

"Well," said Noddy, "I thought you said you were ruined. Is that all?"

"All?" he returned rather sharply. "Is it not enough to be ruined? Not a sixpence of it, not a penny-piece, shall I see again!"

"O," Noddy said, half talking to herself, "is that ruin? It seems to me a man is never ruined while he has life, and health, and strength, and cheerful courage."

"It is easy to talk. You never had any money to lose."

"No; not much. But I have a little property for all that."

"Indeed. And, pray, how much?"

"Thirty pounds in the savings-bank, which my father left me."

Mr. Frank laughed, despite his own trouble.

"Dear me! I did n't know you were an heiress before. How you would grieve to lose your money!"

"I should be sorry."

"Then you can't find fault with me for being the same at losing so many thousands."

"The amount makes no difference. My thirty pounds is my all, and I should be just as sorry to lose it as you are at losing your all. But though I'm only a woman, I should n't say I was ruined, — that is absurd."

"You are a Job's comforter, at all events."

"There are very few comforters like Job's, in these days," said Noddy, — "very few persons who would sit down in silent sympathy, the deepest of all sympathies, for three days and three nights with a friend."

"So you look upon me as a friend?"

"Yes," said Noddy, blushing a little, but displeased with herself for doing so, on account of an avowal so innocent.

"And can you give me any better advice than Job's friends?"

"Perhaps not."

"Tell me what you think I ought to do."

"Do?" said Noddy, quickly. "Go and work. It's a brave thing, work is. You will forget all about being ruined, and only remember you are a man, doing a man's work. I don't know what I should do without work myself; it is the most soothing and refreshing comfort I know, even to me, and it must be better to a man. But your case is nothing like Job's. If it had been only his money Job had lost, his friends would just have stayed at home, and sent messengers offering to help him to work, and Job is just the sort of man who would have been content to take it."

"Noddy, I really believe you're right."

"I'm sure I am. Have n't you seen me sweep?"

"Yes," laughed Mr. Frank; "but that is hardly in my way, — digging would come more natural than that."

"Then dig. But there's plenty of work for earnest workers with brains without digging. I don't pretend to tell you the exact direction in which it lies, because that is out of my province; but I am sure you will find it, if you are in earnest."

"I will," said Mr. Frank, and he was quiet again for a little.

And Noddy was quiet too. She had something on her mind she wished to say, but hardly liked to mention it. However, she began: "If you mean what you say, you will not remain much longer here."

"I shall not remain much longer here," he echoed abstractedly.

"You will begin at once to strike out a new path, as a brave man should; and you will walk as straight, and feel as proud as a man ought who feels he is neither ruined nor disgraced when he has only lost his money."

"Gently, Noddy. People don't like to see much of this sort of thing in any but the rich."

"Then people are wrong, and must be shown so. But what I want to say is this: if you have lost all your money, you may have expenses to meet, and one thing and another that may harass you, and prevent your beginning clear."

Mr. Frank nodded. "Quite so," he said, and shook his head gravely.

"Well, would you mind, — that is, if I lent you twenty pounds of my property, would you be certain sure to pay it back to me again somewhere? I can't spare more very well, as I want ten pounds of it to get myself ready for the situation I am looking for. But I thought it might come in handy."

"Just so," said Mr. Frank, and shook his head again gravely; "there's no doubt about it."

"You see, I should not have proposed it, but I should charge you interest, and that would do away with all obligation."

"Entirely," Mr. Frank coincided; "that would be a regular commercial transaction. And the interest would be?"

"Three per cent, — the same as the bank gives."

"And you would require my note of hand for the amount?"

"No," said Noddy, laughing at the idea as absurd; "I can trust you for that."

"What! for nearly all your property?"

"Yes; because it would not ruin me if I lost it."

"Well, I will take your money, Noddy, — it will be very acceptable, — and I won't cheat you."

"No," Noddy said; "I hope you won't, for I look upon it as safe as the bank."

Mr. Frank laughed.

So it was settled that Noddy should draw her money from the bank on the following day.

"You are a good little friend, Noddy," Mr. Frank said, as they walked home.

"No," Noddy said; "I hope I should have done as much for any one."

Noddy meant to tell the truth. Maybe she "hoped" she would; but I am not at all certain she would. However, she had never before felt so rich as at the prospect of helping Mr. Frank. Her twenty pounds seemed to her quite a large property, and she almost jumped to the conclusion that it would go a good way towards making a prosperous man of Mr. Geogagan again.

Mrs. Muciller and Julia returned from the picnic party rather bored. It was "awfully slow," Julia decided; and "so many stuck-up girls that it was quite horrid."

Mr. Geogagan spent the evening listening to Julia's music with as much apparent appreciation and interest as though he had not been unsuccessful in his attempt to raise the loan he wished from Mr. Sharing.

CHAPTER IV.

One day passed — two days — three days, with little worthy of remark. Then Mrs. Muciller, becoming impatient at receiving no replies to the advertisement respecting Norah Cray, made a call on Mrs. Sharing to consult her about some immediate steps for getting Noddy out. At the close of her visit, Mrs. Sharing imparted the bit of news she had been burning to tell, but yet treasured up for her last communication, — namely, that on the most reliable authority her Indian nephew was not worth a dozen rupees; and that he had actually attempted to raise a loan on his prospects of marriage with Miss Muciller.

"Quite absurd, you know," said Mrs. Sharing; "but it just shows what he is worth."

"But I know he has money," Mrs. Muciller protested indignantly. "I'm certain of it. That Reclamation Company is a wonderfully good thing, and I know his money is in that. I have made every inquiry."

"Exactly. But that is the very reason. The Anglo-Waddy Company has gone to entire ruin. My husband says the shares are not worth sixpence."

This was a great blow for Mrs. Muciller, especially remembering that she had only herself to blame for promulgating the report of Julia's engagement to this adventurer. The one little bit of comfort she had remaining was, that Mr. Geogagan had been as much deceived in thinking Julia had expectations as she had been with him. But that did not mend the matter, which presented itself to her mind in the light of a most atrocious take-in, and she said so.

"Well, but," said Mrs. Sharing, "the Company was prospering when he left India, and there is no reason to suppose he has been guilty of intentional deception."

"What has that to do with it? How does that make any reparation for the injury it has caused to my daughter's prospects? Everybody knows of the engagement, and people will talk. O, how they will talk! It is abominable! It will be most prejudicial to Julia to break it off now; but it must be done at any cost. And a most fortunate escape it will be."

Mrs. Muciller returned to tea at Braithfield Villa, outwardly calm and cool, but, as may be imagined, in not the most placid serenity of mind. She made not the slightest alteration in her behavior to Mr. Geogagan, who appeared in very fair spirits, and entirely unsuspecting of the coming storm.

Mrs. Muciller was a woman of quick action; a course once resolved on with her was put into execution immediately. When tea was finished she blandly requested Noddy and Julia to leave the room. Her manner of doing this was so marked that had Mr. Frank not been deeply interested in a book he was reading on the sofa, he might have had his suspicions aroused.

When they were alone Mrs. Muciller commenced: "Mr. Geogagan, will you do me the favor to pay attention to a few words I have to say?"

"I am all attention," said Mr. Frank, dropping his book and drawing himself comfortably on to the sofa-cushion.

"When you invited yourself as my guest I had not the slightest idea that you would place me in a false position."

"Nor I," said Mr. Frank resignedly, his hands languidly crossed, with the air of a martyr.

"I had no idea that you would avail yourself of my hospitality to betray the confidence naturally reposed in a visitor."

Mrs. Muciller paused, expecting an answer; but Mr. Frank was silent.

"Or," she continued, "I should not have extended towards you that hospitality. You will excuse my being plain, but it is my duty to be so."

Mr. Frank extended his hands and bent his head, as deprecating such an apology.

"Your conduct towards my daughter Julia has been most heartlessly cruel."

"Excuse me," said Mr. Frank.

"Pardon me; I don't wish to be interrupted. Most heartlessly cruel. You have paid her marked attentions at home and abroad, and have given currency to a most undesirable report that you were engaged to her, without any reference whatever to my wishes or feelings. I do not, of course, pretend to know the extent to which you have influenced her mind, or the hold you may have succeeded in obtaining over her affections; but I must say you have no right to promulgate a report that, in my opinion, is injurious to my daughter's prospects."

"I have paid your daughter no more attention than ordinary courtesy to a relative would dictate.

As to an engagement, I have not thought it needful to make a reference to you on the subject, Mrs. Muciller, not having had the slightest notion of such a thing, until I heard the report you allude to, which certainly did not originate from me."

"It is most singular how such a report could have obtained currency had you given no occasion for it," said Mrs. Muciller.

"There I agree with you; and significant also," said Mr. Frank.

"And significant also. Had your attentions to Julia been restricted to home courtesies, it might have been less so. But when you seek, on the strength of such a report, previously disseminated by you, to use your rumored engagement as the security on which to borrow money, it becomes still more than significant; it becomes conclusive of something that is detestably disgraceful."

Mrs. Muciller paused, wishing for an answer to a shot that combined truth and falsehood so deftly that she knew it would tell; but there was only one answer Mr. Frank could have given at the moment. If it had been a man who had stung him like this, Mr. Frank would have knocked him down; but as it was a lady, he was silent.

"In entering my household," Mrs. Muciller proceeded, "you led me tacitly to understand that you were at least in as prosperous a position as I had reason to believe you were some years ago. It is useless to say you did not actually state this in so many words; you led me to believe it, and took no pains to dissipate such a belief. Such conduct I can only characterize as the basest duplicity. You then sought, by the cunning artifice of a hinted engagement with my daughter, to mortgage her expectations as well as to injure her prospects. Such a proceeding I can only stigmatize as contemptible and systematic villany. Your future course, whilst you remain in my house—"

But Mr. Frank just walked into the hall, took his hat, and scribbling a pencilled address on an envelope, gave it to the servant for Miss Cray, and walked out, leaving his luggage and personal effects to be sent after him.

The note contained only an acknowledgment of the sum of twenty pounds borrowed from Norah.

THE TRYST IN TWIN-TREE LANE.

AT midnight between the 9th and 10th of May, 18— (it is less than thirty-five years ago), there occurred a meeting which, whether for the incongruity of its constituent elements, the difficulties with which it was encompassed, its gloom and mystery, or its actual purpose, has, to the best of the writer's belief, no parallel in social history.

During the period that has since elapsed, many minor particulars have come to light, and supplied the materials for as circumstantial a narrative of this singular transaction as the most curious inquirer could desire.

On the evening of the 8th of May, that is, the day preceding the incident about to be related, the family of Mr. Newton Horsfall, of Cowling Priors, Herts, noticed something unusual in that gentleman's demeanor.

Mr. Horsfall was the representative of an old and loyal county family. Though of somewhat quiet and retiring habits, he was an active county magistrate, and, the previous year, had served the office of high sheriff. Aged, at this period, about forty-eight, he had married seven years before a lady twenty years his junior, by whom he had a son and daughter.

At dinner, on the day above mentioned, Mr. Horsfall's disturbance seemed to increase. He ate but little, was silent and abstracted, and, contrary to his wont, appeared relieved when his wife's departure left him to his own meditations. He moved restlessly in his chair, got up and paced the room, and, finally, sitting down at a bureau that stood in a corner of the room, fell to examining some papers he selected from its contents. These he divided into two portions, one of which he tore up to the minutest particles, the other he placed under seal and restored to its former place. It was known at an after period that he had also opened and reperused his will.

This done, he rested his head on both hands and resumed his anxious meditations. Suddenly he spoke aloud.

"I will,—yes, I will do it. Yes, come what may, the reproach of being absent shall not attach alone to me. Let danger, let what is worse, ridicule, attend this proceeding, I am of a race that keep their faith, and —"

"Newton!" said a gentle voice, and a white hand glistened on his shoulder. "I have not been your wife for seven years," resumed Mrs. Horsfall, "without learning to read your face. You have a trouble, dear; the first, I hope and believe, you have not permitted me to share. Forgive my eaves-dropping. My anxiety was intolerable. What has happened?"

Mr. Horsfall smiled.

"Happened, my love? Nothing, nothing in the world. The worst is,—the very worst is, that—that—I must leave you for some thirty-six hours, and that, unfortunately, this very night."

"To-night!"

"I understand your consternation, my dear," said her husband, trying to speak lightly; "we have people to dinner to-morrow, and unless they would consent to wait till six in the morning, my Lucy must be host and hostess too."

"O Newton, it is impossible!"

"Try."

"But will you tell me nothing more?"

"Every word, dear; but not now."

"Newton, I have a petition to make to you."

"Speak it, love."

"Take me with you."

"Not if,—ahem—my dear, it is impossible," said the magistrate. "You must remain to receive our friends, and assure them that nothing short of business that would not brook an hour's delay compelled me to be absent from my post. Now, if you love me, not another question. Ring the bell, like a sensible woman, and order the carriage at four."

"Four in the morning?" ejaculated Mrs. Horsfall, faintly, and burst into tears.

"The idea is terrible," said the magistrate, smiling; "but take courage. Duty calls."

"May I go with you part of the way?"

"To London? Certainly, if you wish it. All the way."

It was not in his very gentlest accents that Jacob Gould, the coachman, acquainted his pampered horses with the astounding fact that they were required to turn out of their comfortable nests, as he himself had done, at four in the morning. As for Mr. Horsfall himself, now that he had apparently resolved upon his course of action, he grew more cheerful, and jested gayly with his wife as he put her into the carriage. At the top of Regent Street he stopped the carriage and beckoned to a hackney coach.

"God bless you, my love!" he cried, leaning from the window: and, adding a word of direction to the driver, was jolted away.

"Where did your master say, Robert?" asked Mrs. Horsfall.

"Why? seller, Piccadilly, 'm," retorted Robert, with a slight cough, meant to intimate that travelling so early did not agree with him.

"I will alight here also," said Mrs. Horsfall. "Let the carriage be put up for an hour or two. You and Jacob get some breakfast, then return home, and see that the letters I have left be delivered immediately. I shall not be back until to-morrow, with your master. Call that coach."

"Piccadilly," was the direction she gave, but, stopping the coach in a minute or two, she asked the driver what was the White Horse Cellar.

"Place wheer the Brighton coaches plies from," was the answer.

"Drive to the Elephant and Castle," said Mrs. Horsfall, "and be quick."

"Is there a Brighton coach about to start?" Mrs. Horsfall inquired, eagerly, as they mingled with the mass of coaches which, at that period congregated round the well-known hostel.

"Yes, 'm, the Age, in a moment; — one inside?" telegraphed a porter to the Brighton driver, who nodded.

Mrs. Horsfall was in her place in a moment, and whisking along through Tooting, half an hour ahead of her husband, supposing, indeed, he had taken that road. But she was far from content with herself. Twenty times, during the journey, she wished the step untaken. As often she succeeded in persuading herself that her disobedience was pardonable, and preferable, whatever its consequence, to the anxiety she would have had to endure; for that her husband was bound on an expedition of danger, she entertained no manner of doubt.

It was a period of discontent, and much uneasiness. From causes not necessary here to recall, the working classes in several counties had allowed themselves to be moved to serious outrage. Incendiarism was the order of the day, or night, and it was no uncommon thing to see the horizon lit up in twenty places with the fires that guilty hands had kindled. Everywhere there was a vague apprehension of a visit from the "mob," which noun of multitude was supposed to be prowling about, burning and pillaging the houses of the rich, and, in more than one instance, justifying the fear. Mrs. Horsfall trembled, as it occurred to her that her husband's excursion was connected with the repression of these disturbances.

She had resolved upon her course of action; and, accordingly, quitted the coach at a small hotel at the very entrance of Brighton, at which most of the coaches halted for a moment. Here she obtained an apartment facing the road, and, shrouded in the curtains, set herself to scrutinize the passengers of each vehicle, as they successively arrived.

The vigil was tedious, but, at six o'clock, her patience was rewarded. As the Red Rover dashed up to the door, the familiar face was discernible at the coachman's side.

Mrs. Horsfall had concluded that he would certainly go on to Castle Square, and had prepared herself to step into a fly, and follow. To her astonishment, however, if not alarm, he quietly descended, obtained his valise, and entered the same modest hostel in which his wife had already taken refuge.

In the course of the evening, Mrs. Horsfall, by skilful inquiry, contrived to learn that the magistrate had dined, by himself, in the coffee-room, had subsequently smoked a cigar, and, that finished, gone to the play.

"To the —" Mrs. Horsfall had some difficulty in checking her ejaculation of surprise.

But the gentleman would return at eleven; only the porter was not to go to bed, as he was going out again, and might be absent some hours.

Mrs. Horsfall's heart gave a throb.

"That is it, then," she murmured, and sunk into trembling meditation. In this condition we must leave her, and repair to another part of the country.

Doctor S., who at this time presided over an important inland diocese, and was in the prime of intellectual, if not physical life, was a man who never spared himself in his Master's service. It was therefore an unmistakable token of overtaxed energies, when the bishop, sinking into his chair on the evening of the 7th of May, acknowledged that a brief respite from labor would not be unacceptable to him. His wife caught at the idea. For the last few days, a sort of harassed look, not habitual with him, had attracted her attention. He wanted rest.

"How I wish, my dear," said Mrs. S., "that you could escape, if it were but for four or five days, from all hard work! Now I really think that, with the assistance you can command, and —"

"My dear, you anticipate my thought," the good bishop replied. "Nothing would recruit me more effectually than a fair three days' holiday, exclusive of the travelling; a little unfatiguing journey, some whither, — say, towards the sea. I ought, yes, certainly, I ought to do it," he added, half to himself.

"That you ought!" exclaimed his wife, triumphantly. "I shall order William to prepare your things, so that, if you please, we can leave this very day."

"Gently, gently, my dear," said the bishop. "'We!' nay, nay; I must not take all my comforts with me, and expect to find health to boot. It is enough that I find rest, and — and change. I shall make my little expedition entirely alone."

"Alone!" echoed Mrs. S. "My dear, I shall be so nervous."

"On behalf of which of us, my love?" inquired the bishop, laughing. "Come, come, the dangers of the highways are reduced to a minimum. As regards the perils of damp sheets and doubtful fare, I can make your mind easy. I shall ask the hospitality of my cousin, Anna Meadows, at their pretty place near Brighton, and occupy the bachelor's room."

"At least, you will take Charles?"

(Charles was the bishop's nephew, his chaplain and secretary.)

The bishop hesitated. It was clear he purposed to have gone alone, but his wife's tone of entreaty prevailed. Moreover, he was very fond of his nephew.

"Well, well, Charles shall go."

They set off that day, and the next, May the 8th, saw them, to the delight of their amiable host and hostess, comfortably established at Parkhurst Dene. Mrs. Meadows was, indeed, a little disappointed next morning, when her right reverend guest announced, with some reluctance, that a business engagement of a pressing nature would compel him to absent himself for that evening and night, but that he would return early on the morrow. Except that his destination was Brighton, the bishop added no further particulars, and, the distance being but eight miles, the carriage was not ordered till four o'clock, at which time, accompanied by his nephew, he took his departure. He had made a feeble effort to shake off this faithful companion, but Charles had laughingly reminded him of the promise his aunt had exacted from him, not to lose sight of the bishop till the latter returned in safety. So the prelate had given way.

During the drive, their conversation turned upon the state of the agricultural districts. There had been some threatening of disturbance, and several incendiary fires visible from Brighton; but the presence of a large cavalry force at the latter place kept the fashionable folks entirely at their ease as regarded a visit from the "mob."

After passing through the village of Portslade, the bishop began to scrutinize the locality with keen interest.

"Here are spots," he observed, "in which escape or concealment would not be difficult for these misguided persons, should these ample rick-yards tempt them to fresh crime. We are approaching a still more broken — My friend," added the bishop, taking advantage of the carriage walking up a hill to accost a rustic who was at hand, "do you know Coldstone Bottom — and — and Twin-Tree Lane?"

"I 'low I do," said the man, "whereby I 've lived at Coldstone better nor twenty years. T' other 's to the left, handy."

For the remainder of the drive the bishop was silent and meditative. They were quickly in Brighton, when the bishop drove to the York Hotel, dismissed the carriage, and ordered apartments.

"We will dine together, Charles, at seven," he said to his nephew; "the evening is at your own disposal, for my work, which may possibly detain me to a late hour, admits of no assistance or interference."

There was an emphasis on the latter words that forbade remonstrance. But the Reverend Charles Lileham was sensible of an undefined anxiety which induced him to resolve that, happen what would, he must not let his honored relative wander far from his sight. It was a little before eleven when the bishop, suddenly rising, put on his great-coat, took his hat and stick, and, affectionately pressing his nephew's hand, walked quietly forth alone.

That night, the 9th of May, was a festival one at Brighton. A gentleman of the highest distinction, in his line, was receiving the compliment of what might be justly called a "public" dinner, inasmuch as it was held at the Clenched Fists, Birdcage Lane, North Street, and was open to any gentleman interested in the matter to the amount of three-and-sixpence, liquors not included.

It was well attended, for Mr. William Beekes, far better known as the "Bradford Dumpling," retired champion of England, was the son of a much-respected yeoman farmer in the vicinity, and, though making Bradford the city of his adoption, had never forgotten the peaceful village that gave him birth.

The heads he had punched in youth were, like his own, tinged with gray, — for the Dumpling had attained the (for the ring) patriarchal age of forty-five, — but his visits were hailed with undiminished enthusiasm, and, moreover, this 9th of May was the anniversary of the last great triumph of his professional career.

The festivities were prolonged to a late hour. At that disturbed period it was felt that the usual loyal toasts should be received with double honors, if not with double draughts, and it was past ten o'clock before the chairman arrived at the great toast of the evening.

A song (patriotic), and another (pugilistic), with choruses to both, wound up the evening; when, as closing time approached, it was proposed to escort the ex-champion to his private residence in Burr Alley, West Street, give him three cheers, and dismiss him to his slumbers. But to this little attention the Dumpling opposed a strenuous opposition. He preferred walking home quietly, alone and unrecognized, — indeed, he was not going home, leastways, not yet. He had an engagement beyond the town, Patcham way, and it was near upon the time. To the playful comment of one of his friends that it was a "rum start," the Dumpling merely responded with a wink. To another, a little fluttered with drink, who affectionately insisted upon bearing him company whithersoever he was bound, the Dumpling offered just sufficient personal violence to disable him from doing anything of the sort, and, having at length shaken off his friends, strode away. It was at this time nearly half-past eleven.

The same evening Colonel Spurrier, commanding the gallant Hussar regiment at that time occupying Brighton barracks, had dined at the mess. The circumstance was not of frequent occurrence, the colonel being a married man, and having a house in Brunswick Square. During the meal a letter, bearing the police official seal, was delivered to him. The colonel read it with a serious look, but not till later in the evening did he communicate the contents to the officers present. It seemed that the authorities had been warned of the probability of a meeting of the chief promoters of discontent, at some spot near Brighton, and, fearing that the ordinary civil force might prove insufficient to effect the capture, the magistrates requested that a small military detachment might be held in readiness to act in case of need.

The colonel supplemented his information by issuing the necessary directions, and added that he should himself sleep in barracks that night, although, for the next two hours at least, he must unavoidably be absent.

"Perhaps," he added, smiling, as he threw on a cloak and lit his cigar, "I may bring back some information of the enemy's movements. I am not going into the town."

"Permit me, sir," said the young adjutant, "to recommend you not to go entirely unarmed. Your face is known, and if these lurking rascals are in earnest —"

"Well, well; lend me your pistols, Baird," said the colonel, and, thrusting them into his pocket, walked away.

The clock struck eleven as the sentry at the gate saw the colonel suddenly quit the high-road, and strike across the rising grounds in rear of the barracks.

Another event of some interest had signalized this especial evening, the 9th of May, at Brighton.

That admirable comedian, Mr. L., had wound up a starring engagement of six nights, with a benefit that attracted nearly all the play-going world of that gay watering-place. He had acted in three pieces with unsurpassable humor, marked, however, as the night drew on, with a haste and excitement unusual with him, and which did not escape the notice of his fellow-performers. He was perpetually glancing at his watch; fell into quite a passion at a trifling delay between the second and last pieces; ordered a fly to be in waiting at the stage-door, and, the moment the curtain fell (it was then full half-past eleven), threw himself, dressed as he was into the vehicle, and, calling out "Patcham! quick!" drove furiously away, disregarding the very treasurer, who, with his hands full of notes and gold, stood prepared to settle accounts with the fortunate star, in order that the latter might start, as he proposed, early on the morrow.

The traveller who passes old Brighton church, and, crossing the top of the hill, takes a by-path on the right, leading in the direction of Patcham, would, thirty years ago, have traced the windings of a very pretty rural lane, bordered on the one hand by beech and chestnut trees, on the other by a high bank, beyond which cornfields stretched away in the direction of the Dyke downs. Half-way down the lane the path, widening for a few yards, left room for a rude seat, which was under the immediate shelter and protection of two large beech-trees, so precisely similar in shape and size, as to have imparted to the path in question the title of Twin-Tree Lane. It was, at the time of which we speak, a sequestered place enough, and was approachable alike from the high-road through Patcham, and from that which crosses the Old Church hill.

It was a few minutes only short of midnight, on the eventful 9th of May, that a lady, muffled in a cloak and hood, stopped her carriage at the entrance of Patcham, and, desiring the driver to await her return, struck across the fields to the left. The night was fair and still; with occasional bursts of radiance, as the moon struggled from one blue-black cloudbank to another.

Whenever this occurred the lonely wanderer strained her eyes to the utmost, as if in search of some receding object, but seemingly in vain.

At last she paused, and gave a sudden sniff.

"Thank Heaven!" she exclaimed, clasping her hands in real thankfulness. "That is his pipe! I should know it among a thousand. He must be close before me."

In effect, she fancied she could discern her husband's form not far in advance, and, shrinking closer into the shadow of the hedge, she continued to follow him. At the mouth of what was apparently a wooded lane the guiding shape suddenly disappeared! Mrs. Horsfall hurried forward, and, pausing to listen, thought she could now hear both the step and voice of her husband. He was passing up the lane, evidently with one or more persons, but with little thought of danger, for she heard his frank laugh ring through the quiet air.

"If they should have betrayed him into some ambush!" thought the anxious wife. "He is so unsuspecting!"

The party ahead seemed to make a sudden halt. Instinctively, Mrs. Horsfall shrank toward the border of trees, and, in doing so, almost came in contact with a man who was stepping from them. Fortunately, she did not cry out, and the manner, unmistakably gentlemanly, in which the stranger tendered his apologies, at once disarmed her fears. He looked at her, however, with a little astonishment, hesitated, then, as if a thought had struck him, said, —

"Is it possible — pray forgive me — that we are here on a similar errand? My name is Lileham, Charles Lileham, a minister of the church."

"Mine is Horsfall," said the lady, quickly. "I — I am in some anxiety about my husband, who is just before us, in company with I know not what dangerous and desperate men. O, what shall we do?"

"For the inoffensive character of one, at least, of his companions, I am prepared to answer," said the young clergyman, with a smile. "It is the Bishop of L., my uncle."

"The bishop!"

"Of his business here at this hour, I am as completely ignorant as you apparently are of Mr. Horsfall's. I fear I am transgressing his wishes in following him thus closely."

"Hark! There are more voices!" exclaimed Mrs. Horsfall. "They seem raised in anger."

"In amusement, rather, if I mistake not," said Mr. Lileham. "But come: if you will accept my guidance, you shall see what is passing. They have assembled under those two large trees. Will you permit me to show you the way?"

Mrs. Horsfall assented. In less than ten minutes they had reached the point indicated by Mr. Lileham. A bright stream of moonlight was pouring right into the recess canopied by the twin trees, and made the singular party therein assembled distinctly visible. It was composed of five individuals, seated on the curved bench, engaged in earnest and animated discussion. In the centre might be recognized the reverend and stately form of the Bishop of L., immediately on whose right sat the Bradford Dumpling, supported in his turn by Mr. Newton Horsfall, of Cowling Priors, Herts. On the left of the prelate might be seen the familiar, mirth-awakening lineaments of Mr. L., the celebrated low comedian, flanked by the commanding presence of Colonel Reginald Spurrier, of the —th Hussars.

The subject of their conversation was manifestly of the deepest interest. Of what could they possibly be talking? And why, — O, why this mystery? Mrs. Horsfall saw that her companion was as puzzled as herself, and that his countenance had become very serious indeed.

Suddenly they saw the colonel start to his feet. A horse-tramp approached from below, and his quick ear had been the first to catch the sound.

"I fear we are suspected," he said aloud. "Listen. I thought so. They are upon us from both sides!"

And in truth, next moment, an armed horse-patrol rode in from either side, and halted in the front of the party beneath the trees.

"Pleasant night, gentlemen," said the first patrol. "Curious time, though, to be sittin' here, ain't it?"

Mr. Horsfall conceded, in the name of himself and friends, that it might seem a curious time, but at the same time, inquired what business that was of the officer's?

"My business is to obey orders, that's all," replied the man. "And one of 'em is to perwert any gatherings at night we don't know the meaning of. It's our duty, gentlemen, to demand your names and occupations, preparatory to requesting you to move on."

"The man is right," said the bishop. "I could have wished it otherwise, but the fault is our own. My friend, I am a churchman. My name is S., Doctor S., Bishop of L."

"Wery likely," was the reply. "And this here gent" (pointing to the Dumpling), "he's the Lord Mayor of London, I suppose?"

"Come, my man, you are mistaken," said Colonel Spurrier, striding out into the full moonlight. "If you are unacquainted with the face of the reverend gentlemen, perhaps you know mine?"

He took off his hat.

"Colonel Spurrier!" cried the men, saluting.

"This is Mr. Horsfall, a magistrate of Hertfordshire," resumed the colonel. "My other two friends are already known to you."

"I beg your pardon, gentlemen," said the patrol. "There was notice give, you see, of a hillegal meeting to-night, near Brighton, and seeing parties pinting this way, we thought we was down upon 'em. Whatever you was a-doing here's best known to yourselves."

"Stay," said the bishop; "I feel that some fuller explanation is needed. Whatever jesting comments our meeting may provoke, I for one am content to bear them, for the pleasure it has afforded me. Have I your permission, gentlemen to state the facts?"

"We five whom you find assembled here were in early youth schoolmates at an establishment situated at no great distance from the spot on which we stand. Twin-Tree Lane, as I find it is still called, was a favorite half-holiday resort. Here we discussed our school affairs, or speculated upon the wide, uncertain future that awaited us in the tumult of the world. The death of our excellent master caused the sudden dispersion of the school, and it was on the evening before the general departure that we five, sitting together under our favorite trees, entered into a solemn agreement to meet, if God permitted, that day thirty years, at the same spot at midnight, with the purpose of declaring how Providence had hitherto dealt with us in our several ways of life, and comparing our actual experiences with the brilliant hopes of boyhood.

"So far asunder have our duties separated us (I myself for some years presided over a colonial see, and my friend, Colonel Spurrier, has served in India) that for the whole period of thirty years no two of us have ever met together, nor, indeed, so far as I am aware, held communication of any sort. It was a doubt with me whether every member of the party had not long since forgotten this boyish compact. There were also the difficulties that might have arisen, if remembered, in keeping it. But the solemnity with which it was made had left upon my mind, as it did upon others, an abiding impression. My pledge had been given and never withdrawn. I thought of the possibility of one of us at least, faithful to his word, groping his way hither in the faint hope of grasping an old friend's hand, and finding only darkness and a void. I was altogether wrong and mistrustful; here we are, all five, grateful for many mercies, cordially rejoicing to have met again; and, if our vocations in life have been widely diverse, I may, I think, say with truth, that we have wrought in them with honesty and singleness of purpose, without wrong to any, in thought, word, or deed. You are satisfied, my friends?"

The officer bowed, and apologizing for their interference, prepared to move on.

"Not a word," said the bishop; "you have only done your duty. Good night, and may you meet with no less loyal and peaceable men than you have surprised here."

"Here are two more watchers to be forgiven," said a voice familiar to the bishop, as two figures, male and female, suddenly descended into the road, and Mrs. Horsfall, bathed in tears, threw herself into the arms of her astonished husband, while Mr. Lileham, in a few words, explained the anxiety which had prompted their pursuit. Anger was out of the question; a general laugh announced that all was forgiven. Only the bishop attempted to frown, and that was a failure.

THE WOMAN OF THE FUTURE.

NOVELS are not more eagerly devoured by the unthinking multitude than the clap-trap written in the present day about women. Pope's famous line, "And fools rush in where angels fear to tread," can be so fitly applied to no other kind of criticism, and, naturally enough, as it requires little else but audacity, and proves extremely lucrative, the crop is abundant. One may safely say that a young author's fortune is made who can abuse women in a lively, ill-natured, and authoritative manner.

Frivolous, discontented, irrational, a creature of whims, a devotee of fashion, a victim of ennui, morally, physically, and intellectually feeble,—such is the woman of the present according to the satirists. The marvel is that they wish to see unchanged what they denounce as contemptible. If anything is proposed by which some of these faults must inevitably be eradicated, these consistent critics take affright. Let us keep these angels of perfection as they are, cry they, soft cushions whereon to rest masculine asperities. What would the world be like if womankind were changed from the lovely thing it is? and so on, the inconsequent multitude listening and believing.

Fortunately for all, this kind of writing, like any other form of sensationalism in literature, is of the day only, and will pass away. What has been said so often will tire even the foolish at last, and "we have piped unto you but ye have not danced" will be the lament of these once popular detractors. A great change, moreover, is taking place in public opinion regarding the education of women. The wise are more inclined to weep than laugh over the frivolities of the sex, and see no reason why this as well as any other element of unhappiness should not be eradicated from society. On one great point we imagine alike the serious-minded and the scoffer, the reformer and the epigrammatist, to be at one,—namely, that frivolity is evil and not good. Those who love the truth for truth's sake, and consider each individual life as an important unit of humanity, are bestirring themselves to remedy the evil; those who live without any sense of moral responsibility whatever try to hinder the work from pure selfishness or prejudice. To discuss the numerous schemes on behalf of the better education of women is quite foreign to the purpose of this paper. A few of these have already passed from the ordeal of popular contempt into the sunshine of popular favor; some still in embryo are too rational to meet with opposition from any quarter. Many others will doubtless be proposed when the world is ready for them. To own in the face of these facts that the woman of the future will resemble the woman of the present is to deny the entire sex all capability of moral and intellectual growth. If occupation exercises any influence upon the character whatever, — and there is little doubt that it exercises great influence, — generations to come will indeed feel thankful for the change. Deprecating as we do the sweeping assertions of clap-trap critics, we are forced to admit that there is wide room for improvement. Women are not universally so beautiful, so wise and so good as they might be, and it is to the interests of humanity that they should be beautiful, wise, and good. Consider, in the first place, the question of beauty. The more hopeful look forward to the time when something of the old Greek feeling for physical perfection shall have revived, and a simpler and more healthful life shall have fitted women to become mothers of a noble race. In this respect we are wiser than of old; but, though hygiene and common sense have done much for ourselves, they have done much more for our children.

We of the present generation are the offspring of tight-lacing mothers; but small waists, tight shoes, and other abominations are no longer universal. Dress is much better adapted to out-of-door life than formerly. Etiquette has been relaxed, and our young women enjoy a freedom from physical restraint undreamed of by their grandmothers. Health has ceased to be the monopoly of the other sex. Still, the majority of women lead far from wholesome lives; and as beauty is more or less a matter of health, too much can never be said against such abuses of it as are yet in fashion. The worst of these abuses is that they lead to a perversion of taste. Quite naturally the fragile type of beauty has become the standard of the present day, and men admire in real life the lily-cheeked, small-waisted, diaphanous-looking creatures idealized by living artists. When we become accustomed to a nobler kind of beauty we shall attain to a loftier ideal. Men will seek nobility rather than prettiness, strength rather than weakness, physical perfection rather than physical degeneracy, in the women they select as mothers of their children. Artists will rejoice and sculptors will cease to despair when this happy consummation is reached. Let none regard it as chimerical or Utopian. A very little rationalism brought to bear upon daily life would place physical well-being within reach of women of all ranks; and where health leads the way, beauty is seldom slow to follow.

Few will deny that wisdom whose essence is common sense has a large share in determining the happiness of social and domestic life. Is it not reasonable to suppose that the various reforms in female education will have proportionate effect upon the female character, and that the women of the future will differ from the women of the present intellectually as well as physically? Steady culture, increased habits of self-reliance wider views of life and a keener appreciation of the truth for truth's sake, can but enlarge and elevate the whole sex. The obvious inference is that just as a more healthful mode of existence will invigorate and beautify the bodies of women, so a rational mode of existence will strengthen and improve their minds. Frivolity, pettiness, inactivity, and other faults of which men most complain, will make room for opposite qualities; and who shall aver this to be against the interests of humanity? Perhaps nothing causes more domestic unhappiness than downright silliness. A foolish wife will often bring about as much mischief in her husband's home as a persistently evil-tempered one could do, and with the best intentions in the world is sure to hinder and hamper him upon every occasion. Now silliness is the first stronghold of evil that a good system of education will storm. Just so long as girls are trained to frivolity and irresponsible habits from childhood upwards will they become frivolous and irresponsible wives and mothers.

In granting, then, that the woman of the future must of necessity inherit a large share of physical and intellectual excellence, we are led to extend the same happy prophecy to the moral faculties. Women often commit grave as well as small errors, not because they are perverse by nature, but because their reason is at fault; and they fail to recognize the proportionate relation of things. Again, habits of subservience induce a cowardly attitude of mind. Very few women have the courage to be individual. Very few women estimate their own lives of any value in the fullest sense of the word. They know well enough that they have some use as wives, mothers, daughters: but that they can have any share in the well-being of the world does not occur to them. Self-development conveys to their minds something quite apart from the duty of wife, mother, or daughter, while the truth is that self-development embraces every other duty. Ill, therefore, does it become those who satirize women to hinder any efforts made on their behalf, whether educational or social; always remembering this, however, that such efforts are likely to do very little good which tend to make of women weak imitations of men.

A NIGHT WITH KING PHARAOH.

HIRING A DRAGOMAN.

"How I do envy you men!" said Mr. M'Baine, the bluff, pleasant English Consul at Cairo, throwing himself back in his chair, and purring away for a moment or two after he spoke through the cool rose-water in the vase of his narghilé, as he looked at me and Masters. "Bubble bubble," went the water with a sleepy, pleasant sound. I almost fancied myself sitting beside a fountain in Damascus, reading the love-verses of some Persian poet. "Here am I" (for the oracle, slowly withdrawing the bright amber mouthpiece, spoke again after a short interval of silence), "here am I, poor devil," he went on, "chained to my desk, signing papers, squabbling about contracts in Arabic, running backwards and forwards to Alexandria to see the Pasha, — never a day to myself; and here are you, young, rich, enthusiastic, going off to explore tombs, climb pyramids, wade through deserts-sands, copy cartouches, follow the very steps of Herodotus; in fact, as the Americans say, 'see the whole elephant'; while I am to be left plodding on at Cairo like an old mill-horse that I am. Is n't it desperate hard, Miss Shepherd?"

The worthy Consul, half an Arab in tastes, here stretched out his gaunt legs, assumed an aggrieved look, and rubbed his stubbly gray beard as if it was a talisman against trouble.

Miss Shepherd, one of three sandy, masculine, clever sisters about to visit Thebes and the First Cataract, replied that she only wished the Consul would accompany them; how delightful it would be! On which all three sisters turned up their eyes simultaneously and raised their hands.

We were a party of English travellers that night at the Consul's, all about to start for the First Cataract. We were going at different times, and in three different boats. Ramsay and Erskine, two enthusiastic young Scotch missionaries, first; next Masters and myself; lastly Mrs. Shepherd and her delightful daughters.

The Consul's large, dim, semi-oriental room had pierced lattices instead of windows, and its two large colored Chinese lamps scarcely shed more light than was just sufficient to observe the singularly pale, absorbed face of Erskine, the younger of the two Scotch clergymen, who sat with his eyes fixed intently on a string of tasselled ostrich-eggs that hung from the ceiling in the Arab manner.

I think I had never seen any one who so much resembled that eloquent enthusiast, Irving: the same handsome features, the same silken flow of long black hair, the same fine exalted expression, and all spoiled too by Irving's great defect, a cast — must we say it? — a painful squint, that gave a sinister and almost crazed look to the whole face.

"When do you two gentlemen start?" said Mrs. Shepherd, a good-natured, fussy woman, addressing Erskine and Ramsay; "and can you tell us how much money we ought to take, as I and Laura here differ on the subject?"

"My dear mamma," said the eldest and rather soured Miss Shepherd sarcastically, "how can you tease Mr. Erskine with such questions? You know Murray lays it all down, — twenty pounds for each person for the three months; and Murray is always right."

"You might just as well ask Erskine, Mrs. Shepherd, what horse to bet on for the next Derby," said Ramsay, laughing. "The prophecies about Egypt and the future of the Turk are all Davy here cares for. Well, so you've hired your boat, Barclay — good one — how much?"

"My friend Donovan, the commission agent," I replied, "is coming to-morrow to draw up our contract with Shoolamei. Wonderful creature, Donovan, — a real Irish Samson, up to every move. Our boat is one hundred and fifty ardebs burden, and is to cost forty pounds the month. We shall be second up the river."

"Yes; we start to-morrow, God willing," said Erskine, suddenly leaping into the conversation. "We shall be the first to hear the song of Memnon. O there is a great work to do in Nubia!"

"And we," said Mrs. Shepherd, "shall be third, I suppose. But pray, sir, who was this Mammon? Who was Mammon?"

"How can you, dear mamma, make such awful mistakes!" said the amiable Laura Shepherd. "Why, Memnon was one of the Pharaohs, of course. Mr. M'Baine, will you play us one of those extraordinary Arab airs on that curious sort of lute you have? O do."

The Consul was delighted; he took down a huge Egyptian lute and began an excruciatingly plaintive air, full of remarkable and subtle inflections not over-pleasant to English ears.

"Very singular, most remarkable! O thank you, thank you!" chorused the three Miss Shepherds.

"What a hideous row!" whispered Masters to me, with a sour look of hatred at the unconscious Consul, who kept humming Arabic songs. "Here, I'll give 'em something."

Masters went to the piano, as if at my request, and instantly broke forth into that sprightly, charming Welsh air, "The Bells of Aberdovey."

"Slight, but cheerful," said the Consul patronizingly. "It wants the tenderness of our Oriental music. Mr. Erskine, do you play?"

"O yes, he plays delightfully," said the Misses Shepherd.

"I am fond of music," said the young clergyman, gravely rhapsodizing; "but I fear my taste is an exceptional one. I like only old church music, and most especially the hymns of our early church. They seem to me like the voices of denouncing angels; they fill the air with prophecies of sorrow and doom; they speak loudly of coming wrath to the persecutor, to the good of beatitude ineffable. While I play, legions of the accursed appear to march and battle round me, till presently one bright note, like a sunbeam, glances across the turmoil, and then at once there rises before my mind the green calm of an unfading paradise."

"He played at Malta four hours without stopping," said Ramsay. "But I tell him it is dangerous for him, for he is not strong; and besides, he is working much too hard just now at his Arabic and Armenian."

"Evidently a tile loose," whispered Masters to me, touching his forehead as he spoke; "he's always at high-pressure."

By this time Erskine had seated himself at the piano and begun to play that grand hymn, the Dies iræ. He thundered out its warnings; he shot lightnings of swift-flashing notes across the deeper undercurrent of its threatened judgments; he clashed out screaming sounds as if of souls in torture; he struck the keyboard as if it had been an anvil, — sparks seemed almost to fly forth as he hammered at the bass; he played till the hot drops beaded on his forehead (Mrs. Shepherd slept through it all); he then, I suppose, began to improvise, for no natural piece of music could ever have been so long, and gave us what must have been warnings of a new crusade, for there was oriental battle-music in it, and charges of horse, French and English marches, file-firing and sabre-clashing; lastly he performed what he called "the Resurrection of the East." On, on he went, it seemed hours, till all at once his fingers relaxed, his eyes glazed, and he fell back senseless on the floor. He had fainted, as I had feared he would.

"Mad as a March hare!" said Masters scornfully, spirting a fusee as we went out of the Consul's door. "I would n't be in Ramsay's shoes for a couple of hundreds. I can't think how that mad duffer could let those Shepherd women egg him on to such a crack-brain display of himself. Suppose I'd gone on with the 'Bells of Aberdovey' all night; why, they'd have had me in the madhouse long before this. By the by, how Ramsay carried on with that younger Miss Shepherd, — decent girl, but not my sort; and did n't old M'Baine scowl when I talked too loud! Hang me if I darken his doors again, the old Turk! But look, there are Erskine and Ramsay crossing the corner of the Usbeckesh; he is spouting, I do believe, even now. Look at him, — only just look at the man."

I turned to look, and saw Erskine standing, a tall, dark figure, waving his hand at the great moon, that, large and bright, shone out with a lustre and purity only to be seen in the East. Ramsay was urging him forward.

"If old M'Baine ever gave anybody anything stronger than sherbet, I should call that fellow half-seas-over," said Masters. "That's just the sort of man who would throw up a good living in England to go out and hobnob with cannibal idiots two thousand miles off. He'll be trying to convert the Pasha next, or denouncing polygamy in the Sultan's harem. He actually longs to lose his head. I do think he'd try and turn the Pope out of St. Peter's with his own hands. O, there's a tile off, no doubt of it. I never did see such a queer fish, such an impracticable, mad lot in all my life. I suspect those Nubians will bring him to grief. He's sure to go preaching about alone. He talks of stopping with them; they'll kill him for his gold watch, or his teeth, or his studs, and there'll be an end of him. For Heaven's sake, let's slip into Zech's first, or we shall have him sitting up jawing all the blessed night over his lefionade about founding a Christian empire in Nubia, or making Rothschild Emperor of Jerusalem. How I do hate that sort of irrational man, with theories no person on earth can understand! Look out, double up, they're turning the corner now."

"O, you're far too hard on Erskine, Masters," I said, as we entered Zech's hotel, and ascended the staircase together en route to our bedrooms in that enormous caravanseraï. "He is a fine enthusiastic fellow, and of the true Peter-the-Hermit type. Such men often convert whole nations, and reform the centuries in which they live. If Erskine's health holds out, he will be a great religious reformer."

"Well, I don't like the kind of man, that's all I can say; but we won't quarrel about it, old fellow. Take that chair, light a cheroot, and let's settle our kit on paper, before that amusing wild-beast of a fellow, Donovan, comes. He'll be on us like a typhoon to-morrow early, depend on it, and I want you to see my new Westley Richards."

I awoke at midnight; some one was singing. It was Erskine, two rooms off, chanting passages from the Stabat Mater.

Bang, rap, bang, went a slipper at his door. Bare feet paddled down the passage.

"For Heaven's sake, Erskine," cried an agonized and angry voice that I knew to be Masters's, "do get to sleep, and let other people. I hear groaning all down our corridor; go to sleep, man; you've had singing enough, surely, for one night."

Erskine replied diffusely; but what he said I did not hear, for I fell asleep.

A tremendous burst at the door awoke me the next morning; great feet trod the matted floor, a giant's hands shook my bedclothes roughly, and tore aside my mosquito-curtain; a huge coarse red face, not over-clean, crowned with a red tarboosh, glowered on me. It was Donovan, who, drawing a packet from his paletot-pocket, slapped it on the table, and then drank at a draught half a bottle of claret we had left from the night before.

"There's my luggage," he said, in his astoundingly deep voice, — "slippers, shirt-collar, and revolver. Came from Alexandria, my boy, by the night-train, and devilish hungry I am. Do nothing without my steak, — shall eat two this morning. Get up, you spalpeen; here's the contract in Arabic for you to sign."

"But, Donovan," I moaned, wistful of sleeping, "there's no hurry; wait for the dragoman."

"Wait for him!" roared my persecutor, rushing to the door, and shouting in Arabic twice as loud as a bull. "Why, the fellow's down stairs, and the captain too, — brought them both an hour ago. Great rogues; but they're afraid of me. Everything's ready; I never delay things. Flags, powder, shot, wine, biscuits, ink, charcoal, will all come from my store by next train, — save you forty per cent. Saw the Pasha yesterday, by the by, about the right to excavate at Memphis. There was a dirty little Frenchman tried to get a prior permission, just to stop you. He boasted of it as I was going up; so I kicked him out of the palace for his impertinence. The moment the Pasha saw me, 'Donovan,' says he, 'my boy, what the devil have you been doing, kicking this Frenchman? This is a breach of the peace, Donovan,' says he."

The mode of putting the Pasha's remonstrance was so Irish and so intensely absurd that I could restrain myself no longer. I laughed till the bed shook again. Donovan looked amused and sobered for a moment; then he dipped his hand in a side-pocket and drew out an enormous flat-headed monitor-lizard, which he thrust in the face of a German waiter, who just then came in to say our dragoman was below. The German turned pale, shuddered, and fled, much to Donovan's cyclopean delight.

"I've got a vulture and a young hyæna coming for me to-day," he said; "I suppose you can give them a shakedown here. They are presents. I bought them for a friend at Malta. You should have seen me the last time I was here, riding full tilt down the Usbeekesh with a parrot on my shoulders. Every now and then the little dodger would fall off and hop after me. To see the Arab fellows stare! O, I sha'n't forget it. Now, then, you duffers" (here he opened the door and roared down the corridor), "Abou Hoosayn Shoolamei and Ali Reis."

I prayed for mercy. Could n't he wait until I was dressed, and had had my bath?

"Not a moment," said the Whirlwind. "Business is business. What did I come for but to manage the contract for you?"

A sneaking tap at the door, and a mean, fat-faced fellow in a turban thrust in his head deprecatingly.

"Want dragoman, sir? Second Cataract — pound a-day — good testimonial — Sir Smith, Dr. Dredger — Christian man, sir — no cheat."

Donovan snatched up my bootjack, and roared like a hurt lion. "I know you; you're Lezano — the fellow that two American gentlemen tied to the mast and flogged for stealing a bank-note. Vamoose quick, or I'll shy this. You dirty blackguard, — get out of that!"

Sir Smith's dragoman had scarcely gone, when the door again opened, and two men presented themselves. The one was a short thin Maiteese, with a long vulture nose and only one eye; the other, the Arab captain of the boat, — a tall, square-built, sullen fellow, with an air of authority, but evidently a satellite of the one-eyed dragoman, a little, subtle, thievish, hypocritical, servile fellow, with timid, greedy eyes and a weak chin, who kept moving about a great gilt thumb-ring as he spoke, whenever he was not fumbling in the folds of his red sash for his bag of copper-change. They were both evidently nervously anxious to sign the contract.

"Anything gentlemen wished. All rait, Mr. Donovan, as gentlemen wish. Stop where you like. No delay till reach Thebes, but two days for baking bread for the crew. All rait, sir, — make all rait."

"No backshish to crew; boat to be sunk to kill rats before starting," roared Donovan, laying down each condition with a blow of the bootjack on the table. "Provisions to be first-class" (here Arabic to explain "first-class"), "beds clean, awning to quarter-deck, cat on board, fresh meat as often as possible, small boat to go on shore with, no unnecessary stoppages, crew not to absent themselves without leave, and mind you, Shoolamei, ballast enough, or I'll pull you up before the Consul, every man-jack of you: decks washed every morning, — mind that, you fellow, grinning there, — and plenty to eat, no starving, or I'll thrash you both the first time I meet you. Now, then, sign this. Where's Masters?"

Out whisked the Whirlwind: in he came directly, leading Masters half-dressed, and a hairbrush in each hand.

The dragoman remarked that he could not write.

"You thief of the world," cried Donovan, "who ever thought you could? Come, no shuffling. You'd better treat these gentlemen well, or I'll kill you. Where's your seal? Come, out with it!"

As the dragoman proceeded to wet the seal with ink and stamp his cipher, Donovan became vituperative in Arabic.

"What's that all about?" said Masters, who had been eying the dragoman and his friend with a most sarcastic and suspicious look. "What does that amount to?"

"I told him," said Donovan, stroking his beard, "and swore by the heads of Hassan and Hoosayne, that if he defrauded either of you, or violated his contract, I would drag him before the cadi, and beat him with my own hands; and that when the criers had next to proclaim the daily rise of the inundation, they should end by proclaiming the shame and rascality of Abou Hassan Shoolamei of Cairo, and Ali Reis of Boolak."

Donovan winked fiercely at us as he repeated thisrodomontade.

As soon as the somewhat sinister-looking men had left the room with many solemn oriental leave-takings, I asked Donovan calmly what he really thought of their probable honesty and fidelity.

Masters fixed his eyeglass steadily on Donovan, and paused for a reply.

"Well," said Donovan, "you fellows must n't expect too much. I never yet did find an Arab I could rely on entirely; but I think these two will do, if you keep a firm hand. They're both rogues, like all these dragomans and captains; they'll of course pluck you a little. But they'll be on their guard, I've thrashed so many of them. I nearly killed one fellow, a Syrian, because he tried to burn my boat. I walked into him, you may depend on it. O, there's no fear from Shoolamei. Don't show your money, don't leave any trinkets about; it's a bad plan. They'll tell any lie. Above all, be firm, and don't trust them farther than you can see. As for Erskine and Ramsay, who are gone up the river, they'll have a nice time of it. Those rascals will pull their very eyelashes out. O, they want a firm hand, these Arabs. Ha! you fellows are like young monkeys; you've all your troubles before you. By the by, did I ever tell you how I organized that revolt in Alexandria, when five thousand of my Italians, armed with knives, resisted the Austrians, who wanted to seize some refugees?"

I said, "No."

Masters began violently to brush his hair, and secretly groan; but at that moment the breakfast-gong beat, and we were saved an infliction. The Shepherds at the table-d'hôte eyed with profound astonishment that huge Irishman, with his fez cap and careless dress, his stupendous appetite, his leonine laugh, his loud, declamatory assertions of his own sagacity and prowess, and his chivalrous scowls at any one who stared at him!

We had been fourteen days afloat; the life was pleasant, but still, from the want of exercise, it must be owned, rather monotonous. Miles and miles of earth-bank, through which the great brown river had cut silently its irresistible way. Ramsay and Erskine were on before; the Shepherds followed us. I read Herodotus aloud, while Masters watched at the cabin-window for pelican or wild-duck. He never brought much to the bag, as we could not stop to pick up the birds, and the current ran fast; but still it amused Masters. Day by day we could not help observing that the crew got more sullen, the captain more silent, and the dragoman more insolent and dictatorial. My gravest suspicions were aroused, though I scarcely knew why.

We passed the monastery of Our Lady Mary, on the lower plateau of the Gebel-e-Dayr mountain. A true Egyptian sunset turned the cliff to a ruby color. On the top of the cliff three black specks proved to us that the monks saw us, and were sending out their swimming emissaries; still, none came.

As the sun set in ineffable splendor, we fired our usual evening gun, and in came the malign dragoman with a smoking turcen of our favorite lentil-soup.

"I wish those beggars had swam out to us," said Masters.

"Dirty rogue men," said Shoolamei. "No Christians — humbug men — all they do, scratch, scratch, beg, beg."

Just as he left the cabin we heard a furious splash in the water, angry shouts in Arabic, and cries of "I am a Christian, O hawajee (pilgrims)!"

We ran out, and there was Shoolamei, yellow with rage, beating with a heavy oar at a lean monk who floated on the water, buoyed up on a raft of inflated hide.

The monk, avoiding the blows, screamed and spat, writhed his thick brown body as if he was a water-snake, and shouted his war-cry of mendicancy.

"Why, what's up?" said Masters, angrily.

"This up, this up — bad man — thief man!" said the dragoman, quite beside himself with hatred of the vociferous Christian.

"Lay down that oar!" I said.

"I'll kill him, as if was toad!" replied Shoolamei, striking harder, and inciting the crew also to strike.

"If Shooly does n't stop, I'll tip him over," said I to the captain, who looked on sullenly.

Shoolamei still used the oar, but could scarcely reach the monk.

"Once! Will you stop? Twice! — three times!" I said, and with a strong heave of both hands, the dragoman still striking furiously at the monk, I threw Shoolamei over into the river.

The captain and men dropped their oars, and seemed inclined to make a rush on us. I drew my revolver.

"Fish that man up," I said, "or the monk will strangle him. Touch me, and I'll kill one of you."

Masters ran down for his double-barrelled gun.

The men still looked savage and threatening, but a whisper from the Reis, who was smiling with treacherous cunning, and pretending to laugh at the whole matter, calmed them, and pulling out Shoolamei and the monk together, they resumed their oars.

Shoolamei appeared vexed, yet contrite; but he muttered when Masters and I laughed at the draggled and miserable appearance he presented. A minute or two more and he was waiting on us and the poor monk with all the obsequiousness of a servant whose very existence depends on his master's pleasure. His one eye was turned almost benignly on us and on our gesticulating guest.

"Now that's what I call a good sort," said Masters, when Shoolamei saw the monk over the boat-side, and watched him swimming back to the monastery of Our Lady Mary, — "bears no malice. I know I should n't have much liked the flying mare you sent him. What a cropper he did go, to be sure! I thought he was never coming up again. Well, he deserved it; for that last kid he bought had been kept far too long. I only wish you had sent the captain in too; for he's a surly beast, and makes a point of not understanding my Arabic, which is ungrateful, for I almost find the beast in tobacco. I believe that what Donovan says is right, — the only way to reason with an Arab is to take him hard between the eyes, and then talk to him."

"We must keep them good friends," I replied, laughing; "but the lesson I gave Shoolamei will do him good, I'm sure. He fancies he is going to get the upper hand, but he isn't. Yet still, somehow, Masters, I don't like the man, and we must watch him closely."

Our first inquiry at Thebes was for Erskine and Ramsay. The latter had gone on alone to the First Cataract. Erskine had gone inland, in order to preach to the natives in some villages in the interior. We had had to tow nearly all the way, and forty days had passed in this tedious operation. The Shepherds' boat we had seen in the distance at Denderah.

"Just like Erskine," said Masters, contemptuously; "anything to be singular. He'll turn hermit next, like — like what's-his-name, who preached the Crusades. Now, then, look here, Shoolamei, about these tombs?"

We had not been ten minutes at Thebes, and here was that excellent but inconsequential fellow, Masters, already proposing, with the true English spirit of business, to begin the tombs. Pleasure with an Englishman always assumes an air of business. It is to be done quickly, punctually, and, if possible, cheaply.

That night we spent at the Egyptian Consul's, in a room every corner of which was packed with mummy-cases. The Consul had some native dancing to amuse us, and discoursed on the splendor of Karnak. We talked of nothing but lotus columns, hieroglyphics, Belzoni's discoveries, obelisks, and the vocal Memnon.

As we rose to take leave, the Consul said to us carelessly, "Had you a good character with your dragoman?"

I told him he had been hired for us by Donovan, whom he knew well. That seemed to entirely satisfy him. I asked him if he had any reason for his question. He replied, "No; only watch him. There was a story or two against him at one time."

"Who is to go with us, Shoolamei, to the tombs?" shouted Masters through the cabin-door, the moment he had leapt out of bed the next morning, and fired off a salute at a passing flock of wild-geese.

A big Nubian helmsman and a little Arab sailor rose up from the deck, where they were feeding out of a great wooden bowl, and grasped their acacia-sticks and their water-bottles ready for a start. Shoolamei and the captain whispered together, then came forward to our cabin-door. They motioned the volunteers back to their meal, and took up the water-bottles and staves.

"We go to tombs — I and the Reis," said the dragoman, with one malign eye looking sourly into space, and one sound eye all benevolence. "We wish good sight to gentlemen in Thebes. We show No. 17 tomb, Belzoni's tomb, high-priest tomb, great tomb, — all right off. Yes, better than boatmen — lazy fellows, know nothing. I and Reis show tomb — any tomb show — yes — best. Get good donkey for gentlemen — English gentlemen like good donkey."

"O, that'll do," said Masters. "We know all about it. English gentlemen like good donkeys, and good dragomans like you; that's about it. Come, fire away with the breakfast, and put up some grub for us, — some limes, mind, and some figs, lots of that stewed apricot stuff, some cold meat, and some hard-boiled eggs."

"How deuced civil that rascal is this morning, Masters!" said I. "I suppose he's afraid we shall have the Consul down on him, eh? He'll be wanting us to do all Thebes in a week. We've cured the fellow, sure enough."

"O, he be hanged! I wont move till I've seen the place from top to toe. We ain't at Thebes every day; and mind this, he sha'n't hurry me to-day; the more he hurries, the more I shall take it quietly; and if he gives us any cheek, down he goes, in the tomb or out of the tomb."

The heat had evidently upset Masters's liver. He was at bay against our lazy captain and our despotically dragoman. Shoolamei had better take care, I thought; for Masters, good-natured as he was, had his rough side, and could hit very hard from the shoulder.

We started directly after breakfast, mounted on donkeys; Shoolamei and the Reis taking our guns in case of a chance jackal among the sand-hills; a Nubian boy carrying our water-bottle, and running behind us, patient and untiring, with a great basket of provisions hanging over his swarthy shoulder. It was very hot even then, and the pure blue of the sky had turned to a sort of brazen glow and glare that only an eagle's eyes could meet with impunity. The sand over which we scuffled returned the glare with interest, and rose in a hot cloud around us if we ventured to urge our donkeys faster than their usual lazy, uncomfortable amble. The boys, their drivers, chattered in Arabic, and ran after us in subservience to Shoolamei and his long javelin of acacia-wood.

I and Masters kept well in front, our bridles of blue beads jangling as we rode first, so as to be able to talk undisturbed. Shoolamei applauded our riding and our spirit, our steeds and our punctuality. He was all smiles. Even the stolid Reis relaxed into approving gestures, and uttered his favorite English phrase, "Yes — all rait — yes!" several hundred times.

"What a famous humor they're in!" I said to Masters. "Rather civil of them, too, coming to save us a guide. I say, Masters, we must give Shoolamei and the others a sheep at the next place."

I really thought the other day we were going to have trouble with the fellow."

"Hang his civility!" said Masters, turning round in his saddle and scowling at unconscious Shoolamei, who, by the by, had now mounted a donkey, as also had the Reis; "some trick or other. I suppose he's going to ask us for more money in advance, or to reconsider the contract, or something of that kind. I don't like the fellow; he's a bad lot, that's my belief; and I shall tell Donovan so."

"Masters, you're a cynic."

"Well, I suppose I am; but I don't like dragomans, that's the fact. By the by, did I tell you that yesterday, as I was counting out the sovereigns in my belt for my Syrian trip, I looked up and saw that one-eyed beast glowering in at me? When he observed me he began cleaning a cabin-window; but I don't think he had come for that. I almost wish, though, I had n't left the belt in the trunk under my bed. I shall wear it again always, as I used to."

"Don't be so suspicious of poor Shoolamei," I said. "How could he help seeing your money? Of course he knows we have money. What of that?"

"Well, I don't know; but still I don't like the fellow, and I'd just as soon he had not seen me put the belt in that small valise."

As we were riding through the rank green fields that spread round the great statue of Memnon, a frightened-looking seller of antiquities from the tombs of the kings met us, and spoke in Arabic to Shoolamei and the Reis.

"What's up, Shoolamei?" said Masters; "the fellow looks as if he'd been bitten by a mad dog."

Shoolamei, who was of no religion, and believed in nothing, stared through his one eye, and said, —

"There was a ghou! seen last week in the tombs of the kings; no guide will go there now." The fellow sneered as he told us this. "Perhaps hyena, eh? — what say? English gentlemen afraid? Turn back — eh?"

"You be hanged!" said Masters, furiously. "If you turn back, I'll have you before the Consul; remember that. I should like to have a fair shot at a ghou! — new idea, eh, Barclay? Come, push on, Shoolamei, or let me. I say, Barclay, isn't it lucky we brought our white umbrellas! It's screeching hot; my brains are being regularly scalloped in the shell."

Presently we reached the burning Valley of the Tombs, with its cavernous rocks, and its wild, desolate scenery, bare, lonely, parched, and torrid. No weed grew there, nor any green thing; the quick brown lizards, glancing over the heaps of sand and broken white plaster, were the only living creatures that we saw, except once, when a scared jackal darted across a distant hill, and ran into a tomb where some Pharaoh had once rested.

We halted at a square dark doorway numbered 20. It was one, we observed, not noticed in Murray. Masters got out his red guide-book, and flew into a rage.

"Shoolamei," said he, "we want No. 17, — Belzoni's tomb. This is no use. Come, we will do as we like; you take us to No. 17 right off."

Shoolamei grew obsequious and argumentative.

"Not best first," he said; "no good. Belzoni tomb spoil all. Better see different sorts first, — this very large, curious for first. Englishmen never see it. They're foolish."

"Well, so it is," said I, referring to Murray;

"It's the high-priest's tomb, Petemunap (King Horus), eighteenth dynasty. Deuce of a long time ago. Three hundred and twenty feet straight off to first deviation; eight hundred and sixty-two feet altogether from entrance; area, twenty-three thousand eight hundred and nine feet; occupies an acre and a half."

"The deuce it does!" said Masters; "like the cheek of those high-priests. What a pluralist he must have been!"

"Yes," said Shoolamei, "this priest too big, large, very large, mendous room — much hieroglyph — men cooking — men rowing — everything. Better than Belzoni tomb, — much fuss, Belzoni tomb, — not so good — no."

"Well, I suppose we must see it," said Masters. "Give us the candle, Shoolamei, and mind and bring the rope, in case we want to go down anywhere, or the steps are bad. Suppose, Barclay, we were to find a row of mummy kings, or a chest of papyri, with the lost books of Livy, — eh? or a complete Ennius, or some find of that kind; that would be rather jolly, eh?"

There was a good deal of whispering between Shoolamei and the Reis. The Reis was afraid of the ghou!, so Shoolamei said, but at last he consented to go with us. He did so sullenly and almost savagely. The dragoman had some hold over that man that we never could understand, for the Reis always did as he wished, although often after a struggle.

Down we went slowly out of the light, down a broad, broken staircase into the darkness, our path strewn with broken plaster, and encumbered with thick soft sand, detritus, and powdered gypsum. The walls were covered with sculptures and hieroglyphics, brilliant in rich reds, blues, and yellows; kings seated with their fan-bearers, priests, ministers, and soldiers. Trains of slaves and bearers of tribute defiled along the passage, and seemed almost to move as we passed them with our flickering lights. Passages, doorways, more staircases, then oblong chambers, mysterious pits, pillared halls, and intricate nests of small rooms, filled with sculptures representing all the phases of Egyptian life a thousand years ago; glass-blowers, saddlers, curriers, carpenters, chariot-makers, fowlers, husbandmen, boat-builders. Myriads of brown faces had bent over this work, myriads of brown hands had toiled in those gloomy chambers, miles as it seemed away from the burning sunshine of the outer valley.

Sculptured room after room, sculptured passage after passage, sculptured ceiling after ceiling, cell after cell, centuries of careful records of the hopes, toils, ambitions, and vanities of generations of ages since passed to dust. Still unheeded, the silent figures performed their mimicry of life, and recorded the names and deeds of men immortalized, but only within this tomb. The darkness pressed upon us; it moved before us slowly as our candles advanced in solid masses, like huge doors of black marble slid back from the mouth of a sepulchre. As our light moved on, fresh troops of quaint red figures and hieroglyphics appeared, approached, and faded again into the darkness. It was a gigantic but useless effort of man's ambition thus to inurn his body; a stupendous effort of wealth, and of that almost supernatural tenacity of purpose that enabled the Egyptians to rival the Titans and to raise the Pyramids.

"Glad we came here," said Masters, with a great effort to keep his eyeglass steady. "Good fellow, that Shoolamei. This is a regular find. We'll write to the Times about this. I propose, Barclay we do it thoroughly."

"We'll go to the very end, if it takes all day," said I, "though the air is very close. I believe there's never enough foul air to be dangerous in these tombs."

All at once the darkness seemed to widen round us, the ceiling to lift, and we found ourselves in a large hall, supported by six giant columns of barbaric shape.

"This very fine—this good," said Shoolamei, muttering in Arabic to the Reis, as he suddenly scrambled up a heap of dry palm-twigs, and set them on fire with his candle.

"How stunning!" said Masters. "By George, look, old man, this is something like!"

It was indeed an extraordinary scene; the blaze of flame lit up the huge hall, disclosing the colossal colored figures of winged genii that adorned its four walls. On the ceiling a giant Isis and Osiris guarded the broken granite sarcophagus that still stood in the centre, on the edge of a great dark chasm, down which descended two broken staircases. Athor, Horus, and Anubis looked down on us from the vaulting, as the flame had brought them to life, but in the succeeding darkness they again melted away.

We all stood on the edge of the staircases, and looked down as into the entrance of Hades, dark, inscrutable.

"This not ghoul-tomb—that next tomb. Papyri there," said Shoolamei, pointing down; "perhaps treasure. I think king mummy there; perhaps sarcophagus—eh? Try, perhaps, find, eh? What think? Englishmen never here before. I hold rope safe round pillar; take plenty candle. Have lunch first."

As we lunched, Shoolamei and the Reis sat talking apart earnestly, and with side-looks cast at us.

"I'll go in for it," cried Masters, pouring out some wine; "here's to the two future Belzonis!"

"Belzonis,—ha, ha! Very good. What think?" said Shoolamei, laughing in his sour, dry way. "Reis here say you more sense than Belzoni; not afraid to go to end, and find king mummy. If you find, you give poor Shoolamei one guinea, eh?"

"Give you! yes, and my blessing too, you duffer," said Masters, as we finished our luncheon. "I'll stick my candle in the brim of my wide-awake; you do the same, Barclay. Come along. I'll go down first; the walls are quite steep, and I can work down with my feet safe enough to the first landing, wherever that may be."

The two Arabs secured the rope safely at one end, then let the other fall into the darkness.

Masters went down laughing; at about fourteen feet he stopped, and shouted up lustily. The two Arabs laughed together, and I laughed.

"All right, Barclay; come along! There's another staircase here to the right, and we shall have a great find yet. Now, man, come. The hieroglyphs here are wonderful,—as bright as if they were painted yesterday. Here are crocodiles and porcupines, and all sorts of rum fish. Come along, old man; it's quite easy getting down."

I descended too, with my candle in my hat; several more candles were to be lowered by Shoolamei afterwards, in case of accident. I thought once I heard a groan, and Masters laughed when I said it was the ghoul.

I was by his side in a moment or two more. We left our revolvers above.

Masters shouted up,—

"Take care of the rope, you duffers there; we sha'n't be long."

Still up lifted the rope. Already it was beyond our reach.

"Leave the rope alone, you fools there!" shouted Masters. "Leave it, I tell you, just as it is."

Up still—quick—went the rope; it was now far beyond our reach. We could see Shoolamei grin, and the Reis show his great yellow horse-teeth, as he coiled the rope up slowly.

"Now, then, English gentlemen," cried Shoolamei, kneeling on the edge of the chasm, and looking down sneeringly, "good by to you. No more call Arab fool Arab, ass Arab; him very good man now, if he give rope, eh? By and by, cold, hungry,—then go to sleep cumf'able. Large bed there, plenty of room with King. Shoolamei take care of your money. Reis wish you good night. Any message to Cairo? You fool, gentlemen, now—English—eh, what think?"

All became dark for a moment, then the light reappeared, and the two hideous, mocking faces, illuminated with the light, were thrust over the edge of the pit.

"All rait, gentlemen?" said Shoolamei. "All very cumf'able down there? No one come here to disturb you; no traveller, no Englishman, ever come here. We go back; take boat. Say to Consul, left you mile down below Karnac, get safe to Boolac, sell boat there, take train to Alexandria, go off and spend money. O you fool Englishmen! how you like dragoman's trick now, eh?—how you like it? Good by. Call Shoolamei when you want anything, ass, thief. Dragoman you tried to drown sure to come."

There was a-bellow of cruel, mocking laughter,—the light passed away. We were left alone there forever,—left slowly to die in that tomb, hopeless. Our death would be lingering, but it was certain. We heard a distant laugh recede; then came a deeper and more terrible silence.

O, the ineffable horrors of that moment, as the sense of the certainty of a dreadful death fell upon us like a thunderbolt, and struck us into agonizing despair! I tried to speak; but my tongue clove to the roof of my mouth and refused to utter the half-cry, half-prayer, to which I was wishing to give utterance. Then rose to my brain a rage and regret almost approaching to madness at having been the dupes of such rascals and murderers, whom with ordinary precaution we could so easily have foiled and overthrown. But was there no hope? None; no glimmer of light came to us in our utter misery. This tomb was never visited. Ramsay and Erskine were by this time probably up at the First Cataract; and the Shepherds, however soon they arrived, were not the sort of travellers who deviate much from the usual track. No; we should die of starvation; unless in some frantic moment of despair we should be tempted to kill one another. Not a moment now passed but it seemed like hours.

I clasped Masters's hand. We were silent for some minutes, then he said solemnly, "Here's a pretty go! I say we are in for it."

"Villain, blackguard, treacherous villain!" I shouted in a tempest of rage, that, however, soon subsided into despair.

We knelt down together, and prayed God to deliver us. Then we began to try to cut steps in the rock with our pocket-knives, but that was hopeless. Then came hours of torpid despair.

It was night now; I thought, soon will come the gnawing pangs of starvation, the maddening agonies of despair. We should die mad with thirst. Who knew what insane and horrible impulses might not come upon us in that struggle for a few more hours of life? I could have run on the cannon or the bayonets, I could have leaped among shoals of sharks, to save a friend, or in pursuit of my duty; but death here, unpitied and alone, was too horrible. We shouted, we clasped each other's hands again, and prayed, — prayed with silent tears. Our light had long since gone out.

"Hark!" cried Masters suddenly. "What was that?" He sprang to his feet.

There was indeed a sound, as of a footstep; then arose from the darkness of the staircase beneath a verse of an English hymn, sung in a deep, hollow voice.

Gracious God! what could it be? A light came twinkling out of the darkness; then, slowly, a pale, mournful face, bound round with white, like a corpse, came down a long avenue of tombs moving towards us. A long figure, wrapped in white, and with shrouded face, like a Lazarus emerging from the sepulchre, came nearer and nearer, holding a candle in one hand. We could hardly breathe from wonder and fear.

"I come," it said, pointing to the rows of hieroglyphic figures on the nearest wall, "to preach to you, fallen spirits, children of Hades. When the angel spoke to me in the desert, and sent me thither, did I not arise at once to bid you repent, — ye who have not fallen, like Satan, forever? Dead father, whom I knew while I was in sin, trouble me not, for I have no part or lot with you. Leave me, while I go and pronounce the prophecies of mercy and of doom to the great crowned genii in the upper chamber. Osiris, repent! Isis, seek in prayer, and thou shalt obtain mercy. Fallen dominions, great principalities of hell, ponder these things; abandon this howling darkness, this blackness of despair, and follow me to the green paradise, to the river of life, to the unfading happiness. It will be centuries, cycles of centuries, ere God again sends you another warning prophet."

We were at first astonished as by a supernatural event; but before the figure had spoken two words we had recognized those words as English. Before a whole sentence had been uttered we had recognized the speaker as our friend Erskine. In such a place, and at such a crisis, it seemed a direct miracle could alone have sent him there. Were we dreaming? Masters looked at me, and I at Masters. Then we crouched closer into the darkness lest the spectre should see us before we had formed our own conclusions as to his purpose, his humanity, and his destination.

A frantic joy now seized me, and took the place of a ghastly despair. I felt inclined to shout and dance and sing, but that a vivid sense of the imminent danger still pressed upon me. If our reason had not already gone, there was Erskine. Why he had come, we could not guess, nor could we imagine how he had found an entrance to that abyss. Perhaps he, too, had been decoyed there and deserted, and in that case we should but share his death. Perhaps he had gone mad, and had voluntarily descended a place from which there was no rescue. These and similar thoughts rushed in a moment through my fevered brain, over whose turbulent sea Hope once again cast its deceitful sun-gleam. I roused Masters from the torpor into which he had sunk.

As we stood there, Erskine — for it was indeed that mad enthusiast — sat down twenty feet off, at the entrance to a dark passage we had not before noticed, and began to sing that beautiful old hymn, "The Lord my pasture shall prepare." His fine voice rang through that great chambered tomb.

There was hope for us now Erskine had found his way there, — perhaps had taken up his abode there, in some fit of temporary insanity. Perhaps he would be able to find his way out. We debated whether we should at once leap out on him, and force him to be our guide. But our only candle was burned out, and our matches were expended in our searching. If, in the struggle, Erskine's candle should also become extinguished, a fresh frenzy might come on, and he might either refuse to allow our escape, or lose his way in the darkness.

I muttered in a low voice some Arabic words. Erskine turned, and began to descend a staircase.

"Follow him," said Masters; "let's follow him. He is mad, — stark mad, you see; but still he may have some means of getting out; he fancies he has been sent to convert the souls in Hades. He is living here among the tombs; he must have got some secret way out. He could not sing like that if he was starving, — I defy him. Look, he does not see us yet."

"There is hope, Masters; I feel there is," said I. "See, he turns into that hall to the left; yes, he must have a way of getting out."

"Yes, God in his goodness be thanked! He must have been the ghoul, then, the people saw."

We followed, taking off our shoes to tread softly, lest he might mistake us for some of his spirit-congregation, and turn and fly, leaving us to a fate too horrible to be thought of.

We followed him down passages that seemed endless, all far lower than the level of the tombs from which we had descended. Had he, too, been left there to perish? Suddenly he turned a corner, and his candle disappeared. To our infinite horror, when we turned the corner too, in our hot but silent pursuit, we could not see the light of Erskine's candle, nor hear his voice or his footsteps.

We now gave ourselves up for lost. Erskine must have seen us, and eluded us; or he had fainted, and was dying in a fit. Suddenly my hand, moving along the wall, detected an opening broken through, and a passage beyond.

"Hurrah, Masters! cheer up, old boy!" I said. "I'm on the right track now, — he certainly must have slipped through here."

In a moment we were through. We turned a corner; the light of day fell on us, — blessed, glorious light of hope and life! There was a broken staircase leading into the valley. Erskine was ascending. When he saw us, he screamed insanely, and fell on his knees, with his hands raised to heaven.

"I know you," he said; "you are sent by the prince of the power of the air to tempt me back to earth; but I will not come. My mission is to preach to the dead in Hades. No, no."

We leapt on the madman, and secured him as he was about to fly from us into a neighboring tomb.

Suddenly, at a turn of the valley, at the mouth of the famous Belzoni tomb, in the shadow of the entrance, we came upon an English party lunching, near a fire at which some Arabs were making coffee. They rose when we approached, and greeted us warmly.

"But, my boys, what in the wide world are ye doing, dragging about Poor Erskine? O, I see, there's something wrong about him. Why, the Consul told us you'd gone off to Karnac. Here, let me see to Erskine."

Yes, it was that raging lion Donovan, and a friend, and the enchanting Shepherds. Donovan had started, on a sudden impulse, crocodile-shooting with a young Dublin-University man.

"Well, we are charmed with everything," said Mrs. Shepherd, as fussy as ever; "and so delighted to meet you and Mr. Masters. And where is that dear, clever, affectionate dragoman of yours?"

I briefly related my adventure, and explained how Shoolamei and the worthy Reis had tempted us into a trap, then decamped, leaving us to what they considered certain death.

The ladies were horrified at our story, and enraptured at our escape. Poor Erskine grew gradually calmer in their society, and we gave him into the care of the Consul, who was half a doctor.

Donovan was furious at the treachery of Shoolamei and the Reis; that very night he insisted on starting off in pursuit.

"I'll track them," he said, as he wished us all good by, "to Alexandria; and if I miss the spalpeens there, I'll follow them to Syria, or Greece, or Abyssinia, or any blessed part of the world; and when I find them, I'll beat them to a jelly, then drag them back and get them imprisoned for life. I know the Pasha will do that for me, and they can't afford to bribe themselves off. I say, but you two fellows had a narrow squeak for it. O, you didn't keep a tight hand enough over the dogs. I shall be sure to nab 'em, — I was in the police once."

Donovan fulfilled his promise, sure enough. He caught the two rogues at Malta, and returned with them, and with our money, not much of it spent. The crew owned the plot, and came forward as witnesses. As for poor Erskine, after a brain-fever of long duration, he slowly recovered, and is now, I believe, an active missionary in Lapland. It was a fortunate day for Masters and myself, I've often thought, when his madness took the form of a wish to dwell among the tombs.

FOREIGN NOTES.

GLADSTONE has completely recovered from his recent illness.

MAXIMILIAN is to have a gorgeous monument in Maxing near Hietzing.

THE Examiner praises President Grant for the course the American Government has taken relative to Cuba.

A PORTRAIT of Earl Russell when a baby, painted by Lawrence, has just been added to the Louvre Gallery.

MR. MILL'S "Subjection of Women" has appeared in Paris under the title of L'Assujettissement des Femmes.

MESSRS. BRADBURY and Evans contradict the report that Punch has been sold. They still remain the sole proprietors of that journal.

THE Musical Standard states that a monument is to be dedicated to the memory of Chopin in Poland. The monument is to be erected in Warsaw, and to be executed by M. Godebaki, son-in-law of M. Servais, and sculptor of a successful bust of Rossini.

It is said that Charles Dickens will resume his Readings in the autumn. His farewell series, it will be remembered, was interrupted by his ill-health.

MR. CHARLES ELIOT NORTON's elaborate paper on "Emigration," in the August number of The Fortnightly Review, has attracted considerable attention abroad.

NEWSPAPER literature has even invaded the Turkish harem. The Zeraki of Stamboul now issues an edition de luxe, printed on fine tinted paper, for exclusive circulation amongst Turkish ladies.

MR. JEFFERSON DAVIS, the late President of the Confederate States of America, is now making a tour through Scotland, accompanied by Dr. Chas. Mackay. One hardly knows which is to be pitied most.

A DIARY kept by Lord Palmerston, from the year 1827 to probably the later years of his political life, has been recently brought to light, and Lady Palmerston has given the MS. to Sir Henry Bulwer, for the forthcoming life to be published by Mr. Bentley.

AN Englishman who has invented a new life-saving apparatus wishes to be dropped in mid-channel between England and France and to be left to his own resources. The Pall Mall Gazette remarks: "Considering the trouble these inventions invariably give, and how seldom they turn out to be of any practical use, it might be as well to make an example for once, and let this gentleman have his own way."

THE foreign journals give the following account of the duel between Mr. Reginald Russell and M. de la Poeze:—

"Small swords were chosen, and it was agreed that the fight should continue till one of the men was incapable of holding his weapon. A couple of pocket-handkerchiefs having been thrown on the ground at a distance of twenty paces from each other to mark the lines to which either party might give way, swords were crossed, and on the word allez being given the combat commenced. M. de la Poeze attacked with such vigor that he exposed himself to his adversary and received a wound in the neck, but as it was simply a scratch, from which the blood, however, flowed rather freely, the fight went on. Again the Frenchman assumed the offensive, and again he was touched by his adversary's sword, this time in the arm, but the hurt was trivial, and a third appeal was made to the god of battles. Regardless of his punishment, M. de la Poeze again forced the fighting, and with such vigor that he drove Mr. Russell to within a yard of his handkerchief; the latter gentleman now thought it high time to change his tactics, and making a successful lunge, he wounded his antagonist in the chest. M. de la Poeze fell, and the affair was over. The victim in this encounter, though slightly touched in one of the lungs, is not thought to be in danger, and before Mr. Russell left the ground he desired to shake hands with him. The Helen of the quarrel has gone to Germany to drink the waters."

"JUVENTUS MUNDI."*

THE first Minister of the Crown lately produced, at the most critical moment of a critical session of Parliament, a new work on a subject of difficult antiquarian scholarship. The achievement, as so stated, is a remarkable one. Mr. Gladstone affords a highly remarkable instance of versatility in industry, of that habit of mind which for relief seeks no relaxation, but only what may be described as a change of tension. It would, however, be a poor compliment to Mr. Gladstone to discuss either division of his labors with the other division before our eyes, — to remind ourselves that his politics and his scholarship taken separately, are only parts of a feat of double activity, and to assume that, as such, they demand lenience of separate criticism. Neither politics nor scholarship are things that can be done by halves. When, therefore, we find a Prime Minister who is also a Homeric commentator, we expect, in justification of such duality, that his administration on the one hand and his commentaries on the other shall be as well done as if he were pure statesman or pure scholar. Every one admits this so far as the politics are concerned. No one would think of congratulating Mr. Gladstone on the comparative merit of his Irish Church Bill, considering the pressure of his classical pursuits. But the same principle does not find equal recognition in the case of learning. Although the days are past when learning was supposed to have received a compliment if men in high places condescended to meddle with her, there is yet a strong disposition to receive with indulgence a work of hard scholarship from the hand of the foremost statesman of his time. That Mr. Gladstone stands in need of such especial indulgence we by no means say. On the contrary, whatever faults we have to find with his work, lack of thoroughness or pains will not be among them. But it is necessary to premise that in treating of the present book we decline to take into account, what in a general estimate of its author's powers we should be bound to insist on, the difficult circumstances of its production; and that we propose to deal with it simply in its relation to the subjects which it handles, simply as a contribution, no matter by whom made, to European scholarship.

The romantic title "Juventus Mundi" might have led some readers to look in the present book for a new and complete historical picture or imaginative synthesis collected from the monuments of antiquity, and setting forth in a fresh or clearer light the early glories of Hellas.

That is not what on examining the book we find. What we find is a reproduction, much abridged throughout, and in some parts seriously modified, of the author's large work, published ten years ago, — "Studies on Homer and the Homeric Age," — a work strictly analytic in the main, and basing its conclusions on the persevering study of one set of writings only, not on any extended comparison of various writings or other sources of knowledge. "Juventus Mundi," then, is a treatise, rigorously compressed in form, and, it may indeed be said, scrupulously bald in style, on the religion, manners, and polity of the early Hellenes, so far as these can be illustrated by an exhaustive analysis of certain poems which are for the purpose assumed to be authentic and historical. Readers of Mr. Gladstone's previous "Studies" will be prepared to find that he makes this large assumption on the threshold. It is only too much in the spirit of insular scholarship that Mr. Gladstone remarks, in his first sentence, that "the general opinion holds" the Iliad and the Odyssey to be the work of an individual poet, and then proceeds, after some further parley, to adopt that opinion in its rawest form. If by "the general opinion" Mr. Gladstone means the general opinion of the uninformed, he is right in what he says; but uninformed opinion is not of much value in a question of scholarship, and Mr. Gladstone must be aware that since the days of Wolf the weight of opinion among scholars has been very heavily on the other side in this question. The sets of categorical assertions (a) (b) (c), and (a) (b) (c) (d) (e) (f) (g), with which Homeric unity and authenticity are maintained on p. 15, are simply an attempt to carry by force the desired position, and are nowhere, to our mind, at least, made good in the subsequent course of the book. Without adopting the position of any of the more extreme Chorizontes, and without considering the question absolutely foreclosed, we cannot but recognize that the verdict of scholars like Ruhnken, Lachmann, Hermann, and a dozen others, affords the strongest presumption against unity; while, on the other hand, we cannot but feel that the considerations by which English students have generally defended unity have had much more the nature of sentiment and superstition than of proof. As to the critical evidence that consists in assertions of dramatic consistency, artistic keeping, the indefinable stamp of a single genius, and the like, — this, so far as we may trust our own judgment, is, in part at least, the invention of persons themselves not to be credited with the finer critical perceptions and sympathetic instincts of literature, and guilty of grave misconception in applying to the spontaneous and unreflecting outbursts of old-world song the standards of a later and a more deliberate poetry. Whether or no Mr. Gladstone may justly be classed among such as these we shall see in the sequel. At present we have only to protest against the off-hand confidence with which he takes for granted at the outset the historical individuality of a personal Homer, author of the Iliad and the Odyssey, and of those poems only. Surely, Mr. Paley has abundantly proved, in his valuable if somewhat whimsical preface, that, however much Homer were Homer, the poems of Homer, as understood by the Greeks of the fifth century B. C. meant something totally different from the poems of Homer as understood by the dogmatic defenders of unity in our day.

Granting Mr. Gladstone his Homer, — since without this his scheme would fall to pieces, — we have still further to grant him that Homer wrote of actual events and actual persons; that, saving the introduction of a poetical theurgy, and the use of a certain license in the arrangement and embellishment of his materials, he described the war of Troy as it actually happened. "It cannot be too strongly affirmed that the song of Homer is historic song." Strong affirmation is one thing, and convincing evidence another. That the Homeric poems are historical in so far as they present a vivid picture of Hellenic manners in the age of the early patriarchal monarchies, is of course admitted; but one may wish that, before pronouncing them to be in any other sense historical, Mr. Gladstone had given greater attention to the testimony which has been brought in disproof of such a belief. The error which seems to us to vitiate Mr. Gladstone's Homeric studies, and in great part to render futile the immense labor and ingenuity which he has brought to bear upon them, is in brief this: He starts with a mechanical and, as we think, an unauthorized and indiscreet faith in the Homeric texts taken by themselves. He seems to believe that by collation and classification of the Homeric texts taken by themselves, without reference to external testimony or collateral avenues of knowledge, it is possible to evolve a complete scheme a trustworthy and self-sufficient account of the whole ethnology, religion, manners, and polity of the Greeks of the Heroic age. By reason of this mechanical, this servile adhesion to Homer and nothing but Homer, and of an insufficient or hasty investigation of other sources of knowledge, our author seems to us to involve himself in a labyrinth of misconceptions, to impose sterility on his own labors, to cut himself off deliberately from fellowship with the main army of explorers of the Past. Of other recent explorers, Mr. Gladstone seems to have made himself acquainted almost exclusively with Welcker. The "Griechische Götterlehre," of Welcker, the first part of it at any rate, Mr. Gladstone appears to have read; and in certain main points to have given to that distinguished scholar the same kind of mechanical allegiance which he gives to the Homeric texts. In order to make clear what we mean, we must explain what are the characteristic and singular features of Welcker's account of the development of Greek religion, and in what manner Mr. Gladstone follows his guide. Welcker, like some other illustrious students of language and mythology, starts with the dogma (the wholly arbitrary dogma, as we believe, but that is of no consequence here) of a primitive "Gottesbewusstsein," or intuitive knowledge and worship of a single spiritual deity. The Dyaus, Zeus, God in Heaven, of the Aryans, was at first an expression of this inspired primeval monotheism, and it was by a degradation of religion that he became the physical and visible Sky. An Aryan tribe, the Pelasgoi, carried to the shores of Greece and Asia Minor the worship of the physical Sky under the name of Zeus, and associated with it the worship of other physical elements, as Okeanos, Gaea, Uranos, Heklos, Selene, and the like.

By the Pelasgoi these Nature-Powers were worshipped consciously and directly as Nature-Powers, as actual phenomena or parts of nature, not as human or anthropomorphic deities resident in and ruling over the various parts of nature. But with the immigration of the Hellenic tribes proper came the great anthropomorphic revolution of religion; a revolution which was afterwards symbolized in the strife of the older with the younger gods, and which resulted in the relegation of the gods of the Pelasgian worship to the penal darkness of the underworld, and in the establishment of a new order of religious ideas. The gods of the new Hellenic faith were not the mere forces, beneficent or deadly, of physical nature; they were human, nay spiritual ideals. Their names and attributes had originally, indeed, been drawn from the manifestations of the physical world, — Here from the earth, Apollo from the sunlight, Artemis from the moon, and so on, — but their physical meaning came to be almost forgotten and lost sight of beneath the abundance of human character and of ethical and psychical symbolism with which the Hellenic genius overlaid them. Of this religious revolution Welcker gives a very eloquent and detailed account. The points in which he differs from other investigators are — the confidence with which he ascribes the original elemental worship to the Pelasgoi, and to no other factor of the later Hellenic aggregate, in spite of the extreme obscurity which is acknowledged to hang over the Pelasgian name; the strong distinction, or rather the positive oppugnancy, which he places between the old worship of nature and the new worship of human immortals resident in and ruling over nature; and the great stress which he lays on the spiritual and ethical superiority of the new worship over the old. In all these points Mr. Gladstone follows him, as we have said, mechanically, as we are almost tempted to say, unintelligently. Mr. Gladstone talks of the Pelasgoi as though we knew with entire precision all about them and their Nature-worship; he imagines a definite, regular, and consciously constructed Olympian system, wholly superseding the worship of Nature-Powers; he admits hardly a hint of nature among his later Hellenic deities. He commits what seems to us the incredible mistake of treating Homer as the architect of a new creed, as the skilful author and organizer of Greek religion as it existed for the next several centuries after him. "Homer was the maker, not only of poems, but also in a degree never equalled by any other poet, 1. Of a language; 2. Of a nation; 3. Of a religion." (Mr. Gladstone, by the way, indulges with a sort of Rabelaisian profusion in such classifications and enumerations, of which this is the shortest, of the things which Homer does and leaves undone.) The mythology of Homer, instead of being a chronicle or a catalogue, is a supreme work of art, that lives, breathes, and moves, like the metallic statues of his own Hephaistos. And it is precisely the contrast between this wonderful performance and the Theogony of Hesiod which enables us to conceive in some degree the immense power with which the imagination of the Homer operated in shaping the characters of the Olympian gods, in adjusting their relations to one another, and in fixing the conditions of their government of the world, and of their intercourse with the children of men.

This, we believe, involves an entire misconception of the position of the Homeric literature in the history of human thought. Whether it is the production of one or of many, that literature is surely proclaimed by crushing evidence to be, not the expression of a deliberately organizing and constructing mind or minds, but the simple effusion of extant beliefs and traditions; the spontaneous utterance of thoughts already in the air; the poetical embodiment and embellishment of stories already in existence, and owing their existence to the free play, through many generations, of an imagination finding in human agency the readiest account of material phenomena, dallying with its own metaphors, expressing everything that happened in terms of human action, assigning to everything beautiful human limbs and noble human passions, — in short, making of every name a proper name. The race whose imagination worked in this way would be sure one day to produce singers or a singer who should consecrate its thoughts for all time; but it would be in no need of a singer or singers who should be exercised in giving to those thoughts distinctness or coherency, in painfully "shaping," "adjusting," or "fixing," the character of its worship. The Homer of Mr. Gladstone does this. He is a sort of Lord Chamberlain of Olympus. He regulates the dignity and precedence of the several gods and goddesses; he arranges the etiquette and the subordination of the children of Zeus to their father; he decides that Aphrodite, for moral reasons, is to be made contemptible; that Ares is to be represented as a half-brutal bully; that one god is to be allowed to traverse the air without visible means of locomotion, and another not. The minute and careful collection of incidents and comparison of epithets by which Mr. Gladstone establishes the nature of the Olympian regulation in such matters, are things for which he deserves our admiring gratitude; things in themselves most valuable for the student, and capable, if treated from a less dry and unfruitful point of view, of throwing great light on the nature of Hellenic religion. But Mr. Gladstone does not make as much as he might of them. He has laid hold of the essentially jejune conception of an Olympian system rigorously fashioned in imitation of organized polities and families of men, not one fashioning itself freely out of the combined experience and invention of an imaginative race. And when we say freely we do not mean according to no law, since there are, no doubt, laws of mythopoeia as of other things, according to which this fashioning process was unconsciously conducted. But we do mean according to no regulations, no laws consciously imposed and carried out, as Mr. Gladstone seems to apprehend them. Mr. Gladstone is puzzled, nay, scandalized by inconsistencies of genealogy or breaches of family subordination among the gods. Long ago he made the discovery, perfectly accurate in itself, that Athene and Apollo stood in a nearer relation to Zeus than any other of his children, and shared with him certain prerogatives and privileges which Olympian custom did not allow to the children of Zeus generally.

With that singular turn of ingenuity without imagination which distinguishes him, Mr. Gladstone went about to account for this. Eager to corroborate the Christian revelation with outside testimony, and remembering the Messianic traditions of the Jews which that revelation had been held to fulfil, he bethought himself of finding a connection between Jewish tradition and Hellenic mythology. The Messianic traditions had pointed to the advent or manifestation of a deliverer, who was spoken of sometimes as the Word, sometimes as the Seed of the Woman. Among the deities of the Hellenic worship Zeus might be considered the representative, in a degraded form, of the Semitic Most High. Of his children, Athene and Apollo were held in peculiar honor, and were not as the other gods. Athene had been born without a mother from the head of Zeus; Apollo had been born with mysterious travail from the womb of Leto. Was it not plain that in this twofold form the traditions of a Redeemer had been carried on; that the birth of Athene from the head of Zeus figured the epiphany of the Redeemer as the Word, the birth of Apollo from the womb of Leto his epiphany as the Seed of the Woman? And this being so, the prerogatives of these two deities were sufficiently explained; their exemption in the Homeric poems from physical vulnerability, their character of moral purity, their gift of ubiquity, their potent command over external nature, their conformity to the will of Zeus, their right to wear his aegis. We are sorry to see this theory, — this mare's-nest, since there is no other word for it, — which occupied a considerable place in the previous "Studies," again brought forward in the "Juventus Mundi." The relation of Aryan ideas to Semitic is so dark, and the nature of the Messianic traditions itself so mysterious, that any hypothesis involving them should only be applied in the last necessity. In this case there was no shadow of necessity at all. The explanation of what struck Mr. Gladstone's notice lay at his feet. Athene and Apollo had an initial kinship and an initial title to equality with Zeus, long before the fancy of worshippers had invented an Olympian genealogy; before men had learned to call Apollo the son of Zeus by Leto, or Athene the daughter of Zeus either without a mother or by the Okeanid Metis (a collateral tradition which Mr. Gladstone's method leads him to ignore). Athene and Apollo were incarnations of purifying and beneficent physical light; no wonder that their attributes should have been akin to those of Zeus, who was the incarnation of the general expanse of heaven. In the field of comparative mythology every assertion may be as yet set down as more or less hypothetical; but if we are anywhere on safe ground, it is surely in seeing in Apollo the god of light, as conceived especially in connection with the sun; in Pallas Athene, the goddess of light, as conceived especially with reference to a supposed lucid æther and to all exceptional appearances of atmospheric brilliance. Mr. Gladstone's dry and, as we have ventured to call it, unintelligent acceptance of the outlines of Welcker's system of mythology, leads him to do what Welcker by no means does, to ignore the nucleus of physical meaning which remained in almost every figure of the Greek religion without exception, and about which the later ethical and other meanings gathered themselves with the growth of the reflective powers of the race. There is not a single exceptional prerogative of Apollo or Athene which does not instantly explain itself by a reference to the original signification of these divinities. Have they the gift of ubiquitous penetration? so have the rays of the sun and the effulgence of the air. Are they pure, beneficent, strong? so are these. Are they intangible to human hands or weapons? so are these. May they wear the ægis? the ægis is the rushing or scudding cloud, the portent of storm, and it would be strange if Sunshine or Daylight might not veil themselves with this. And so on, down to the last of the distinguishing attributes of either deity. We owe Mr. Gladstone thanks for his industrious collation of such attributes, in so far as it serves to confirm our explanation; but we cannot help feeling that his own hypothesis belongs to the class of those which are both improbable in themselves and called in to remove a difficulty that has no existence.

We have dwelt in detail on this particular speculation of Mr. Gladstone's, because it is clearly a favorite one with its author, and because it exemplifies his manner of walking past the obvious reasons of things in his search for their hidden reasons. Nothing can be more valuable, as data for the student, than the tabulation and classification here given us of the results of a textual study of Homer probably more complete than any other man has made; but nothing can in general, as we think, be poorer, thinner, less satisfactory, than the conclusions here drawn from them. In deduction, Mr. Gladstone, we should say, shows a unique combination of caution and extravagance. He is guarded and he is improbable in the same breath. The chapter on Poseidon, and on the part taken by the Phœnicians in forming the early religion and civilization of Greece, seems to us the most convincing, so far as its conclusions are concerned in the book. From the actual text of Homer, Mr. Gladstone derives evidence of what the progress of research is every day making more and more probable, of the great part which the Phœnicians played in the historical development of Greece, by importing into Hellenic communities elements of Semitic culture and Semitic religion, — not the religion of the Messiah, but the religion of Ashtaroth and Melkarth. But even here Mr. Gladstone's restriction of his studies to the text of Homer, and his exclusion of collateral authorities, maintain their cramping influence. Compare his comparatively sterile treatment of this most interesting branch of his subject with the admirably fruitful and suggestive treatment which Dr. Curtius, bringing to bear on it all available light whencesoever, has given to it in the early chapters of his "History of Greece." In short, we find Mr. Gladstone's book, speaking generally, in spite of the great capacity and the severe accuracy which it displays within a certain range, debilitated and poverty-stricken nevertheless, by the narrowness of its method and by what we cannot help calling the perversity of some of its premises. As exemplifying the industry and attainments of its illustrious author, we have at the outset declined to discuss it. As a contribution to European scholarship, we cannot think that it will take very high rank.

"THE DREAM OF MY LIFE."

In recounting what I may safely call the dream of my life, I do not propose to speculate on the origin of dreams in general. Whether those mysterious agencies known under the names of mesmerism, odid force, or animal magnetism which are said to hold certain temperaments "en rapport" with each other, influencing the sleeping thoughts and everyday actions of life, had anything to do with my particular case, I will not pretend to say; others must judge, if what happened was attributable to such causes, or if it was merely a series of curious coincidences. All I know is, that at Lucerne, some years ago, I dreamed a dream which, heralding as it did, the most important epoch in my career, and foreshadowing my subsequent fate, I am fully justified in looking upon as a most unmistakable portent, and the remarkable circumstances under which it occurred leave it a very open question whether it was the result of mere chance, or whether there are not indeed, certain unknown, and unmeasured influences at work surely but silently around the web of every human existence.

When, at the age of eighteen, I was on the point of commencing a college education, my father died, and to the surprise of every one, instead of leaving me a handsome independence, it was found that his assets were next to "nil." It was an ordinary case, supposed affluence proved to have been absolute poverty, a fair position only upheld, until the desperate struggle with overwhelming odds to keep up appearances was put an end to by death. Naturally, my plans and prospects went with the wreck; I must abandon every scheme of ambition which I had ever nursed, and I must earn my bread. So, instead of going to Oxford, I went into a merchant's counting-house.

I should not perhaps have realized so tangibly this change of fortune, had it not been accompanied by a misery which, to an earnest disposition at the outset of life, is almost overwhelming. I had formed an attachment to the only daughter of the tutor in whose house I was living, whilst being prepared for my Alma Mater. It could scarcely be called an engagement, inasmuch as, although our parents were not averse to the affair, they yet reasonably maintained that we were too young, and it had been settled that if, at the expiration of five years, we were still both of the same mind, no objection should be offered to our union. My father quite approved of my marrying early, saying that, as my prospects were good, if I could find a girl whom I really loved, it mattered little whether she had money or not, and the Rev. Hugh Mollett saw in the alliance all that he could wish for his portionless daughter. Beyond an occasional visit on my part, no communication was to be permitted, and all parties seemed quite satisfied with this arrangement, which had been arrived at just as I was about to leave my tutor's house, and when my father's sudden death shattered the whole fabric.

Many long months elapsed, and still the grief and disappointment, consequent chiefly, as I have hinted, upon the termination which was thus put to my love-affair, were unsubdued. Mollett, who was a sufferer financially by my family troubles, naturally insisted that the slight intercourse proposed should be, together with our future plans, entirely cancelled. He argued, reasonably, that my prospects now no longer warranted the contemplation of matrimony; it was a great question whether I should be able even to keep myself, much less a wife and family. He was deaf to all my appeals and avowals of unswerving fidelity; and gave me no credit for the determination which I declared, if he would only give me time, of yet being able in some degree to retrieve my lost fortunes. If he would only, I urged, allow me still to look forward to the possession of his daughter's hand, I should have a motive for exertion which nothing else could supply. In a word, I used every argument which my sincere affection for Bertha prompted, and which can be imagined as coming from a lad in the passionate enthusiasm of his first love.

After much correspondence, my letters were at last returned unopened. I was wild, mad with my sorrow! I scraped together what little money I could, and, in a fit of desperation one morning, shipped myself as a steerage passenger on board a vessel bound for the Antipodes. My recent employment as a merchant's clerk had taken me a great deal amongst the docks: I was continually witnessing the departure of the Australian liners. I had frequently speculated on the prospects which a new country offered to men of energy and enterprise in my situation, and now that the only tie which could make England dear to me was entirely broken, I determined to quit her forever, unless I should be able to return and take up the position to which, from my earliest days, I had been taught to believe I was entitled.

Fortune smiled on all my efforts in the new country, not that I especially courted or deserved her favors, for I was indifferent as to how matters went with me for a long while after leaving London. Yet everything I touched literally turned to gold. Making my way to the diggings, I became a most successful adventurer, coming day after day upon vast quantities of the precious ore, and realizing, in a few months, more than many had done in twice the number of years. Like many things in this world, my indifference as to whether I found the gold or not seemed to be the reason for my meeting with it everywhere. My fame as a finder spread, bringing with it its consequent dangers and narrow escapes, the cupidity and lawless state of society in these regions, obliging every one to defend with his life the results of his industry or good luck. Great gain had really not been my original thought in going up there, but I imagined that any merely intellectual, or monotonously routine-like existence in a city, would not half so effectually distract my mind from its settled grief and disappointment as the wild and adventurous life I must necessarily lead in the gold-fields. I found, however, that this was only partially the case. I never forgot my sorrow, but as my wealth increased, by degrees I clung to that, not with any miserly intention, but because it seemed to open the prospect of my some day returning to England a rich man; and if I did so, might I not still make Bertha Mollett my wife? I could not entirely repress the latent hope, and yet I dared not indulge in it; nevertheless, it would sometimes assert itself, and indirectly it undoubtedly had an influence on my future plans.

I spent several years as a digger, paying periodical visits to Melbourne, where I turned the nuggets and dust to the best account. Then I grew weary of the work and the life, my health was not good, and I finally determined to settle in Melbourne, and, if possible, by judicious commercial speculation, complete the fortune of which I had already laid more than a good foundation. My old luck did not forsake me, my ventures were everywhere successful, and, at the end of ten years, I was undoubtedly in a better position, financially, than I ever should have been had all my boyish prospects been fulfilled.

During the latter part of my residence in Melbourne, and when I was seriously thinking of returning home, curiously enough I came across an old schoolfellow, who, like myself, had been prepared for college by Mr. Mollett. He had gone up to Oxford, where, however, having led a wild life, he had come to most unmitigated grief, and, at the time we met, was bound for the diggings. With a beating heart, I could not refrain from making inquiries after the person still dearest to me, and learned, without much surprise, but with an indescribable pang, that she was married.

"Yes," said Jack Judder, "she got over it at last, old boy, or, at any rate, seemed to do so; Mollett drove her straight at the matrimonial fence, and she was obliged to take it 'in her stride,' as we might say in the hunting-field. Very likely he called on her, with whip and spur, but anyhow she answered, and came off an easy winner; won the 'Grand Prix' in a canter, so to speak."

"The 'Grand Prix'?" I inquired.

"Yes," he replied, "married the son of a Mossoo fellow, — Frenchman, I think, — queer name, can't remember it! Pombo, or Bombo, — something of that kind, — recollect his bringing the young beggar over one day soon after you were gone, and a pretty bad time of it he had, with his confoundedly affected foreign ways, — more like a lanky girl than a lad, — could n't speak a word of English; in fact, had come to learn it, and as Miss Mollett was the only person in the house who spoke French, naturally he fell in love with her, — desperately, I believe, and his governor (pots of money, you know, — made lace or shawls, or had something to do with silk-worms, I forget which) was caught in the trap which I don't scruple to say old Mollett, miser that he was, was always baiting with his pretty daughter. But she was broken-hearted about you, I verily believe, poor child; never saw a girl harder hit, — only married the foreigner out of desperation, not more than three or four years ago."

This was Judder's sporting and sportive manner of telling me the fate of my boyish love. I could hardly have expected anything else, yet it was a heavy blow, and one from which I did not easily recover. All my good fortune, hard work, and perseverance seemed to have gone for nothing, and for a time I was utterly cast down. Accepting the news with outward calmness, however, I did not even press Judder to try to recall with more certainty the name of the man poor Bertha had married. All my wandering, unsettled habits now returned, and as I no longer had the vaguest object for making more money, I still held to my determination to come to England; indeed, my arrangements for that purpose were partially made, and winding up my affairs, six months later found me at home again.

The sight of the old country made the many memories of former days only more vivid still. The decade which had passed away since I gazed on its receding shores, had, as I have shown, entirely failed in obliterating from my mind the one great cause of my departure, and, now that I was back again, I confess that I found it more difficult than ever to drive away from my thoughts the picture of Bertha as I then knew and loved her. I should not allude to, nor lay so much stress upon this state of my feelings, but for one very curious circumstance. I had never in my life dreamed of her. Throughout the long wretched time of my controversy with her father, and for months and months after I had left England, and when I thought of nothing but her and my grief for her loss, I never once had a sleeping vision of her, and yet I would have given worlds for one. I used, foolishly, to try to coax myself to sleep in such a mood as could not fail, I thought, to bring it about; often and often I have prayed to see her and to pass in imagination some few moments of happiness in her presence, even though all that sense of desolation and misery which rushes over the soul that has loved and suffered as it wakes from its dream of delight and peace, must inevitably have been my lot. All was in vain, however; the associations, the surroundings of our love were frequently present to me, but in Bertha's absence from the scenes, they seemed to mock my wishes for a glimpse of her. Now again, after this lapse of years, and under my changed condition, I found myself continually dreaming of the old house, of Bertha's father, and of my own old family troubles, but never, under any circumstances, of her. For a long time my mind dwelt constantly upon the peculiarity of this fact, but, by degrees, the remembrance only crossed me at intervals, and I became as free from the old spell as I was ever likely to be.

My wandering, restless disposition, nevertheless, still clung to me, and though established in England, I frequently betook myself to the Continent, and travelling hither and thither simply for amusement, I often passed the whole round of the seasons abroad, lighting upon many localities at the most unfashionable periods. It was during one of these trips, late in the autumn, and when nearly every tourist had departed, that I found myself at Lucerne.
